and a number of them never do. The officers ought to go round with him; they ought to get the benefit of his advice and his experience, to consult over the difficult cases, so that when he comes to discharge them he knows all about them, and has studied their cases; but in many, many instances, a superintendent has hardly ever seen the patients at all. Even when the patients he is to discharge come up, a quarter of an hour perhaps is the most they get, and he is dependent then upon the assistant staff, and upon the attendant's reports, and not upon his personal observation. It goes very hard with him. I think you will find, if I remember rightly, it was Dr. Wolseley Lewis who said here he would be very glad to get some outside alienist to help him to discharge the patients that ought to be discharged. He said he did not want to be regarded as the jailer and the doctor of the patients. He would like to call in outside help. That was to my mind a most extraordinary statement, because if a medical superintendent is not the fit man to discharge his own patients, he is not a fit man for his post at all. He ought to know all about his patients; and to suggest that he would feel happier if he were to call in an outside alienist, or a doctor, to tell him what patients are to be discharged, seems to me to show that he sub-consciously really feels that he had not this experience of the patients that he ought to have had.

12,518. Chairman: Unless perhaps it was just the instinct which everybody has to shift the responsibility if they can?—Quite, but it ought to be his pride. I doubt if you will get two superintendents in the kingdom to agree to calling in an outside man to help them to make up their minds as to what patients were fit to discharge.

Earl Russell: But I think it was not put quite as you put it. I think rather his feeling was that the fact that he was the authority to let them go, or to keep them, made them feel he was their jailer. He did not like them to feel that he held the keys.

Chairman: That is quite true.

Mr. Walter Stewart: May I read the actual observation? "My view is that the cases should be passed in review by the judicial authority which originally certified, both at the period of periodical review, or in cases claiming discharge." Those were the words of Dr. Lewis.

12,519. Chairman: Is that what you disagree with, Dr. Lomax?—Yes, entirely. I do not think the judicial authority has anything more to do with discharging than he has with certifying a patient. It is a medical question pure and simple, and it is a medical question which the superintendent himself ought to solve and nobody else, in consultation with his staff.

12,520. We will follow that out. Of course that arises a little later on the general topic of detention?—Quite.

12,521. You served in two asylums, did you not?—Yes.

12,522. What was the size of those asylums? Prestwich was the first one you were in?—No, the last one; I was in Lincoln first.

12,523. What was the size of Lincoln?—About 2,000, I think.

12,525. Prestwich is larger still?—Yes, almost 3,000—2,800.

12,526. Then you had experience, while you were in those asylums, of medical superintendents who were in charge of very large institutions?—Quite.

12,527. May I follow the line that Sir David was taking a moment ago, and suggest this: I suppose in every asylum there are a large number of cases which unhappily present no problem?—Quite.

12,528. I mean cases which, once having been diagnosed, have to be accepted, unhappily, as cases where there is very little prospect of recovery, and where all that can be done is to mitigate the conditions of life as far as possible?—Quite.

12,529. In your own experience, what percentage, do you think, of the cases in a hospital are in that condition—I mean cases as to which really you do not require constant medical reconsideration?—A very large proportion—half almost.

12,530. That means, does it, when we are talking of the medical superintendent's consideration and reconsideration of individual cases, it will not be a task applicable to the whole of the inmates of the asylum?—Oh no.

12,531. Therefore we to some extent narrow down the province of his anxieties to those cases where there is a chance of recovery, and where the patient may just be in a state of transition?—Quite.

12,532. So it is really what we have called the borderland case, the borderland between the onset and the actual disease is the one type of case; the other is the borderland between recovery and disease?—Yes, and then you must include a large group of hospital cases that ought to be much larger than is the case. Many of these cases which ought to be hospital cases are not; I mean to say the superintendent's duty would be largely in having to do with the hospital cases.

12,533. Do you mean cases which although they have mental disability are suffering from some ordinary ailment?—No, not only that, but they are sufficiently ill to be in hospital. It is not only that they are ill in body, but ill in mind; advanced general paralysis, cases that are bed cases, and in which they have to be nursed most carefully; bed sores form so easily, and their bones break so easily. They are in the ordinary sense ill, but it is the result of the mental state.

12,534. Do these cases, that you call the hospital cases, constitute a large proportion of the cases within your experience in the institutions where you served?—There was always a large proportion. In fact, the asylum hospital is always full, and it ought to be much larger. It ought to include a number of cases that are not included in it. It ought to include the cases that have to be constantly under the influence of drugs. All those cases ought to be hospital cases. The cases in which the illness is taking a form that it may result in physical incapacity ought to be hospital cases, I think.

12,535. Then would you contemplate that the medical superintendent's chief medical work would be concerned with those cases which would be hospital cases on the one hand, and with those cases, on the other hand, which were approaching recovery, or requiring some special treatment of a curative nature?—Quite.

12,536. And that would not mean the entire asylum population, but only a proportion of it?—Not half of it, perhaps.

12,537. I mean one might be misled as to the extent of his work by saying there are 2,000 inmates there, and assume they were all on the same level and requiring the same degree of attention, but that is not so?—That is not so, but that raises the question of what patients you ought to have in these asylums. All these problems intersect; they cannot be separated.

12,538. I can assure you we have found that in the evidence we have had. We are told if you reform at one point you may obviate the necessity of reform at the other point, and if you reform at the other point you come back to the first point, the things are interlinked?—Yes. If a certain proportion of the asylums were devoted to acute and recoverable and hospital cases, and you got out of the way the irrecoverable, the senile, the demented and the feeble-minded, and the idiots, and so on—if you got those out of the way in some other institution, they would not require half so much care and attendance, not half the doctors and the paraphernalia of a hospital, and you would give the superintendent then time to devote himself with his staff to the early cases, very important, the recoverable, the acute, and the cases which would have to be detained in the asylum because they were violent or were dangerous.

12,539. Therefore your aim would be to eliminate from the asylum population those persons who are not a menace either to themselves or to the public, and for whom the special treatment which an asylum can afford would really not be beneficial?—Quite.

25 February, 1925.]

Dr. MONTAGU LOMAX, M.R.C.S.

12,540. And who have just become inhabitants, rather than patients?—That is it, blocking up the asylum, and taking up time and work which might be devoted to recoverable cases.

12,541. I think it is fairly obvious that a pretty considerable proportion of the asylum population consists of inhabitants rather than patients, that is to say, of persons who are resident there as a home?—As a workhouse too. Half of our asylums are partially workhouses.

12,542. May I just diverge to one point I was interested in in your suggestions upon that subject—it rather appealed to me. You suggest that there are many persons at present in asylums who might as well be in workhouses?—Yes.

12,543. Persons who, you will agree, are of feeble mind, but are not dangerous to themselves or to others?—What the British Medical Association in their excellent memorandum call “mentally ailing” in distinction to “mentally unsound.”

12,544. I have a certain sympathy with that class of inhabitant of the asylum, who possibly has been there a good many years, has settled down to the life of it. Do not you think there would be a certain harshness in sending that person away to a workhouse?—I do not say that they ought to be sent away to a workhouse; I say that the asylum is keeping them as if it was itself a workhouse. I say that many of these people ought to be sent to a sort of mental alms house, or a mental rest home. I think if you divided your asylums up into asylums proper, which dealt with the acute and all the cases you have spoken of, and sent those people who were not fit to go out into the world into this other kind of asylum, you might empty one into the other.

12,545. Earl Russell: An admittedly non-curative establishment?—Exactly; they would have to be past the border line. I am not speaking of those people entirely; I am speaking of people who are detained in asylums because they are useful, they are workers, and they are workers whom, perhaps, their friends do not care to have at home.

12,546. Chairman: I have a case in my mind, because I went and interviewed one myself. I was told that a particular patient was being improperly detained, and I went to the asylum and asked to see this patient myself alone, with one of my colleagues here; and this patient told me, because I think I got on to friendly terms with her, and she said she was very happy and very busy. I saw the head nurse, who said she was doing excellent work. Everybody liked this patient; she was obviously a very nice person. Equally obviously she was mentally deficient, but gave no trouble, was bright and helpful, and very competent within limits. The medical superintendent said to me “That patient can be discharged to-morrow, not recovered, but with perfect safety to herself and to the public, provided she has somebody to look after her. She is still a certifiable case, not the type of case where the disease has passed off, but a harmless certifiable case.” Have you thought of how that problem can be dealt with? We are assuming the case of a perfectly excellent person with a mental deficiency which would justify you, as a doctor, in certifying her, who does quite useful work in the institution, who has no relatives, because this unhappy person had no relatives whatsoever to go to. Why should she not remain there?—If she is not anxious to go out, I do not see any reason why on earth she should not stay there.

12,547. I said “Would you like to leave this place?”; she said “Yes, I would.” I asked “Why?” and she said “I would like to go into service and make a little money for myself.” I said “Suppose now I got you out to-morrow, where would you go?” Her face fell absolutely; she said “I do not know; where would you send me?” I said “If you start life again as a citizen you will have to make your way in the world.” A complete blank supervened. What is one to do with that class of case, because it would be cruelty to send that class of case into an unsheltered world?—That class of case ought to go into a half-way house first. In my scheme I have a number of proposals; the mental observation hospital, which is a half-way house in ought also to have accommodation as a half-way house out, and those ought to be associated with After-Care Associations. Lots of these people can be sent out into the world far more safely than you think. It is done every day. I know a lady in the reform movement who took such a patient out of an asylum, who says that for the last four or five years she has been the best worker she has ever had.

12,548. I quite understand that if you could get a philanthropic person whom you could trust to take a patient of that type, who is a properly certifiable case but not dangerous at all, and really within limits quite a well doing person, and if she were taken as a domestic servant, she would probably do quite well under supervision by a kindly mistress; but there is a terrible menace to that class of person if they fall into the hands of unscrupulous people who would overwork them or exploit them?—I quite agree.

12,549. I am very apprehensive of that sort of thing?—I quite agree, but I do not think we are thinking of the same class of patient. The class of patient I mean is the class of patient who is not certifiable.

12,550. But then that class of patient cannot be kept in an asylum?—But they often are.

12,551. But they ought not to be?—That is the great point.

12,552. Sir David Drummond: Do you regard that case which the Chairman has just detailed, as certifiable at the time that he saw her, as far as you can judge from the Chairman's statement to you?—I do not know, I have not seen her.

12,553. You have heard the statement that she was harmless and was doing good work, I ask the question because we have had it before us. At the moment the patient may have recovered so far that she is not certifiable and must be discharged, that is the difficulty?—The difficulty depends upon how you are going to define certifiability. I say that patients should never be certifiable if they are not a danger to themselves or to others, if they are capable of earning their living outside, if they have got friends who are able to look after them, not able and willing but able—they may not be willing; that sort of patient should not be kept in an asylum unless she asks to be kept.

12,554. Earl Russell: Do you suggest that a patient in that condition should be sent out to friends who are not willing to look after her, and who may ill-treat her after she is out?—But she is infinitely worse treated inside. She will have freedom outside. Give the patient the opportunity of going home, or outside anywhere.

12,555. It is a little like the freedom given to a southern nigger immediately after the emancipation?—As I have said over and over again, it would not be half so bad if those patients who are kept in the asylums as workers, who are not quite normal, were paid as workers. They are not paid; they are unpaid workers. The asylum takes advantage of the fact that they are certified, that they have got control over them, and that these people's friends do not care to have them at home; and they employ them without paying them, and class them still as certifiable lunatics. That I think is against every principle of right and justice.

12,556. Chairman: Of course, as a lawyer, I appreciate this, that no person who is not certifiable is legally detainable in an asylum for a single moment. The whole problem, as you point out, is at what moment do you pass from a state when you are properly certifiable into a state when you have ceased to be properly certifiable. If you could define that you would have solved the most difficult problem in insanity, and I am not sure that even you can do it?—I have never tried. As I say the British Medical Association have defined it rather well when they have defined people as "mentally ailing" and "mentally unsound," and I say the only definition of sanity which I am able to give is mental health. The word "sanus" means healthy, whether it is health of body or mind, the Latin word is the same. There is every degree of mental health which all of us experience but when you get certifiable insanity the legal definition of a certifiable person is a person who is dangerous to himself or to others, and the Acts have added to that: "unable to manage his own affairs." But when you get a person who is able to manage his own affairs, and whom it is perfectly safe to discharge on account of himself and other people, it strikes me that that sort of person is not certifiable, and ought not to be detained. Because his friends are unable or do not care to have him because he is a nuisance and a bother, you ought not to keep him for the rest of his life in an asylum. If you do, you are treating the asylum as partly a workhouse.

12,557. We have a little anticipated some of the matters that come later on, because the topic we have trenched on now is an exceedingly interesting one. I think you may take it that we have your view now about the medical superintendent?—May I ask if you have read the report of the Conference?

12,558. I am obliged to you for reminding me of that. Have you got the whole report?—Yes. May I read a couple of sentences out of that?

12,559. Mr. Micklem: Is it the Conference of the medical superintendents?—Yes.

12,560. What is the report?—It is the report of the proceedings of the Conference of Medical Superintendents and Chairmen of Visiting Committees, held under Sir Frederick Willis.

12,561. Chairman: I beg your pardon, I have had this, and I have read it.—And you have seen the most interesting statements?

12,562. Yes. Will you refer us to the paragraph?—If I may read what I have put down here: "Perhaps the most damaging admission of the results in combining these two offices in the same hands was made by Dr. Archdale, the Medical Superintendent of the Cambridgeshire County Mental Hospital. In his address he says: 'Is this criticism that the medical superintendent becomes changed from a physician into a mixture of prison governor and hotel manager a just one? In my opinion it is perfectly just in the majority of cases to a considerable extent. The majority of us find that the claims of administration are so many and so insistent that we are compelled to leave the principal share of medical treatment to our colleague or colleagues, and tend to become rusty in our medical knowledge . . . I take it that we are all agreed that this waste of medical talent goes on, and that it is deplorable on account both of its immediate effect on the treatment of patients and of its remote effect on the progress of our branch of medicine.' " I say that that is rather an important statement.

12,563. That is at pages 48 and 49 of the report?—Then Dr. Archdale goes on to say; "If the medical superintendent were to confine his attention to purely medical matters he would soon be almost forgotten by the committee and would very soon lose his control over the hospital. At present it is the non-medical matters which chiefly interest visiting committees." The very point which I made in my book is stated in the Conference there: "Sir Marriott Cooke, also a member of the Board of Control, agreed that the evils resulting from this medical dual control 'do no doubt occur. . . . To not a few medical superintendents the general administration of their asylums present special attractions, particularly when they find that the ability they display in that connection redounds greatly to their credit, so gradually they get more and more into the way of dealing in detail with matters which ought not to devolve upon them, but should be left to their lay officers, with a consequence that much of their energy and time are alienated from their purely medical work, and particularly the individual treatment of their patients, which was the primary object of their appointment.' " Then Dr. Barham says exactly the same.

12,564. Do not omit the last sentence. Sir Marriott Cooke concludes with this: "If a medical superintendent will only deal with the really more important administrative matters and leave the rest to his subordinates, I am sure that it is quite possible for him to be the 'captain of the ship,' and yet to discharge his medical duties fully and satisfactorily." That is again just the question of the demarcation between what is really important in the detail work and what is not?—Quite, and the personality of the superintendent, the individual character of the superintendent.

12,565. Earl Russell: In that extract you read you see it is at the will of the medical superintendent whether he gives too much time to this, instead of delegating it to the people he ought to delegate it to?—Exactly. Dr. Barham says, in his statement, he can do as much or as little work as he likes; but he cannot do as much if he has to do all this other work as well.

12,566. But this deliberately says they make a choice. Unless you actually take away from them the power of supervision, I do not see how you can prevent their making that wrong choice?—They admit that.

12,568. A scientific man may be an extraordinarily bad manager, but may be fascinated with his problems and make great strides in his science. On the other hand, you may have a man who is an extraordinarily good bookkeeper but not a scientific man at all?—Yes. A superintendent I know quite well confessed to me that the reason he had taken to asylum work was because he was fond of cricket. He said he had come in, he had been advised by the staff as a young man to come in, because he would get such heaps of cricket. He did; he got a heap of cricket. In time he became a superintendent, and he was not at all a bad superintendent. I have been all over his asylum; he was a very good type of asylum superintendent. He was an excellent judge of stock and farming and of crops. He would have made a splendid farmer, but he confessed to me frankly he had forgotten everything he had ever known about psychiatrics, and yet that man had a supreme and autocratic control of asylums holding 3,000 people. He was far to be preferred to an asylum superintendent who keeps in his office all the time. He used to go into his wards and he knew his patients, and they were fond of him, but as regards his particular science of medicine he had not looked at it.

12,569. You want to create a breed of medical superintendents who are endowed with qualities which you will only find in a superman?—No, I do not think so. All you want is a medical superintendent who is primarily interested in his work and nothing else, and you will never get all these abuses rectified until the superintendent is constantly to be seen in his wards, who can be seen at unexpected times, and patients know he can be got at and is accessible. At present he lives in a sort of Olympian calm, which he hardly ever leaves to come into his wards at all. I am speaking of some, not all.

12,570. Sir David Drummond: Have you contemplated the appointment of a medical man, not an alienist, as the executive officer?—I think it would be an excellent thing if he were appointed as an executive officer alone.

12,571. I mean that?—Quite. You see we want the medical superintendent of the patients to be absolutely interested in his work.

12,572. It obtains in Edinburgh?—You cannot imagine the enormous influence the superintendent would have over the patients and over the recovery rate of the asylum if he devoted his whole time and the time of his staff to it.

25 February, 1925.]

Dr. MONTAGU LOMAX, M.R.C.S.

12,573. Chairman: Just on that point we have heard a good deal of the possibility of medical superintendents possessing special qualifications in the matter of psychiatrics. Are you in favour of that in the sense of having alienists as medical superintendents, rather than having competent general practitioners as medical superintendents?—No; I think the medical superintendent must be a specialist.

12,574. Sir David Drummond: I was not referring to the post of superintendent?—No, you suggested a medical man to be the executive officer.

12,575. As at the Edinburgh Royal Infirmary?—An excellent idea, if you got the right type of man.

Earl Russell: Of course with his medical training he would appreciate more readily the reasons why the medical superintendent wanted things done.

Sir David Drummond: Quite, that is what I have always felt.

12,576. Earl Russell: I would like to ask you a question about your suggestion that he would have a great influence on his recovery rate. It has been suggested to us that recovery is rather in the hands of God than in the hands of the medical superintendent?—It is, I am quite sure, in the hands of God, much more than in the hands of the medical superintendent. At the same time, if a patient felt that the superintendent was personally interested in him there is the element of hope that enters into it, the element of feeling that he is not an item, that he is not a number, and that he can get to the superintendent personally and make a friend of him. There are very few superintendents of that type, there are some; I have known splendid instances. There was a splendid man at Portsmouth, Dr. Mumby, I think he was, who died some time ago, he was a splendid instance of such a man. The difference in the asylum when that man came there, and after he died, was enormous, showing what the personal influence of a superintendent may be. Not only that, but it stimulates the staff to take an interest in their work.

12,577. Chairman: I think one can appreciate that very fully, but is not it the same in this profession just as in every other profession. Take the general practitioner. You know there are some doctors who are sympathetic and encouraging; others, on the other hand, are rather repellant and distressing. You cannot create dispositions and aptitudes to order. What we have to think of is rather a drier problem; it relates to the machinery. I have been thinking, while you have been talking, of the directions in which your ideals could be brought to fulfilment. Let us see where we are practically. Is it your suggestion that the selection, first of all, of the medical superintendent is a matter of very great importance?—Very great importance.

12,578. And do I understand that you propose that the selection should not be exclusively, as it is at present, in the hands of the visiting committee?—I do.

12,579. There are various expedients suggested; one is that there might be an advisory committee of the Ministry of Health, or of the Board of Control, which would assist visiting committees in obtaining appropriate officers?—Yes.

12,580. That would be in the direction of what you wish?—Quite.

12,581. Then next, you propose that persons should not be eligible for those offices unless they have shown special aptitude for this branch of science, unless they have obtained some qualification in medico-psychological science?—Certainly.

12,582. Let us follow it out further. Do I take it that you would advocate a greater security of tenure and independence of position of the medical superintendent vis-à-vis his visiting committee?—I think I should, yes.

12,583. Then it seems to me that we have brought it now to the point of the definition of his duties. You advocate that he should be relieved as far as possible of merely executive work, so that he may be able to devote himself to all aspects of his purely medical work?—Yes.

12,584. I suggest to you that if there are appointed to his staff responsible subordinates who would have charge of the commissariat and of the farm and different departments, responsible charge of them, and the duty of making the necessary returns and accounts that have to be prepared, and so on, it would not be necessary to remove him from the position of supreme authority or ultimate court of appeal in his asylum; but you would accomplish what you desire by relieving his mind of a lot of trivialities and routine work which impede at the moment the performance of his real duty, which is the study and care of his patients?—Yes.

12,585. I do not know if one can express it more accurately than that?—No, I do not think one can.

12,586. Now we may pass to the next topic, which is in one sense not less important, and that is the question of the medical staff. Of course in the matter of the medical work of an asylum there must be a considerable amount of delegation, must there not?—Yes.

12,587. And the medical officer, in contradistinction to the medical superintendent, must have the immediate medical care of his own patients?—Quite.

12,588. Have you any observation to make as to the adequacy of the existing medical staffs in our asylums?—Yes, I have.

12,589. I rather gathered from your book that many of the asylums, in your view, are understaffed?—Certainly, they are.

12,590. We have had evidence from various eminent medical superintendents here to the same effect. I am afraid this is a matter of money, is it not?—Yes, I am afraid it is, and also a want of dividing up the work. It is largely a question of classification again. If you have got cases classified like acute and chronic cases you could well put 50 acute under one man and 200 chronic, and if you did that I do not think the man would be overworked at all; but when you give him, as he often has, 400 or 500 mixed up of all kinds, he cannot possibly do the work—not properly.

12,591. I think it stands to reason that if you have an institution, let us say, of 3,000, with a medical superintendent and possibly only 6 or 7 medical officers under him, each medical officer will have 500 patients. Of course it is manifestly impossible?—Absolutely impossible.

12,592. But you suggest that if there was a system of allocation, the medical officer could have under his particular charge a certain number of chronic cases who would really require little more than a kindly nod once a day?—That is so.

12,593. And have at the same time allocated to him a number of cases, recovering cases, which he could quite well overtake?—Quite.

12,594. How many do you think a medical officer could reasonably have under his charge of cases that really required attention?—It depends upon the zeal of the man, but he could have—I think 50 is enough of recoverable and acute cases, because he has a lot of clerical work to do, and the clerical work takes up hours of his time, if it is really well done. It very seldom is well done; I know I used to scamp mine over and over again. You cannot find the time. He has case books to fill up, and that takes a tremendous time if he goes into the cases carefully; if he gives individual attention to his cases, his case book will take up a large part of his time.

12,595. Earl Russell: Would he on the average want to make more than one or two entries a day in the case book?—No, one a day would be ample.

12,596. I mean for each patient, for the whole 50 patients?—According to the rules you only have to make one a week in the first stages, and then one a month, and then one in three months.

12,597. I mean what is the total number of entries in the case book which he has to make in a day?—It depends upon what sorts of things happen. There may be accidents and illnesses happen, and so on,

25 February, 1925.]

Dr. MONTAGU LOMAX, M.R.C.S.

but he has to make a great number of them which are simply repeated week after week, month after month, chronic cases; they do not require anything particular to be said about them.

12,598. Chairman: I am thinking of the clinical treatment of the patients. You say that the medical officer, like the medical superintendent, has a good deal of clerical work to do which is liable to divert his energies, but assuming he keeps adequate records how many patients do you think he would be able to look after clinically?—Fifty at the most, I think.

12,599. And even so he would be pretty busy, would he not?—Yes, he would.

12,600. It would fluctuate, obviously?—Obviously.

12,601. But he might have allocated to him 50 cases requiring real attention?—Yes.

12,602. And I rather gathered you said he could also have a couple of hundred of more or less chronic cases?—Yes.

12,603. From that I infer that you think a medical officer would not be overburdened if he had 250 cases under his hand.

Mrs. Mathew: Assorted cases.

12,604. Chairman: Duly assorted cases on that basis, 50 requiring attention, and 200 really not requiring any special attention?—He is given wards with all sorts of cases in them, and he gets only those wards to look after. It limits his work largely. He may not have anything to do in the hospital wards at all for years and years. He may not have anything to do on the female side—he may be kept on the male side.

12,605. Apropos of that, it would be a disadvantage, of course, for a medical officer to be confined to one section of an asylum, or to one class of patient, because his experience would be narrowed thereby?—Yes.

12,606. You have to reconcile classification on the one hand with the medical officer's opportunities of training on the other hand. Probably that is reconciled in this way, by having your classification, and by having your medical officers moved from department to department, so that at each period they will have had experience of the different types of patients?—Yes.

12,607. The medical officer should for a time be in the reception ward seeing all classes of cases. Then he might perhaps be in the acute wards, and then he might be in the chronic wards, in that way passing through the institution acquiring experience in each department?—Quite.

12,608. The one medical officer could not very well have at one and the same time 50 acute cases or 50 cases requiring attention and 200 chronic cases, because they would be in different departments of the institution?—Still he could see them for all that.

12,609. Sir David Drummond: What about the patients in the hospital. Supposing there are a number of cases of bronchitis and pneumonia—those would take part of his time?—Quite; I do not think as a rule he has anything to do with those. I think he ought to have; I think he ought to attend to his own cases.

12,610. Who attends to these hospital cases?—It is put under the charge of a special man who has his other work as well. That is my experience. I do not know what the experience of other asylums is, but the hospital at Prestwich, for instance, is put under the charge of one man only. I had not care of the hospital at all except when I was taking duty for my senior colleague. He had the charge of them; I had not anything to do with them, and I had no responsibility over them, which I ought to have had. I should strongly recommend that a medical officer, who has cases requiring hospital treatment under his care, cases that he sends to the hospital, should retain them under his care while they are in the hospital itself, in order that he may follow them up and may study them there. He sends them now, I believe, in the majority of asylums. I do not know that; I am only speaking of my experience of these two institutions.

12,611. Chairman: I think we may pass now to the question of the visiting committees. These are statutory bodies, as you know, supposed to represent the local authority who are the administrators of the institutions?—Yes.

12,612. And the statute imposes certain duties of visitation upon them?—Yes.

12,613. Now have you any practical suggestions to make for the improvement of their supervision?—Yes, I have got a good number, if they were practicable, but I do not see how an outside doctor can dictate to a visiting committee as to what they ought to do. Some of the regulations by statute seem to me absurd; that statement in the Act that each member or two members of the committee have every two months to inspect and visit every part of an asylum and speak to every patient in it. That is ridiculous, I mean to say it cannot be done.

12,614. Earl Russell: Does it say speak to every patient in it?—See every patient; I do not think it says speak to every patient.

12,615. Chairman: There are two senses of the word "see" you know?—Quite. If they inspected every part of the asylum I certainly think that that should come within their duty, and that their inspections should be less formal than they are; should be unannounced, and should be unaccompanied whenever possible. As a rule the visiting committees just hurry through the wards with an attendant in charge and say a few words to anyone who chooses to stick to them. Very few patients ever do. They regard the whole thing as an absolute farce. That, I think, every attendant will tell you, and I think Mr. Gibson would tell you that most of the members of his Union regard the visits as a farce too.

12,616. Earl Russell: It is not my experience. I have been on a visiting committee for a great number of years, and the patients, on the contrary, flock round when you go in?—It just depends upon the visitors. If you show yourself interested and kindly disposed they will flock round you, but the visitors I have seen, as a rule, are only too anxious to get out of the wards as soon as they can; they regard it just as a routine affair. I do not see how one can say anything more.

12,617. Mr. Micklem: That was not quite the view taken by Mr. Gibson yesterday, and by the evidence we had?—I did not hear it, but I could quote you page after page from the Asylum Workers' Union paper in which they express the sentiments which I have about these visits.

12,618. The two nurses and Mr. Gibson did not quite take that view; they seemed to think that the visiting committee did extremely good work, and that they were effective in communicating with the patients, and so on?—Well, I am afraid that is a view I cannot speak to from experience. How can I? It is only what I have been told. You will find every patient practically without exception—I have interviewed hundreds and seen letters probably from thousands—who will tell you exactly the opposite, that they could never get the asylum committees to interest themselves in them at all except in the most perfunctory way. I know how difficult it is for laymen to interview what are called insane people, and to take the views they do.

12,619. Earl Russell: It is not so much the interviewing that is difficult, but when all the patients ask you that they may be let out it is quite obvious laymen cannot very effectively intervene?—Quite impossible.

12,620. Chairman: You see it is not much use criticising institutions which, after all, are human and fallible, unless you can suggest some method of improving them?—Quite.

12,621. We are always thinking of it from the practical point of view. We recognise that these institutions, like other institutions, must exhibit defects of various kinds, and some very pronounced ones; and we are specially concerned to see that these are, if possible, removed. Now I appreciate at once, and we have had a good deal of evidence about it, that the way in which visiting committees discharge their functions must vary infinitely, vary with the dispositions of the visitors. Some people will take a special interest in that class of work, and others will be quite perfunctory, as you say, and glad to get out of it as quickly as possible. They may have a distaste for asylum visiting?—Quite.

12,622. It is very difficult to legislate for that sort of thing?—Very.

12,623. When you have provided that persons shall be selected to do this and that they shall discharge certain duties, from the legal point of view one has almost done all that can be done. One cannot compel a man to be kindly by Act of Parliament?—Quite.

12,624. I would like very much to have some suggestions, if you could help us with any, as to the improvement of this visiting system, because one appreciates that that is one of the points of contact between the asylum inmates and the public?—And the outside world.

12,625. Which, as you say, enables a patient to feel that he is not cut off, but is still in touch with the world outside?—Yes.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Would you consider this question to be put to the witness on this point; would it be desirable that the special attention of the visiting committee, of the visitors, should be directed to that border line class which is a limited one, so that they may be brought into contact with the people whom they could usefully interview.

12,626. Chairman: Yes. (To the witness): Dr. Lomax, what do you say about that suggestion? The visitation, of course, of certain classes of cases must necessarily be more or less a formality. On the other hand, the cases that give all the trouble and cause all the agitation are the cases as to which there is a question—the borderland cases. Something might be done in the way of directing the visiting committee to have special regard to such cases on the occasion of their visits, as Mr. Stewart suggests?—That is what I have suggested over and over again in articles and speeches, that the visiting committee should set aside a certain time at each of their monthly visitations to hear reports of cases of patients, to hear complaints of patients, to sit as a sort of small appeal court. If they did that, if the patients felt they could get at them they would write to them. The result at present is practically nil. We could give you evidence of thousands and thousands of letters which patients have written to visiting committees which are merely waste paper. If you could get committees to agree to sit for a certain time, say an hour each month, in which time they would personally hear any complaints of patients, and have a room set apart in which they could do it, and not be afraid to do it, the complaints would be dealt with. Half of these people are afraid of the patients.

12,627. Earl Russell: An hour would be no use in a big asylum?—It depends. The patients would have to be sifted, no doubt. I mean to say, the medical officer would sift them.

12,628. Chairman: That is the trouble again; we always come back to the responsibility of the medical officer. You would have to have the cases for the visiting committee selected?—You would.

12,629. And I feel again that we are getting into the circle if I may so put it?—You cannot get out of it.

12,630. You have at the end of the day to recognise that, because, of course, there must be a great many people who write the type of letter you mention, in whose case an interview would be idle?—Absolutely useless, a waste of time.

12,631. And probably they would be asking for an interview every time, to the detriment of cases where an interview would be greatly beneficial?—Certainly.

12,632. And giving the visiting committee just that feeling, that there is no use in going to see these cases because they are just people full of delusions, and so on, with the result that the thing becomes routine, and real cases are apt not to be considered?

—I am not speaking so much of the patients that apply to the visiting committee to be discharged; I am speaking of patients that apply to them and could and would apply on account of ill-treatment. The visiting committee would say to any patient who applied to them for discharge "That is the affair of the superintendent; you must apply to him." But I think there ought to be some appeal court to which patients could take complaints against ill-treatment by attendants, if they could.

12,633. And you think the visiting committee would do that work?—I think they are there to attend to that sort of thing.

12,634. Earl Russell: Do the patients not make those complaints to the medical superintendent?—Very seldom; they do sometimes.

12,635. Because, of course, if they do, it is his duty to report them to the committee?—Of course it is, but you find that very few complaints are made to doctors—very few indeed.

12,636. Chairman: I was rather struck with this general observation in your book. You say this on page 16: "No one can study the Lunacy Acts of 1890 and 1891, and the Mental Deficiency Act of 1913, without realising the pains taken by the legislature to safeguard the interest of lunatics and imbeciles, and to provide for their wise and humane treatment in our public asylums; but no one, with any practical knowledge of lunacy and the problems of psychiatrics, can fail to realise also that these objects have been insufficiently considered and imperfectly attained in these Acts." The effort is there, and the code is more or less elaborate. We have a special concern to see in what respect the code has proved inefficient, and we are always looking at it practically, you will appreciate. What are the suggestions from your point of view as to the visiting committee and its present deficiencies? What are we to do? Suppose you were sitting in my place just now thinking it out with the responsibility attaching to any such suggestions, what would you suggest as a means of improving the utility of visiting committees as a safeguard to inmates of asylums?—Well, if I might say so—it sounds rather queer—I should abolish the committee's dinner, in the first instance. It sounds rather immaterial, but I mean to say that that is such a feature of the visit that it seems to take up all the time. It is not only uneconomical, but it means that you have good wine and spirits and cigars, and liqueurs, and that sort of thing; they used to do; and then, if they have anybody to see afterwards—well, you know what happens after a good lunch.

12,637. I take it from you, Dr. Lomax?—I take it from my experience of visiting committees.

12,638. Earl Russell: How long did this dinner last, in your experience?—It lasted as a rule an hour to an hour and a half.

12,639. If you go to an asylum in a remote part of the country, and you propose to stay there from 11 to 3, or from 11 to 5, you must have something to eat and drink?—Of course; but as a rule asylums are not so remote as all that.

12,640. A good many I have experience of are remote?—Some are, it is quite true, and you must have something to eat, but my experience of the asylums which I was in was that the dinner was the chief function of the visiting committee, and that it took up time which might have been usefully employed in visiting the patients.

12,641. Of course, as you know, on the London County Council we were always virtuous, and it only took up an hour, and during that hour we did discuss matters connected with the asylum. The medical superintendent was with us. It was not altogether wasted.

12,642. Chairman: Perhaps if the visiting committee shared the patients' lunch it would be an improvement?—It would be a great improvement.

12,643. Earl Russell: It might diminish their numbers?—I have a suggestion here from a chaplain of one of the large asylums in the country who is quite prepared to come and give evidence if he is asked. Chaplains are people who see a good deal of the inside of asylum life, and they can be of great use. He is speaking of the committee. I am afraid he is not very pleased with his own. He said "The first step, I am convinced, should be the abolition of the visiting committee as at present constituted. They should cease to pretend to control, for it is the superintendent who does that, and these hospitals should be controlled as prisons and work-houses are by the Ministry of Health." We come back again always to the sources from which these people are appointed.

Dr. MONTAGU LOMAX, M.R.C.S.

12,644. I did not know that prisons were under the Ministry of Health?—No, no, he does not mean that; he says that, but he cannot mean it.

12,645. Nor are workhouses controlled by the Ministry of Health?—Quite so, but what he means is that he wants the visiting committees to be appointed by some central Department.

12,646. Chairman: Yes, but you observe we have both these things. The Act is an attempt at least to combine two things. It is an attempt to combine the local interests in the institution, by having a visiting committee appointed by the local authority, with supervision from headquarters through the medium of the Board of Control, so that the Act, whether it achieves its purpose or not, contemplates both local and central control by visitation?—Quite.

12,647. General suggestions to abolish visiting committees do not help one very much?—Not a bit, but the question is: How much control the Board of Control has over these asylum boards? It practically has none at all.

12,648. I am coming to that. I think there is obviously room for considerable extensions of the powers of the Board of Control. That is a matter upon which we have had much unanimous evidence, but for the moment we are on the question of the visiting committee. We have this body set up whose duty it is to visit, and it is only proper that there should be such a body, because they represent the ratepayers of the district who pay for the institution?—Yes. How are you to compel them to fulfil their duties?

12,649. Exactly?—A lady member of one of the large asylum committees wrote to me, and asked me if she could come and give evidence here. She was prepared to give some very important evidence about the difficulties she underwent on her committee. She was the only lady member on the committee, and she wanted to go through the wards on her own account, and to visit independently, to do what she was elected to do. She was told that that was out of the question; she was not appointed to do anything of the kind; she was only appointed to do what people on her committee thought the proper thing to do; that was to come to the lunch and have a talk and stroll round and go home again. She extremely resented that. She said she had been appointed to visit, and she would be glad to be able to do it, and she was told by a legal member of her board that she was not appointed to do anything of the kind. She was appointed to do it in the way they thought it should be done—not in her way.

12,650. I do not quite understand the source of that legal advice?—No. It was a legal member of her own board who told her that.

12,651. She should have just taken her own way and said, "I insist upon exercising my rights"?—She did, I believe, and she was most unpopular.

12,652. Hampden was unpopular; the reformer is always unpopular?—How are you to force the visiting committee to fulfil their duty?

12,653. If you can tell us how to do that you will have accomplished a very valuable thing?—Precisely.

12,654. Earl Russell: I think visiting committees are not compelled to visit the asylum more than once in two months?—That is so.

12,655. What do you say to making the visits, at any rate, monthly, and preferably fortnightly, for the purposes of discharge?—I do not think it would work.

12,656. It would not help?—It would help, but I do not think you would get those people to go on these committees. They have got a heap of things of their own to do.

12,657. Once a month is twelve times a year. In London you get committees to go once a fortnight, and people have more to do in London than in other places?—If you can succeed in doing that in the towns and in the country I think you will do very well.

12,658. Obviously it gives them more time to do the various things they should do, including the visiting?—Obviously.

12,659. Chairman: That is a suggestion; but it seems to me we are left with not much practical assistance beyond this: that you would like some provision made for the visiting committee to sit in the asylum at intervals for the purpose of hearing complaints by patients, and hearing them under circumstances favourable to the patients, and favourable to the investigation of the case?—Quite.

12,660. Earl Russell: There is one other suggestion that occurs to me. I have been looking at the section—it is not very clear. I do not know whether they have power to co-opt members outside the local authority at present, but that might be a useful power, might it not?—Yes, I think that power has been suggested in Lord Onslow's Bill.

12,661. To bring in a person who might not be a borough councillor, and yet might be an extremely useful asylum visitor?—Most useful. It is one of the things that would be most valuable, because we want to co-opt people on these committees who are willing to do a lot of voluntary work.

12,662. Chairman: You might in that way get some women visitors who did not care for ordinary municipal work, ordinary county council work and all that that means, but who were genuinely interested in this class of work?—Quite.

Mrs. Mathew: I think we already have them in London, Mr. Chairman.

Earl Russell: It might very well be that a person did not care to stand for elections.

Chairman: Dr. Lomax is just referring to what is already provided for in the local legislation for London, and Mrs. Mathew points out it exists in London. I was not aware of it.

Mr. Snell: We co-opt on the County Council every year.

Earl Russell: I should be glad to get that section on the notes if there is something in the private Act.

Chairman: The explanation of it is to be found under the Mental Deficiency Act. The Mental Deficiency Committee coopts, but in London the Mental Deficiency Committee is also the Asylums Committee, and, thus, you get the benefit of the coopted members. Now that is another suggestion which is valuable. Beyond that I am afraid you cannot do very much except to exhort people to do their duty.

Mr. Walter Stewart: There is already Section 204, the special visit in certain cases, to be entered on the minutes of the board, but that is only where there is a case requiring immediate investigation.

Chairman: Yes. Is not that a special visit of the Commissioners?

Earl Russell: This is the Board of Control.

Chairman: We are dealing for the moment with the visiting committee.

Mr. Walter Stewart: I beg your pardon.

Chairman: I see in London on the Mental Hospitals Committee there are five ladies who have been coopted at the present moment out of a total of ten coopted members. Five men and five women.

Witness: Would it be possible to embody in any recommendations on the subject that the visits of the committee should be much more informal and unexpected than they are, because they are known all about beforehand. It is like the inspections of the Board of Control; they are known all about beforehand and are prepared for. We know that they come as a rule at lunch time, at least on the occasions of the lunch. In cases where these people go unexpectedly they often see the most extraordinary things, as you will remember in the case of Mrs. Hatfield at Hull. She was a member of her Asylum Committee under the Town Council; she called at 7 a.m. in the morning.

Earl Russell: But you see this is not primarily an inspecting body; it is a visiting body, and therefore it must come on some day when it is expected.

Mr. Micklem: Is that quite so under the Act?

Earl Russell: You mean would they have power to inspect?

Mr. Micklem: Yes.

Earl Russell: I suppose the ordinary medical superintendent might keep them out if he chose, but I should hardly imagine he would be so foolish.

12,663. Mr. Micklem: The provision under the Act seems to be to visit as an official committee, so that such an individual lady as you were referring to just now was probably well advised?—I do not think any law exists which can prevent anybody on those boards going at any time they like.

12,664. I think their own committee could prevent it, could it not?—I do not know.

Chairman: I should have thought that, whatever the law says, that should be made plain. A member of the visiting committee should have access at all times of the day or night, alone or in company with his colleagues, to any part of his institution.

12,665. Mr. Micklem: There is no provision of that kind in the Acts at the present time?—When Mrs. Hatfield of Hull went, she went at 7 o'clock in the morning, and the asylum people were not able to refuse her entry, but they kept her for about half an hour in a side room while they made some sort of preparations; but still she told me herself she did go, and she saw all the things she reported.

12,666. Chairman: That is rather inconsistent with your suggestion that medical superintendents and staffs are so concerned with conciliating the visitors?—Well, you do not get that type of visitor as a rule; it is the first I have ever heard of.

12,667. Earl Russell: That might be a method of conciliating a majority of the visitors?—That is one of the chief reasons for having women on these asylum committees. That is one of the things I make rather a point of in my book, and which has since been carried out to a large extent. I should make it imperative that on all committees you should have at least a couple of women, because, as a rule, they see farther through a door than a man does. They are much more interested in detail than a man is, and they are not to be put off by excuses as a man is. Mrs. Hatfield was not to be put off, and she was not put off, although she had a very bad time; she was a very courageous woman. She said that the result of that investigation was perfectly extraordinary in the asylum at once: the bathing was improved at once, the clothing was improved at once, and the food was improved at once, all on account of this one woman going at 7 o'clock in the morning before the asylum was up, so to speak.

Earl Russell: Of course it is always the nonconformist, the tiresome person, who gets things done.

12,668. Chairman: We have your point there. Now let us pass on to the question of the nurses, or attendants. We had the benefit yesterday of the evidence of Mr. Gibson and of those with him on the question of the nurses and attendants, and we have also heard a good deal from Mr. Parker on that subject. Do you think you can tell us, in more or less summary form, whether you have any addition to make to the suggestions that have emanated from these previous witnesses?—Yes, I have a few suggestions to make. I have not very much to add to what Mr. Gibson said yesterday, with which I entirely agree so far as I can from an outside standpoint, especially about the 48-hour week and the absolute necessity of taking more pains with the nursing. What I wanted to say was that I do not at all share the opinion which has been expressed by a number of witnesses as to the great importance of these certificates for nursing. The examination standard of the nurses strikes me as being far too difficult; the subjects are too various and advanced for the ordinary nurse. I do not think she requires to know all the things that are in the schedule there. I think the hospital nurse does; but that examination there is rather stiff for the ordinary mental nurse; I do not think she wants to know half so much. I do not take the view that the certificated or badged nurse is any more useful than the uncertificated nurse, provided she has the nursing capacity, provided she has plenty of the milk of human kindness, for the recovery of the patients. The people with the badges, as a rule, think themselves very important people. A number of them, I am told, especially among the men, are rather ashamed of the badge; they know what the value of the examination is. I think if some of the doctors knew how the examinations took place, and how the nurses' papers were passed, they themselves would be rather surprised at the facility with which the examinations were passed.

12,669. Look where we get; first of all, there is the agitation that nurses should be properly trained and competent and should have some standard of efficiency. Thereupon Parliament passes an Act, and a standard is set up, and a method of examination is instituted. No sooner is that done than it is said, "Oh, well, examination is not the test for ascertaining real nursing vocation." It is just what happens so often. A remedy is suggested, and the remedy is put in operation, and then the remedy itself becomes in turn the target of criticism?—Quite. I am quite sure of this, that in asylum nursing the experience of the people who have been at it longest is not that the people with the certificates make the best nurses from the patients' point of view.

12,670. I can well believe that?—The passing of the examination in itself deters a number of would-be excellent nurses from ever coming into the service at all; they come in for a short time and they drift out. I do not think Mr. Gibson emphasised, and I do not think perhaps the members of the Commission sufficiently realise, the enormous floating population of nurses there is.

12,671. We have had statistics about that; it is most remarkable, in the case of women particularly?—I know, but some nurses do not stop for more than two days, or sometimes for a week. When in the mental hospitals, the nurses are in some cases compelled to pass examinations; but it does not touch an enormous number of this floating population who never approach within any reasonable degree of any examination or certificate at all. They have gone out of the asylum in three months, and have done perhaps infinite harm to patients in their passage. They are not touched by any of this, so that any percentages you get of nurses who have taken badges do not represent the number of nurses who have passed through the asylums in question.

12,672. As you point out, it is those birds of passage who may do the most harm while they are there, because they are inexperienced, and while they are there they will cause a great deal of unhappiness and possibly ill-treatment to the patients under their hands. How are you to stop that, because, after all, everybody must begin a profession?—Yes, I know; but I think mental nursing ought to be put on the basis of hospital nursing, and that nurses who come as probationers ought to contract to stay, say, for a year or two, as hospital nurses have to do. That would enable them to take it up in a much more serious way. Of course there ought to be a great deal more supervision over the character of nurses engaged. The nurses are engaged chiefly by advertisements in the papers, and you find often and often in these advertisements, "No experience required." You often get a class of nurse, both male and female, which is most undesirable, a class that comes because there is not anything better to do, a class that has no intention of staying, or a class that does not want to do any more than they can help in the time they are staying. They are not the class of nurse you get in hospitals. That in itself requires to be improved enormously, the type of nurse which asylums engage. In numbers of cases the references of these people are not taken up at all.

DR. MONTAGU LOMAX, M.R.C.S.

12,673. Let us follow it a moment. How are you to ensure a sufficient supply of persons who will take up this class of work? One has to recognise that it is work calling for peculiar qualities if it is to be properly done, great qualities of sympathy and forbearance—that class of person is limited, and not very easily obtained, and in fact you cannot tell with regard to a particular person whether they are suited to it until they have tried it.—Quite.

12,674. And you also must make the career more or less attractive if you are to get a good type of nurse. How are we to ensure that the proper class is obtained for this work?—By making the service more attractive all round, better pay and better hours of work, and better means of recreation and amusement, increasing the comfort of the nurses. Hitherto the nurses have been almost as much neglected as the patients in these asylums; they have had a very bad time indeed, not only in the war, when my own experience was gained, but both before and afterwards. I have heard accounts over and over again of asylums and of the poor accommodation which they had for nurses, the food which they had, and the hours of liberty, and so on. You heard from Mr. Gibson some of his experiences. You have got to make the asylum service more attractive. It is one of the most arduous services in the world, and one that deserves all the encouragement it can get, all the thanks of the community it can get, and you have got to make it somehow more attractive.

12,675. Sir David Drummond: Not imposing too severe difficulties in the matter of qualifying examinations?—Quite. That is a point which turns off hundreds of very good potential nurses from the career; it is not wanted. They want to know enough to take a diploma in the ambulance service, something of that kind, in the first place. They do not want to know psychology and psychiatrics, not certainly until the teachers are more agreed among themselves.

12,676. Chairman: Of course you know examinations after a time are rather apt to continue to exist for their own sake, and they also become liable to be tuned up more and more?—Quite.

12,677. The object of the examination is to ensure efficient service and to eliminate the unsuited?—Yes.

12,678. I could appreciate your point, that highly technical and theoretical knowledge may puff up the nurses with a certain feeling of pride in their own intellectual ability, but many men are most unsuited for the part of a sympathetic bedside attendant?—I am afraid it is so. Not only that, but it is the way in which the examinations and lectures are held, and in numbers of cases the lectures are often held by attendants, the head attendants, I believe. I am speaking from what I have been told; they are not only given by the doctors.

12,679. Earl Russell: Surely the head attendant ought to be able to give a very practical lecture?—He ought, and I think he is very often the better man of the two as regards the nursing, but it means this, that the head attendant has his favourites among the nurses, and if he has anything to do with the papers (and he is concerned a great deal, so I am told by the attendants themselves), the examinations are often more or less of a farce.

12,680. Mr. Micklem: Are they conducted by any central association, or are they conducted separately at each asylum?—In some instances the examinations, I believe, are in a central place.

Sir David Drummond: Centrally, I believe.

12,681. Mr. Micklem: But your suggestion rather is that at these examinations the result may depend to some extent upon the attendants?—I mean to say this; I have been told by attendants themselves that some attendants find it very easy to pass the examinations, and some find it very hard, owing to the attitude of certain parties.

Earl Russell: I want to know how the attendants do get at the papers?

Mr. Gibson: If it will assist the Commission, at the examinations I have conducted the papers were set by the central authority, the examining body of the Medico-Psychological Association. But of the two examiners one is the medical superintendent, and the other examiner is a visiting examiner sent from another institution.

Chairman: Does he bring the papers down with him?

Mr. Gibson: They are sent in advance.

Earl Russell: And who collects the papers?

Mr. Gibson: That I am not prepared to say. One of the suggestions we have had is that they ought to be allowed to make their papers up, put them in an envelope and seal them themselves.

Mr. Micklem: Who conducts the oral examination?

Mr. Gibson: Both. When I was examined, I was examined in practical work by my own medical superintendent.

Earl Russell: I rather gather that Dr. Lomax's suggestion is that the papers are tampered with after they are written.

12,682. Chairman: This is rather an alarming suggestion. I do not think your evidence on this point, if I may say so, in contradistinction to your evidence on other matters is really of value to us. It relies solely on hearsay; we cannot act upon such evidence.—Will you ask Mr. Gibson the question if the papers are always handed in to the charge of the head attendants; if he is in the room when the examination is going on; if they are handed in to him in the names of the examinees, or in numbers only?

Chairman: I suppose Mr. Gibson can only speak of his own experience; but when you were examined, Mr. Gibson, were there a number of others being examined along with you?

Mr. Gibson: There were a number of others, and each candidate was too far separated from the others to allow of any cribbing, but there is no distinguishing feature on the papers, as far as I could see.

Chairman: When you had written your paper did you hand it to the presiding examiner?

Mr. Gibson: Yes. What happened to them afterwards I cannot say.

Earl Russell: They were not collected by an attendant?

Mr. Gibson: No.

Chairman: Did you write on the paper your own name?

Mr. Gibson: No.

Chairman: How was the paper identified by your number?

Mr. Gibson: It may have been numbered. I do not remember writing anything.

12,683. Chairman: I do not know that this is really very profitable. I rather gather that so far as your own personal experience is concerned, Dr. Lomax, you have found the attendants with whom you have come in contact to be very excellent people and well fitted for their work?—No, I have not stated that. I have stated that at the time I was at Prestwich there were a number of attendants whom I thought were good at their work, but there were certainly a very large number whom I should have said were not.

12,684. I thought that you were going to pay them rather a higher tribute, because I was very much struck with a passage on page 189 of your book: "I should like to put it on record that, in my experience, the character and behaviour of the male attendants with whom I had to do, for I had little experience of the female attendants, especially of the head attendants and ward charges, left, on the whole, a distinctly favourable impression on my mind."—Yes, they did.

12,685. "They had their faults, of course, and I have not hesitated to mention such of these as, in my opinion, militated against their efficiency. But these seemed to me to be much more due to the defects of the system which they had to administer and under which they were trained, and to the monotony and dreariness of their life, with its many repulsive sights and sounds, than to any deficiency of kindness and good nature. Callous and indifferent a few of them were, while want of tact and sympathy were not infrequently met with, but I met none who were deliberately cruel or inhuman. One must speak, of course, with a certain amount of reserve in these matters, for no attendant would show actual animosity or unkindness before a medical officer, and it is the rarest occurrence for any patient to complain of an attendant." I gather your examination was of those with whom you came in contact yourself, that they were none of them cruel persons, and that they all made a favourable impression on your mind?—The charge attendants in my ward certainly did, and the head attendants, two of them at least, did, but there were a number of other attendants who did not. I am speaking guardedly there. I am very anxious not to traduce a body of men, or women either, who do such very valuable and arduous work, and who have so little encouragement from the authorities to do it well. I am very anxious not to say anything disparaging to that class of attendant.

12,686. But after all we need not flinch from the matter, and I am sure Mr. Gibson would not either. If you take any large profession you will inevitably find within it a certain number of persons who fall short of their duty?—Certainly.

12,687. The really desirable thing to achieve is to see that there are proper means taken to deal with these cases. All professions have disciplinary methods for dealing with cases. Similarly, one would wish that machinery should exist whereby undesirable attendants—because there must be such where you have such a large number of men and women engaged—can be eliminated, and the patients protected against them. Now, it is just there that one comes on to the topic of ill-treatment under the existing system without it coming to the cognisance of the proper authorities, and so being stopped by the dismissal or the warning of the attendant. That seems to be a very vital matter?—Very vital.

12,688. On that, in your experience, did you actually encounter under your own eyes any case of real ill-treatment?—By an attendant?

12,689. Yes.—No, I did not see any case, and a doctor never does; he is the last person in the world who would.

12,690. Surely not, because we have had cases in which the doctor has reported the ill-treatment himself?—It has been accidentally found out. What I mean to say is, the doctor is the last man who hears or sees anything of it. I suspected it in a few instances, but I did not see anything actually happen.

12,691. But if the doctor who is in charge of the case (I am talking of the medical officer as distinct from the medical superintendent) is hoodwinked in the matter of cruelty, that is to say, does not see it himself, how are you to get at the truth of the case?—I wish you could tell me, Sir. The difficulty is enormous, because if ill-treatment is going on he will only see the results of it, which may be explained in all sorts of ways which are not true.

12,692. Earl Russell: But which easily might be true?—In cases they might be true and might not. As a rule he hardly sees anything of it; he hardly sees the results of it. I mean, if it is very serious, if the patient is seriously injured, he is bound to know of it then, and he enquires into the cause of it, and he may be told all sorts of things—that the patient was resistive and had to be forcibly restrained, or had been fighting with some other case or that he had fallen down and injured himself. All sorts of explanations are given, and, as a rule, if the doctor asks the patient about it, the patient is very chary of saying anything at all. I am afraid I must say that he is too cowed in a number of instances to explain how it happened. In some instances perhaps he is not sufficiently intelligent, and you have got to take the attendant's word. Well, I saw, as I have said, no case in which an attendant was ever ill-treating a patient openly. I have suspected it on certain occasions, but for a doctor, as I say, it is very hard to find out what is going on. He does not see the patients stripped except when they are ill, or except the attendant asks him to see someone.

12,693. But he would see him stripped if he has any suspicions?—He would, of course; he would have him stripped.

12,694. Mr. Micklem: Did any patient ever complain to you, Dr. Lomax, of ill-treatment?—Hardly any.

12,695. Not one?—I would not say not one. I should think probably two or three may have done.

12,696. Chairman: Just tell us about those two or three. What did you do about them?—I would say "Where," and he would say perhaps "My arm has been hurt." Then I would ask the attendant how it happened. "Oh," he would say, "Well, he was rather violent, and we had to forcibly remove him to a cell."

12,697. Did you believe the attendant?—I did then, I must say.

12,698. Was there any reason to disbelieve him?—Well, at that time I had not any idea of the amount of ill-treatment which since then has reached my ears.

12,699. Mind you, we must not allow our views to be unduly coloured. When you speak of the evidence which has reached you since, do you speak of complaints that have been made to you by ex-patients after they have left institutions?—Yes.

12,700. You will agree with me that the assessment of the value of that evidence is one of the most difficult things?—No, Sir, I may not agree with you. I know that it is hard to assess, but when you have had a large experience of patients and can give your own estimate of the value of their evidence, you form your own conclusions. I do not think it is so hard as you think.

12,701. Take the case you have given us. You tell us you have had large experience. Three patients complained to you that they had been ill-treated.—I say two or three; I cannot remember the number. I asked them where and when and how and tried to find out.

12,702. You were in the best and most favourable position to discover because you were on the spot; you had the patients there and could get the patients' own statements, away from any attendants?—I could have done, but there was not anything sufficiently serious then to occupy my attention. I cannot remember really more than one or two instances in which a patient may have said to me, "My arm has been hurt," or something of that sort. I practically never saw any evidence while I was there of ill-treatment, barring these few things that happened, which I could easily account for by struggles of some kind.

12,703. I will tell you why I am pressing this a little, because I think it is very vital. You say in your treatise that you were in an asylum with regard to which you had to make very severe criticisms, and therefore we may assume it was not one of the best administered in your view; and yet in that institution during the whole period you were there, you say that you encountered no case yourself of ill-treatment, and that although you had one or two complaints from patients they related to relatively trivial matters?—That is so.

12,704. That evidence, drawn from an experience of by no means one of the best—in fact, I think you would probably say one of the worst—institutions in this country seems to me personally to be of very great countervailing value, as contrasted with evidence gathered by you from complaints and interviews of persons who have left institutions afterwards, when their stories were no longer susceptible of immediate verification as they were while you were in the institution. You see my point?—Quite, I see your point entirely. It has occurred to me over and over again. I did not at that time suspect anything happening, yet I do now. I had not the evidence before me. I may say this that a doctor never gets evidence of that kind. It is of course the rarest thing for a patient ever to complain to a doctor of ill-treatment.

Dr. MONTAGU LOMAX, M.R.C.S.

12,705. That strikes me as very odd. I should have thought if I were suffering in that way the first thing I would do would be to say, "Doctor, I have been horribly ill-treated." Why does he not?—Because of what may happen after when the doctor is gone. The patient is absolutely in the hands of the attendants, and he is afraid to say anything. He knows that if he reports them his chances of discharge are very remote.

12,706. This is a most dreadful allegation (it may be true) against attendants, that first of all they are cruel, although you have not seen any instances of it yourself, and that when they are taken to task for it by the proper authority, what they do is to persist in their attacks upon the patients?—That is the danger.

12,707. But does it occur?—I am only speaking now as the spokesman of patients who have come to me; I am speaking for people who cannot speak for themselves, hundreds and thousands of them; I mean all over the world; I mean you find it reported from every asylum in the world, and they have not a chance of getting their cases stated. I am merely giving experiences which they have related to me, and which I pass on at the value which you choose to put on them. I cannot possibly prove these things, but I have got patients to produce who can give you first-hand evidence of it.

12,708. But you may take it that I think personally, and I am sure my colleagues also are quite satisfied, that cases of cruelty, possibly cases of gross cruelty, do occur; we need not carry that matter further. It does not assist one to know how many there are and that sort of thing; but these things must occur, just as you will have railway accidents on the best administered railways. The problem that interests us most is how is that kind of thing to be stopped, or to be diminished as far as possible. Your outlook seems to me a little pessimistic. You tell us that the medical superintendent is an Olympian, a remote person, who does not see anything of it at all. The actual medical officer in charge of the case is either undiscerning or is kept in ignorance of what is going on. Now, we have got it reduced down to this, that it is the attendant who is cruel, and the patient who is the sufferer. How are we to get at the facts of such instances, and how are we to stop their occurrence? You see you must, after all, recognise they would have to be investigated by somebody. You say the attendant will come, and like every other person, I apprehend, will defend himself, possibly truly and possibly untruly. The patient will give his version, although you say the patients will not give statements?—When they are out of the asylum they will.

12,709. Afterwards? — Yes, they will not in the asylum. What impressed me, what converted me into a lunacy reformer, apart from a critic of administration, was this fact, this undeniable fact to my mind, of ill-treatment going on under the surface. It was the volume, the amount, the character and congruity of it, the consistency of it, from hundreds of sources that compelled me to believe in its existence.

12,710. Earl Russell: That is just the question I want to put. You do not tell us what value you yourself attach in the way of credence to these complaints of cruelty?—I attach the greatest value to them. It took me two years to convince myself, and in the two years I became an absolutely convinced man.

12,711. Chairman: That is a generality. Take 1,000 cases coming before you of complaints of ill-treatment. Investigating them with such means as were at your disposal and assessing as well as you could the evidence (because I know the difficulty of it), how many of those cases did you think were well founded?—I think in every case the patient was stating the truth about the facts that had occurred. I did not see any reason why he should not. He had left the asylum; his charges were specific. They dealt with names and dates and persons. There is no reason why he should be lying. The only other thing that he could be doing was that he was lying or else that he was deluded. The assertions of ill-treatment are not of the nature of insane delusions of any sort or kind. These specific assertions are made by people who have left the asylum perhaps for years, and have been following sane lives, and have been occupied and employed, and treated as sane by everybody all round them, and yet they make them as firmly and consistently now as they did then.

12,712. Do you believe them all?—By no means all, but I believe the greater majority of them are true.

12,713. What is your criterion for distinguishing between those that are true and those that are not true? What is the dividing line?—I do not know that there is a dividing line. I should say that certain things were possibly exaggerated—I mean to say the trivial things I should not regard as of any importance; they might possibly be a little exaggerated; but when it got to cases of broken limbs and patients were not only ill-treated but were practically killed, there is not much dividing line there. I mean to say they were either true or not true.

12,714. Earl Russell: Broken limbs would be recorded in the case book at the time?—They ought to be.

12,715. There would be that much corroboration?—Yes.

12,716. Mr. Snell: Could we ask you whether this allegation of cruelty extends to the female side, and in what proportion in relation to the whole?—Certainly it does.

12,717. Chairman: Female nurses as well? — Yes. If you ask the patients you would hardly find the case of a patient, who has been in an asylum for any length of time, who will not have numberless cases to tell you of cruelty that has either been witnessed or inflicted upon themselves.

12,718. Of course you know people who have to deal with evidence, even the evidence of perfectly sane people, very often find that statements of fact which a layman inexperienced in dealing with evidence would regard as absolute proof are entirely fallacious?—Quite.

12,719. The human mind is so constituted that it very often persuades itself of things—I am speaking of the sane mind. I have known many instances of people sincerely believing things that are absolutely untrue.

12,720. Sir David Drummond: Did you take any steps to verify these cases?—Certainly I did.

12,721. What were the steps you took to verify them?—The step I took was to go and see the patients themselves.

12,722. You heard the statements from the patients, but what steps did you take to corroborate the statements?—How could one take any steps?

12,723. But you took none?—No, I did not take any. What we hoped for in the enquiry was that steps would be taken to corroborate the statements at the enquiry.

Earl Russell: How are they to be corroborated?

12,724. Chairman: We are not in a very much better position that you are. Perhaps you are in a better position, because you can see these people and talk to them informally without the circumstance of an enquiry. You simply transfer the task to us of evaluating their evidence, and I do not know that we can do it any better than you?—The only way in which it could be evaluated would be to take specific instances, with dates and persons, and have up all the parties to the case and examine them judicially.

12,725. Earl Russell: Short of an admission by one of the parties incriminated, should we get any corroboration?—I think you could in some instances.

12,726. Chairman: You see we are not a court of law?—I know.

12,727. I will tell you how I look at it. I would say if you have had a large number of instances of complaints of ill-treatment, and have examined them as far as you could, that is to say, tested them with such means as were at your disposal, you are entitled, I think, to draw from that an inference. I would not draw quite so large an inference as you draw, if I may say so, but I would draw an inference that the convergence of testimony from these different sources and of different value does demonstrate that in point of fact a considerable amount of ill-treatment does go on in asylums at the hands of undesirable attendants, which does not come to light. Now that is the real thing that one is concerned with. I should think probably that many of the cases if explored would turn out to be exaggerated. On the other hand, some of the cases might be found to be absolutely accurate. I do not know. But the fact that a large number of complaints have been made converging to one result seems to me to demonstrate that this thing does occur. That is the point that one is concerned with. It is the possibility of its occurrence. I do not see that we are very much advanced by taking even a dozen or twenty cases, because, suppose on those cases we found ten proved and ten disproved, we are not much forwarder, are we? We have merely reached exactly the point which you have put to us to-day that the possibilities of cases occurring has been demonstrated?—I am asking you not only to hear ex-patients but to hear ex-attendants.

12,728. That is for Mr. Gibson to say, of course. Mr. Walter Stewart: We have four on our list of ex-attendants. (Witness): I have more than four on mine, people who are actually prepared to come forward and testify; they have not been patients at all.

12,729. Chairman: Again may I put this: what will they demonstrate beyond this, that the present system permits a possibility of such things?—It would show what you want to demonstrate is, that these things not only possibly exist but do exist.

12,730. I accept it.—Then you want to get the public to express an opinion too. Publicity is the only way by which these things can be stopped. It is by no reports of yours or by anybody else's that these things will be stopped, it is by pressure of public opinion, is it not?

12,731. Earl Russell: I think perhaps what Dr. Lomax feels is that it will not be brought home to our minds at secondhand so well as it would at first hand?—I have got patients who are here now who will tell you of the most ghastly things that they have not only seen, but which have been done upon themselves. All you can do is to see what sort of people they are, and whether they are to be believed. You cannot do more except you can call the witnesses to each act and cross-examine them as you would in a court of law. What we want to get in the public mind is that these things do exist and exist beneath the surface, and they exist unsuspected by the public, and until the public expresses itself in a note of indignation and even horror that these things can happen to poor, helpless, unfortunate people, they will go on existing. It is publicity that will stop all this sort of thing; I do not know anything else that will, except you get patients to bring a case to a court of law. I brought a case before you some time ago in which the evidence was extremely strong, and that case I am asking you to judicially examine. I do not know what view you took of it and what suggestion you are prepared to make about it, but I should regard that as a test case. There are scores of others of the same kind which could be brought.

Mr. Micklem: Which case was that?

12,732. Chairman: That was a case about a post mortem examination. That relates itself to another matter where your proposal is that all deaths of patients in asylums should come before the Coroner?—They all have to; all deaths of patients in asylums have to come before the Coroner. What I asked for was this: I said that the certificate of death has to be accompanied by a statement from the superintendent as to the cause of death; as to whether there were any marks of injury on the body; or as to whether there were any suspicious circumstances connected with the death; and it depended upon that accompanying statement whether the Coroner held an inquest. The case I gave you in detail was a case surrounded with every suspicious circumstance there could be, and yet there was no inquest held and no post mortem.

12,733. Earl Russell: There should be an inquest?—The object of the section of the Act is to give the Coroner information which will enable him to call an inquest if he suspects foul play. Everything depends upon the accompanying statement being a statement which will arouse his suspicions.

12,734. Chairman: And in that particular case the statement which was handed in did not arouse any suspicion in the Coroner's mind; but, again, that seems to me to be a case in which the medical superintendent might have failed in his duty?—I am afraid so.

12,735. How are you going to see that medical superintendents do not fail in their duty?—Well, Sir, if that case, as it did, resulted in the death of the patient in five days; if that case resulted in such a horrible occurrence as that, then I think a great deal ought to be done to the medical superintendent if it was owing to any neglect of duty. I do not say it was. The case was reported to him.

12,736. Earl Russell: Do you suggest that the Coroner should always hold an inquest, and not merely have the cases reported?—I should suggest that the medical superintendent should be so heavily weighted with legal responsibility as to make an absolutely accurate statement imperative; I have no doubt it is accurate in a sense, but I mean a complete and full statement to the Coroner, so that he might be able to form his opinion on it. The case which I refer to obviously had not aroused any suspicion in the Coroner's mind at all.

12,737. That depends both on the capacity of and suspicions of the Coroner?—Yes.

12,738. Chairman: The case was very fully investigated?—Was it?

12,739. Yes, I have all the papers before me.—Whom by?

12,740. And reported on to the Board of Control.—And reported by the attendant.

12,741. The report comes through the medical superintendent who was asked to report on it?—And yet the attendant who reported the case asked to be called at the inquiry, and was not called.

12,742. I do not want to go into his circumstances, but you know he was in the hands of the police at the time?—Oh, dear, no!

12,743. Is not that the person?—This was three years ago.

Mr. Walter Stewart: That was afterwards, Sir.

Witness: It was three years ago; he has been out of work ever since, and, unfortunately, he got into the hands of the police in the last few weeks; but the inquiry took place three years ago.

12,744. Chairman: Whenever you get into particular questions of fact with regard to any individual person, you inevitably come against highly controversial matters in which people give evidence against each other, and every fact is controverted. With regard to this particular attendant, he was dismissed (at least this is the allegation) from the asylum service for suspected theft. Most of us in a court of law do not pay very much attention to a person who comes and makes allegations in those circumstances. That is the difficulty. Whenever you come up against that particular case, you get into these side issues which disguise the matter one is really wanting to get at?—Quite, but there is a great deal more in it if you read my statement carefully. When we come again to read the statement I made to you, perhaps it may be read without the names being given.

12,745. Quite. I personally read it all, and I read the whole of the facts of the case, and I just felt once more, as I have felt so often in these matters, that the presentation of a case of that sort with the controversial elements in it makes it very very difficult, unless one were to thrash the whole thing out in the presence of a jury, and even then you would only get a result which would please some people and

(After a short adjournment):

12,748. Chairman: Dr. Lomax, before we resume the thread of your evidence, my colleagues and I have been impressed with a suggestion you have made, and we would rather like to see one or two of the ex-patients and one or two of the ex-attendants to whom you have alluded. It occurs to us that this can most readily be arranged, if you would be kind enough yourself, who know these people, to take perhaps three or four of each kind, three or four ex-patients whom you might select yourself, and three or four ex-attendants, and send their names in to me, with just a short résumé of what they will say, and where they have been; and then I think we should see some of them and have their story from them just as you did, so that we may be in the same position as you were in, and be able to judge for ourselves of what they have to say. We shall select from those whom you send in one or two whom we would like to hear. I think that is probably the most useful way of doing it, because, as you know, if we get into cross-examination we lose the real personal effect of it; so we should like to put ourselves in the same position as you have been in by asking some of them to come and see us, by asking them to tell us their experiences as they told them to you.—Will you communicate with them when you have their names and addresses?

12,749. If you could give us perhaps three, or four at the most, of each type, I shall read the statements, and from among those we shall select two or three probably altogether and invite them to come and see us. We will send the invitation, if they will come; some of them may not like to come.—They will come all right.

12,750. And we shall put ourselves just in the position you were in of hearing them tell us their story. I think that would be quite a useful thing for us to do?—I may say I have got in my bag here the précis of evidence of 10 or 12 or more which I can select, or let you have before I leave the room.

12,751. If you like I will read the whole 10 or 12 myself?—Then you can have them.

12,752. Naturally one has had to read a great many statements, far more statements than we can possibly deal with in evidence, but they are all useful as showing points of view?—Quite.

12,753. I think that method is probably the best that we could adopt to serve your purpose and our purpose?—Yes.

12,754. Now let us pass on. We have discussed the question of ill-treatment. There is just one comment I should like to make. You have spoken of hundreds, nay thousands, of cases of ill-treatment which have come under your cognisance?—No; I said I had had letters relating to them.

12,755. You have had letters relating to hundreds, nay thousands, of cases?—Between me and the Society for Lunacy Reform.

12,756. I really am concerned to see, and I am sure you are also, that the idea should not go forth that it is your evidence that hundreds and thousands of patients are being ill-treated, because you can displease others. You do not get much further.—If we can bring evidence from eye witnesses and outside witnesses independently of these attendants' evidence at all——

12,746. And then the institution will bring all its witnesses also, no doubt to the contrary effect?—That is a case in which, of course, they will.

12,747. And we shall be occupied for days in considering which of the two sets of people is telling the truth, and at the end it will only be a judgment by us that we think one way or the other, and we will not be quite sure?—It is a case to my mind that ought not to be tried here; it ought to be tried in a court of law.

Chairman: That is exactly what we feel; you could not have put it better.

imagine what an unhappy effect that would have upon many homes; and we all recognise how much is being done in many institutions to the satisfaction both of the patients and of their relatives. It would be very unfortunate if people were deterred from taking advantage of the existing system, such as it is, by the idea that they were sending their relatives to necessary and inevitable ill-treatment. I am sure you do not want to convey that impression.—Certainly not.

12,757. One knows, of course, that in many instances recovered patients have been most grateful for the attention and care they have had, and one would not wish that people should be deterred from going to institutions; indeed, one of the things we want to do is to try and make resort to these institutions less resented?—Quite.

12,758. And it is not the way to do it to give everybody the impression that they are going to inevitable ill-treatment, of course?—Quite.

12,759. One point you refer to in connection of ill-treatment is the subject of prosecution. I have not quite ascertained the bearing of that?—When cases of ill-treatment are reported to the superintendents and the asylum committees, they apparently are the only people who are concerned with the question of prosecution. In every report of the Board of Control there are a certain number of prosecutions. These prosecutions are either at the instance of the visiting committee, or of the Board of Control. What I should like to suggest is that it should not be an optional thing with the asylum committee to ask for prosecutions, but a compulsory thing that when they get evidence of serious ill-treatment of a patient by an attendant they should be obliged to put it into the hands of the police, or a magistrate—that they should not have the option of selecting the cases which they think ought to go.

12,760. Earl Russell: Do you suggest they should prosecute when they are quite sure they will not get a conviction?—I do not know, Sir.

12,761. That is a question, you know, that every prosecuting authority always has to consider, not only whether they believe an offence has been committed, but whether they can persuade the magistrates of it?—Yes. I think the onus ought to be put upon the judicial authority.

Earl Russell: But you realise if they had a great many prosecutions which failed it would rather bring it into discredit.

12,762. Chairman: I see that last year in the 10th Report of the Board of Control one or two prosecutions were undertaken, and they appear to have been undertaken under the order of the Commissioners, so that the Commissioners initiate the proceedings?—They do; not in all instances, but they do often.

12,763. What is your suggestion? With whom do you say the initiative should lie?—I mean it should not be optional whether the cases are prosecuted or not; I think they all ought to be.

12,764. That is a very difficult proposition. I have been a public prosecutor myself, and there are good many cases which come up in which you have to use your discretion whether you will prosecute or not.

Dr. MONTAGU LOMAX, M.R.C.S.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Would you put a question to the witness as to whether it would not satisfy him, if the papers were laid before the Public Prosecutor, to leave it to his discretion?

12,765. Chairman: That is a different matter. I think you are hardly doing your own proposition justice in the way you have put it.—I am ignorant of the law in this department.

12,766. Mr. Stewart suggests that your object might be met if the papers relating to any case which is thought to be a case suitable for prosecution were placed before the Public Prosecutor, leaving it to him to take action or not, as the case might be. Would that meet your view?—It would, I think, yes.

Mr. Micklem: You might get less prosecutions that way than if you left it to the Board of Control.

Earl Russell: You almost certainly would. The Public Prosecutor is very reluctant to prosecute unless he is quite sure of a conviction. The Board of Control might think it well to prosecute as an example.

12,767. Chairman: It is enough for you if you express to us your view that, in the matter of prosecution, some method should be devised whereby cases that ought to be prosecuted are not hushed up. That is really the point?—Yes.

12,768. The devising of the method of preventing that is a matter for legal investigation?—Quite.

12,769. Now, the next topic you discuss is the question of safeguards against improper detention. I am going to suggest to you that that was a topic which Mr. Parker dealt with most fully, and unless you have any additional suggestions, I do not think we need delay long over it. I think we are really fully apprised as to the risks of illegal detention at present. You may take it that we are fully aware of the problems arising in that matter, and I think we have had really almost as much help as we can get. We wish to avoid reiteration, but if you have any views in addition which you think would help us, I do not want to stop your giving them.—No, I do not think I have anything to add, except to say that it would be most important in my view that the Board of Control or some responsible authority should define what they mean when they state that patients are legally but unnecessarily detained in asylums, owing to the inability or unwillingness of their friends to look after them.

12,770. Yes, I was struck with that passage. If I may suggest to you the meaning of it; this is not the Board of Control's explanation, as far as I know, it is my own interpretation of it, and it is really this: that there are many persons who are certified and certifiable persons, properly certified persons, but who are really quite harmless—that is to say, they do not do harm to themselves or to others—and could quite safely be discharged from an asylum, provided there were some place to send them where they could be properly looked after; and the suggestion is that these people are not being illegally detained but unnecessarily detained. Now there is a great difference. I could imagine there must be many people in asylums whom it is not necessary to detain in an asylum but whom it is perfectly legal to detain in an asylum—you follow my point?—Quite.

12,771. Many of these people, if there were some place to send them to, could with advantage to everybody be discharged from the asylum because they were being unnecessarily though legally detained—that is really your point?—Yes, it is.

12,772. The difficulty always is to get the appropriate relatives or the proper institution to send them to?—Yes.

12,773. You will have our assent at once to this view that no person who has recovered, no person, that is to say, who is at any particular moment of time no longer a certifiable patient, can legally be detained a moment. You may take that as being with us elementary.—Yes.

12,774. But there are many cases which are being legally detained which might quite well be released, if there were some place else to send them to, and they need not occupy the asylum accommodation?—Quite.

12,775. That seems to me to depend very much on the accommodation available to them, or the relatives or some association being willing to take care of them. That is the real difficulty there.—It can be solved to a large extent by a system of boarding out which exists in Scotland and in Belgium at Ghent.

12,776. That is certainly an attractive solution.—It is one of the solutions; and again, as I say, if they are retained in the asylum they should be retained as uncertified, and if they are employed in work they should be paid as workers, if they can be useful in the asylum; and the stigma of insanity, of certification, such as it is, should be removed from them; they might possibly remain on and work as some of the ward maids do.

12,777. Earl Russell: Have you considered the trade union question involved? If they are paid at all they must be paid the full trade union rate of wages.—I have not considered it.

Earl Russell: It means a difficulty.

12,778. Chairman: Of course if a patient has recovered and works, he ought not to be there as a certified patient at all; he ought to be there as an employee. On the other hand, if the patient is still a properly certifiable patient, and is in the asylum, it seems to me that this labour is not any more than an adequate recognition of the fact that he is being supported at the public expense, because of his inability to be an ordinary citizen?—That all depends upon whether he is certifiable or not, and who is going to be the judge of that—the superintendent or the asylum committee—who find the patient's work extremely useful? Are they going to allow that to bias their views of the certifiability of the patient?

12,779. Earl Russell: Do you seriously suggest that patients are kept in asylums if sane because their work is valuable?—I do. It all depends upon what you mean by "sane."

12,780. Who are not certifiably insane?—Yes, I do.

12,781. Chairman: Again have you met such cases?—Yes, I have got one in my mind now.

12,782. Earl Russell: In an asylum or out of it?—Out of it.

—Earl Russell: Then he is not an instance now, is he?

12,783. Chairman: Take your own experience in Prestwich Asylum. You saw the people there, and there were a number of them engaged in laundry work and other work. Do you say you saw people round about you there who were not certifiable persons, but who nevertheless were being detained illegally under certification—that is really the point? Did you see such persons?—I did see two or three whom I considered, and I believe half the people in the asylum considered, were perfectly sane.

12,784. Perfectly sane?—Quite sane, and uncertifiable in any sense.

12,785. What steps did you take about these people?—I brought them up over and over again.

12,786. And what was the result?—Nil.

12,787. Earl Russell: Do you mean you recommended them to the Medical Superintendent?—Yes, I have got the notes of them now. I do not mean to say that they had not been brought up before, but I mean to say this, that as soon as my book came out two of them were almost immediately discharged.

12,788. You left the asylum two years before your book came out?—Yes.

12,789. Did you write to the Board of Control that these sane people were being detained there?—No, I did not, because I was writing the book at the time, and these people whom I considered sane I thought I would bring into my book.

DR. MONTAGU LOMAX, M.R.C.S.

12,790. But you surely did not keep these people there two years, in order to put them in your book?—No, the book was being written. At the time I deferred it; I was hoping to hear that they had come up and had been discharged. I did not know they had not been. It was only after the book came out that I wrote to a friend and asked him about these people, and he told me two or three of these had been discharged.

12,791. But still if you felt so strongly the injustice of their detention, I do not understand why you did not write to the Board of Control, as soon as you were a free agent, to say that these same people were being kept there?—Well, it was my view of their sanity; it was not the Superintendent's view.

12,792. Do you mean to tell us now you are less sure that they were sane?—No.

12,793. Chairman: I shall assume, of course, that your medical opinion that this particular patient was sane was sincerely entertained by you?—Certainly it was.

12,794. But I am afraid I must equally assume that the opinion expressed by the Medical Superintendent, differing from yours, was equally sincerely entertained?—Quite.

12,795. Does not that occur very often in the diagnosis of disease, in fact it is proverbial that doctors differ even as conspicuously as lawyers differ?—Quite.

12,796. In that state of matters, assuming that there is no improper motive entering into the decision, one or other opinion must prevail?—Quite.

12,797. Why should (I do not want to put it in the least offensively) your opinion have prevailed with regard to the question of this man's sanity or insanity rather than the Medical Superintendent's opinion?—I think his opinion would prevail because obviously he had the power, I had not.

12,798. But of course you had more means of knowing about the patient than he had?—I ought not to have had.

12,799. Earl Russell: I still do not understand how you reconcile it with your conscience to leave these people there for two years, if you thought they were sane?—I do not think I expected to leave them there for more than a few months.

12,800. Why a minute, why a week?—It was not my job after I had left surely? *

12,801. Chairman: There is one case you give us at page 175 of your book which has rather puzzled me, I frankly confess; you give it as a case of a man who had been in the asylum for nearly a year when you took office, and he was beginning to get tired of it. "I watched him carefully and soon had little doubt of his sanity." Then he did some things. Then I am rather surprised to find this sentence: "As a punishment I kept him back another two months and gave him my reasons." Then the paragraph concludes: "However, he was not insane, and I shortly procured his discharge." Surely you do not want us to infer from that that the man was sane, and yet as a punishment you kept him back for two months?—May I see the passage?

12,802. Yes—(Handing book to the witness)—it is on page 175. It is one of the few passages in your book that really puzzled me, I confess. I am sure there must be some explanation of it?—Yes. That case was a case in which the man was obviously malingering, and got into the asylum to escape the clutches of the law, if I remember right.

12,803. It rather looks like a case of malingering?—There were two or three when I was there, men who preferred to come into the asylum rather than go to jail, and one man whom I succeeded in discharging was reconvicted and put back into jail.

12,804. But if this fellow was sane and a malingerer, I do not quite see how you could continue to keep him in the asylum and, least of all, how you could keep him in the asylum as a punishment?—I did not keep him; the man was obviously kept.

12,805. The passage reads, you know, "As a punishment I kept him back another two months and gave him my reasons."?—Because he tried to take me in. He had been trying to cheat me, and I told him that I would not send him up as soon as I otherwise should have done. I cannot remember the case for the moment.

12,806. To be quite frank the thing that really rather shocked me was that he should, as a punishment, have his name kept back from consideration for discharge for two months. That is what rather perplexed me?—I am afraid that is done over and over again.

12,807. Earl Russell: But what shocks us is that you should do it after all you have said?—Yes. I ought not to have put it in that way perhaps, but it is obvious that I did.

12,808. Chairman: That honestly rather shocked me, if I may say so. It really is not of great moment, Dr. Lomax?—It is to me.

12,809. I mean you can understand on reading that, that one was naturally a little puzzled—at least I was a little puzzled?—Quite.

12,810. Of course, the really important question we are at the moment considering is that no insane person should be detained a moment longer than is necessary to secure his recovery?—Quite.

12,811. On the question of preventing persons being so detained, I understand you have no additional precautions to suggest other than those we have already heard on behalf of the Society?—No. I was not here so I do not know what proposals the Society made; I only read the report of them in "The Times." I do not quite see that I have any other suggestions to make.

12,812. Of course, in putting these questions to you I have rather assumed that you have been familiar with Mr. Parker's précis and the case that was put before us?—I have seen it, but I am sorry to say I have been ill; I have been in bed for some time, and I have not been able to recall all I have read. But I suggested that the asylums board should have a day on which to hear appeals.

12,813. That is very important?—That struck me as one means.

12,814. I think that is additional to what we have had already.

12,815. Earl Russell: I think you mention in your book, or in your précis, a discharge committee of the medical superintendent and of others?—Yes.

12,816. Chairman: Then I think we may pass from that. Now I should like to have your views on a matter we are very interested in, and that is the question of the incipient case, Dr. Lomax?—Yes. My view favours the preliminary detention order which was suggested by the British Medical Association, and which I think is one of the most important things that has been suggested yet. I state here that as part of the feature of admitting patients into asylums there should be a preliminary detention order which lasts only three days in the first case; perhaps I might be allowed to read this?

12,817. By all means.—It has to do with incipient cases, voluntary boarders and mental observation hospitals, hospital clinics, observation wards in infirmaries, and so on, and the treatment of incipient insanity; it is all connected.

12,818. If you give us your considered opinion as you have put it in writing it will be the most convenient way to get it down.—The whole object of any alteration in the law regarding certification concerns the necessity of greater publicity, and less secrecy in the procedure, and much greater security of the rights of the patient. Under the present law it seems to me that people can be far too easily put away in asylums by designing relatives, and far too easily kept there, and that far too autocratic powers are put in the hands of the medical profession as regards their admission to and detention in asylums. The responsibility of depriving a citizen of his liberty should be shared far more equally among the medical profession and the civic and legal authorities. In the following remarks as regards the legal and medical procedure of certification it will be observed that I personally am more in agreement with the, in my view, admirable statement of the British Medical Association, though I suggest a few additions to and modifications of this statement, than with the very able but rather more cumbrous and costly, and, as it seems to me, less practical suggestions of the Society for Lunacy Reform. I now make the following tentative suggestions, my reasons for doing so being that most of my other suggestions for administrative reform are based upon them. These suggestions refer to changes in and additions to the existing law, i.e., they supplement but do not abolish most of the other legal provisions at present existing. The object of these suggestions is the unification and simplification of the present procedure as regards certification. My proposal then is as follows: There shall be a single medical certificate called a preliminary detention certificate required in all cases of suspected insanity, before any patient, by whatever means or order of admission, is admitted into any institution for mental patients.

Note.—The witness has since expressed the desire to supplement this answer as follows:—"I took the best step that seemed open to me. I wrote to the Senior Medical Officer and asked him to do what he could for the patients' discharge. Later he wrote to me that three of those mentioned had been discharged, including one of those spoken of to-day, and that the other shortly would be. That seemed to me a better course of action than writing to the Board of Control who would only have referred the matter back to the Superintendent."

12,819. Earl Russell: Would you not rather call it a preliminary detention order?—The detention order comes afterwards when the magistrate signs it.

12,820. I thought the certificate was the one you wanted to avoid?—Yes, but you want to certify the patient as detainable and not as insane.

12,821. Would it not be better to call it an order?—I did in the first place, a preliminary order. This preliminary detention order or certificate shall contain clauses which gives the medical officer of the institution to which the patient is taken power of compulsory detention and control over such patient for three days. It shall be signed preferably by the patient's usual medical attendant, and may be supplemented, if so desired by the patient or his friends, by a second certificate (in which case each examination of the patient shall be separate, though afterwards in consultation if required). I think it is a great absurdity, if you will allow me to say so, that in cases of certifying anybody the doctors are required to give the certificates separately, and not after consultation with each other. The object, of course, is to avoid any medical collusion, but I think the patient ought to be given the benefit of the combined experiences of the doctors, one of whom may be much more able than the other; and as in the case of ordinary illness the patient is allowed to call in two or three men who consult together and not separately, so the presumed lunatic should be able to have the advantage of consultation of the two people who are signing him up, if they require it.

12,822. Chairman: In that do you voice the feelings of the Society, or is that your individual opinion?—That has not been raised at all, but I raise it on my own account. Then I say: in no case shall the medical man certifying be the medical officer of the institution to which the patient is taken, except in the case of pauper lunatics and lunatics found wandering, and then only in case of emergency. Within 72 hours of the patient's admission he shall be personally interviewed by the judicial authority, who shall then sign a preliminary detention order—or countersign the order signed by the doctor, or, if he thinks fit, discharge the patient, otherwise the preliminary detention order shall have effect for 28 days. The same medical and legal procedure shall be gone through in urgency orders and summary reception orders as in orders in petition, that is, there shall be only one medical certificate legally required for the preliminary detention order. It is in that respect that I differ from the Medical Association's idea that in every case the two certificates are required. I think with a preliminary detention order before the patient is certified insane at all, only one doctor's order is required, but that after, in the 28 days, if it becomes necessary to certify the patient insane, and to send him to an asylum on a reception order, a second doctor's opinion should be then called in, and a second certificate required, and that that second certificate should, if possible, be signed by a mental expert, or a man holding a diploma in psychiatric medicine who could conveniently perhaps be asked to come from the nearest asylum: that the magistrate then, after these certificates have been signed, should sign the final reception order which consigns the patient to the asylum. I think that that fact would relieve the medical profession of a great responsibility incurred in signing the patient up, in the first place. He would know that he was only being signed up for a probationary period, and that in 28 days' time additional inquiry could then be held before the final reception order was made, at which the patient could be represented if he preferred, or his friends preferred, a kind of judicial inquiry in the institution in which the patient is; that is to say, that the patient's friends should have the opportunity of seeing the certificates and of seeing the reasons for the detention and the certification of the patient, and to make objection if they thought fit, that a sort of legal formula should be gone through at the time.

12,823. Sir David Drummond: Those would be obviously cases that are certifiable?—Obviously in 75 per cent. of the cases, I do not suppose any inquiry would be asked for at all.

12,824. Would there be any preliminary detention order in cases which are obviously certifiable?—I think so in every case. I think in every case it should be optional after the three days. The magistrate ought to come into the picture as soon as he can within three days; then, if he thinks the patient is certifiable he can ask for a second doctor to be brought in at once, provided he holds this sort of judicial inquiry before the patient is sent away into the asylum, at which his friends or himself can raise objections if they like. I do not mean to say for a moment that he shall put the certifying doctor in the box and have counsel to examine him and ask him the reasons for certifying the patient, which seems to me perfectly absurd. You have got to trust the doctor who is certifying, or the scheme of lunacy administration falls to the ground.

12,825. Earl Russell: You disagree with your friends of the Lunacy Reform Society there?—Absolutely, and on other points. I do not see how the patient can be aided by being legally represented at this inquiry except in the sense that he might have a lawyer there to put the case. He cannot examine the certifying specialist and ask him his reasons. You have got to trust the specialist to know his job. When a patient is operated on in a hospital, his friends do not come in and see the surgeon and ask him to produce certificates that he is able to do the operation.

12,826. Chairman: That has been present to my mind, but you do not disregard this side, which I think is the justification of the view that the Lunacy Reform Society has been putting before us, that the treatment of this class of case involves an infringement of personal liberty?—Quite.

12,827. That is the whole difficulty of this class of case. The ordinary operation in a nursing home or general hospital does not involve any infringement of personal liberty, and perhaps, in justice to the view put before us by the Lunacy Reform Society, we ought to give weight to their insistence on the question of personal liberty being involved. True, you may answer that you are as jealous of personal liberty as they are, but you safeguard it best by reliance upon the medical man's probity?—No, I say it comes to that in the end.

Dr. MONTAGU LOMAX, M.R.C.S.

12,828. In the end it must?—I deal with the questions which the Lunacy Reform Society raise afterwards in the case of the voluntary boarder and incipient insanity, but I say that when a magistrate has called upon a second opinion from a man, who should preferably be an expert, and a panel of whom should be kept in the province or area from which he can ask for them, and if the patients are given the option of calling at their own expense for some other man to consult with him, then you have done all you can to protect the liberty of the subject, because he will not be certified and finally sent away into an asylum without having the opportunity given to him or his friends of knowing why, and of being represented, if he likes, at the time by a lawyer, or anyone with legal knowledge.

12,829. May I just ask you about that question which I must say has puzzled me very much? I notice you have said that he should have an opportunity of knowing the contents of the certificates?—Yes.

12,830. There seems to be room for considerable difference of opinion on that subject. As a doctor, I think you will appreciate that you cannot always tell your patient what is wrong with him?—No, certainly not.

12,831. Let us take the case of a patient who exhibits the symptoms of general paralysis of the insane, but which are not quite determined, but where the doctor has felt it his duty to indicate among the symptoms, symptoms which any medical man would at once recognise as being at least indicative of that disease: I should imagine it would be a very dreadful thing to tell the patient, "We do not know whether you have general paralysis or not, but you have unfortunately symptoms of it which may or may not develop into this very dreadful disease." In ordinary practice you would not tell your patient a thing of that sort, would you?—No, but if the patient's liberty is involved as well as his health, it is on account of the liberty of the subject that the patient should be given much more information.

12,832. May I just put one of those curious balances that arise so often? I am not at all sure that his cure is not more important than his liberty. I do not know whether you would agree with that or not. Is the accent to be on the liberty, or is the accent to be on the cure?—I think, fundamentally, the principle involved chiefly is liberty.

12,833. More important than cure?—Yes. Of course if he is freed afterwards he is at liberty, but what I mean is this: that what the patient feels most is the liberty that is taken from him, it is that which he wants to safeguard the most, and if anything involving that seems to interfere with his chances of cure he would sooner have his liberty secured than his cure.

12,834. He might, but what one is concerned with rather is the public interest. I think that is a very difficult question, because one might, of course, by depressing a patient just defeat the object of cure?—You would not in a general paralysis case, because it progresses on to its inevitable end.

12,835. I am assuming it is a case where, in point of fact, the diagnosis might be wrong. Suppose, as has happened in cases, it has been incorrectly diagnosed; the patient is told that he has got one of the most fatal diseases. In point of fact, he has not got it, because even a doctor may make a wrong diagnosis. The unhappy person broods over the dreadful fate that has befallen him. That is certainly not the atmosphere for recovery from the disease, is it?—No, it is not, but I do not think you need tell the patient if you tell the patient's friends.

Mr. Walter Stewart: That is what I was going to ask you to put, Sir: whether there should not be an authorised representative to whom it could be told without the patient being told.

Chairman: The difficulty about the representative is that he must make some use of it when he gets it.

Sir David Drummond: He may make improper use of it.

Witness: Easily.

12,836. Chairman: That is a great difficulty?—It is.

12,837. I am sure you must have experienced in all forms of illness, but most especially in this form of illness, that people are sensitive, and properly sensitive, about unnecessary publicity?—Quite.

12,838. I am sure you must have found in your practice people who have had a mental illness, and who have completely recovered and do not want the subject talked about, advertised and known?—Certainly.

12,839. We do not even talk about our ordinary illnesses which we have had, though some people are rather bores about them, but we ought not to talk about them. In a case of that sort of mental illness, people who have been fortunate enough to recover prefer to let the matter pass into oblivion?—Certainly; but this inquiry would not be held in public; it would be simply an inquiry at which the patient and his friends can put their side of the case if they like, and then if the patient says, "I want to know the reasons for which I am certified," then I think in justice to him he must take the responsibility of how the knowledge will affect him.

12,840. Earl Russell: How can he take the responsibility, when ex hypothesi he has already an unbalanced mind? That is a bit rough on him, is it not?—Not if he says he prefers to know why he is certified.

12,841. But doctors do not let their patients do the things they want to do?—This man is not a normal person; it is his liberty that is involved as well as his health.

12,842. Chairman: I am not quite satisfied yet as to whether it is not your duty as a medical man to prefer the cure of your patient even to his liberty. I have not the least doubt you would have me held down in bed if I were a case of delirium following on pneumonia; you would have no compunction whatever in depriving me of my liberty, because you would be thinking of my cure all the time?—Yes, exactly.

12,843. Now one other point on that same question of telling the patient. As you know, there is one paragraph in which the certificate contains facts reported by others—hearsay?—Yes.

12,844. Suppose one of the statements in that is a statement made by the man's wife about him, and he sees there (we shall assume him to be unbalanced) that his wife is being instrumental in having him detained, may you not produce very great unhappiness in such cases?—I think you may; I think you often do.

12,845. I am always as concerned as you are with the patient's point of view throughout. I have been throughout the sittings of this Commission keeping my eye on that aspect, as you exhort us to do in your memorandum, and one is so concerned to see that the very safeguards we suggest may not themselves rebound upon the head of the very person we want to benefit. I can imagine one might create untold unhappiness if the patient were told who the person was who had made certain allegations about him?—I do not think he need be told all, but if he asks for the doctor who has done so, I think the doctor might tell him the reason why he had come to the conclusion he was of unsound mind. He need not show him the certificate.

12,846. You are making it very difficult, you know. Again it is at the discretion of the medical man. I can understand the view of the Society.

Mr. Walter Stewart: No spouse should be allowed to be a petitioner, so that that difficulty would be removed.

Earl Russell: Not in the least. Facts stated by the wife might perfectly well be stated by the wife, whether she was the petitioner or not.

Chairman: Or if it were a brother or sister the same trouble might arise.

25 February, 1925.]

Dr. MONTAGU LOMAX, M.R.C.S.

Witness: The difficulty is this: hundreds of patients tell you, "I have not the least idea what grounds they had for putting me in. I want to know. If I had known I might have been able to give some explanation." Some of these grounds are most doubtful. A patient can never get hold of the certificate and know what grounds he has been detained on, or certified on, until he is discharged years afterwards.

12,847. That might be of importance if he were being illegally detained; but just follow me for a moment. We shall assume that doctors of competence, such as you describe, have considered the case and have said "This person ought to be certified; we say so on our professional responsibility." The patient is then taken to an institution. What good will it do that patient in the institution to be told the precise nature of his mental disability, and the precise allegations on which he had been certified? He would then proceed to occupy himself with trying to controvert them rather than to occupy himself with his cure. What good would that do to him?—Not a bit, until the question of the judicial enquiry had been raised, and it might not be raised at all. I am presuming the patient has been certified, that the expert has been called in, the second opinion has been called in and has certified the patient on certain grounds, and that the patient's friends are then informed, and they say "Well, may we see the reasons for which the patient is certified," and the patient may say "May I see the reasons?"

12,848. It is just there I am having my difficulty?—I know, but it is not that he would be brooding over it all the time until he was certified; I say if there was a judicial enquiry at all, there ought to be some means by which the patient should know, supposing he thinks he is improperly detained and certified, the grounds upon which the opinion of the doctor has been formed. That strikes me as just and reasonable.

12,849. Sir David Drummond: Do you for a moment think that the patient, if informed, could argue in such a way as to convince anybody that he was wrongfully certified?—I do not think so for a moment, and I think in 99 cases out of 100 he would only prove his unfitness more by argument; but it seems right to give him an opportunity which hitherto has been denied him.

Sir David Drummond: What is the advantage of it?

12,850. Chairman: That is just my difficulty, I do not quite see the advantage. We are taking a case where there has been a proper certification before a magistrate, and with a medical examination preceding it. The man is therefore of unbalanced mind; that is ex hypothesi. He is properly being detained in the institution. You suggest it would be of advantage to him then to know the grounds on which he had been certified?—Only if he asks, and in 75 per cent. of cases he might not ask.

12,851. Suppose he asks and says "Be good enough to send me these"—we are assuming he is a person who is insane: would the provision of that information to an insane person be really of any value? Might it not just set his mind brooding upon these things?—I think it would satisfy his mind much more than to be in doubt. I think he might not think he was justly certified, but still he would know what it was he was certified for. At present what is harassing a number of minds of these people in asylums is "What on earth have I been put in for?"

12,852. Earl Russell: That is true, but does not the medical superintendent without showing them the certificates, or quoting the certificates, tell them when he thinks they are fit to hear, what the idea is that is troubling them and try to cure them of it?—I think he does often, but in a number of cases I do not think the patient knows at all. He could know, of course, if he asks.

12,853. But is it not part of your way to test his cure, to try him with any delusions he has had or to tell him of his trouble?—Yes, certainly.

12,854. How will you help your insane patient by giving him an actual copy of the thing?—I should not give him a copy of the thing.

12,855. Who is going to bowdlerise or expurgate it?—I only suggest that at the enquiry that is held at the time, if he asks the reasons they should be told him. I do not know that it would be wise, but it might be an opportune thing for the man's own peace of mind to know. It might.

12,856. Then I want to know if he is not to be told all the reasons, that is to say if he is not to have what we call in law a disclosure, who is to make the selection, and how is it to be made? You do not get any further if he does not have the whole thing?—I do not think it would be wise to tell him all, certainly not.

Earl Russell: I am glad you agree about that.

12,857. Chairman: Well, Dr. Lomax, we understand your alternative programme of certification which you propose, and which you suggest in preference to the programme which we have heard from the Society?—The only alteration is that I think for the preliminary detention certificate there need be only one medical opinion.

12,858. Sir David Drummond: It seems to me that the proposal you suggest makes no provision for the patient possibly being taken in the early stages to another place than an asylum—a general hospital?—Yes, but that is only the reception order. With the preliminary detention order I say that the patient must be taken to a mental observation home, or a mental observation ward in an infirmary. That is an essential part of the whole reform: that before a patient of any kind shall be sent to any asylum he shall have the 28 days in a half-way house, a mental observation home. The whole thing depends upon that.

12,859. Chairman: We have heard a great deal of evidence from all quarters with remarkable unanimity in favour of what they venture to call the provisional period, which is to intervene between the case first being observed and its ultimate destination in an asylum. I really think upon that you are pushing an open door. I mean on that matter you have universal assent. One question on it, though, is worth asking you, I think. What would be most desirable as it seems to me would be if these observation places could be separate institutions?—Quite.

12,860. But I see quite a practical difficulty about that?—So do I.

12,861. Because you would only have persons in there who were, so to speak, in a clearing house, and it would be very difficult to set up special institutions of that sort. Do you favour the association of these observation or provisional places, with general hospitals or with existing mental institutions?—I think it would be much more convenient if they were in existing mental institutions. The advantages, of course, are obvious, that the patients are often much better treated in hospitals than in asylums. Their mental illness is often due to causes which are physical causes, and could be best treated in a hospital; also, it brings the patients into contact with students who would be able to take advantage of learning about insanity. All these sorts of things are in favour of the institution being part of the hospital clinic. But against it is the fact that the hospitals as a rule are in large towns, and in the most insanitary parts of large towns, and the patients in the early stages of insanity do not require the surroundings of the slum—for instance, Guy's Hospital, or the London Hospital. What you want is country air if you can get it, and fresh air, good food, and surroundings; you want something that will help the patient to recover, much more easily than he would in a hospital.

12,862. Then if we were able to recommend that asylums should not be so large as they have been tending to grow and that what I may call compendiously the villa system should be substituted, would you contemplate that included among the villas

Dr. MONTAGU LOMAX, M.R.C.S.

there would be one which would be recognised as an observation place in which the patients would be provisionally detained?—Quite.

12,863. They might never pass into the asylum proper, that is to say, into the region of certification at all, because they might recover?—Quite.

12,864. On the other hand they would there be seen and studied, and the subject of study by the skilled staff of the asylum?—Yes.

12,865. And if any special treatment were required it would be available in the asylum?—Quite.

12,866. Now you also contemplate, I take it from your evidence, that these persons under observation would require to be under some qualified legal restraint during that period?—That is so; I think that is essential. I think that the early incipient cases (and I am sure all alienists would agree with me) often require more control than the later ones. It has been proved to me over and over again in my own experience; and that is where I do not agree with the Society for Lunacy Reform (and the Association also, I think, have the same view in mind) who wish to make the voluntary boarders persons capable of leaving at 72 hours' notice. I maintain that the voluntary boarder, if he goes as a voluntary boarder into a mental observation hospital, ought to sign a paper by which he undertakes to give the authorities of the observation hospital the right to medical detention and control for the 28 days if required, and if he is to be controlled the same formalities have to be gone through as if the patient had been removed against his will into an observation hospital. It is most important that the doctors should have the power of controlling the voluntary patient if he shows symptoms, as he often does, of sudden insanity.

12,867. That was present to our mind, and I ventured to put one or two questions to Mr. Parker upon it. Now I think that on the general question of the importance of dealing with incipient cases we are all in agreement, and we need not labour that further. At the other end, the process of recovery, I am sure you have studied that stage also. It has puzzled me a good deal. No man can say at what precise moment the patient has passed from the zone of insanity back to the zone of sanity. It is not a mathematical line, of course?—No.

12,868. I think many medical superintendents must have been anxious as to their duty at that stage?—Certainly.

12,869. They must have felt "This patient is no longer certifiable; I could not certify this patient de novo"?—That is so.

12,870. On the other hand, they might say "Although the patient has ceased to be a certifiable patient the process of cure is not complete. This patient would be very much the better for another month or two months in the shelter of this Institution, and then convalescence would be complete, and he could be discharged." What is one to do about that case? It is a very puzzling case?—I think the mental observation hospitals ought also to use the wards as "half-way houses out" as well as "half-way houses in."

12,871. Might one at both ends of the history of the patient have this twilight stage—that is to say, you might have observation at one end and observation at the other. Then the patient might be encouraged towards recovery by a relaxation of the legal restraint, and put under the less rigid legal restraint which he was under during the first 28 days of his detention; that might be held out to him as an encouragement, and then he might be moved back to the probation ward, and he would then be studied with a view to his discharge?—Quite, and it would enormously assist his recovery to know that he was in a "half-way house." If you gave him increased privilege of parole, if you employed him on work without being supervised, if you gradually showed him that he was being restored to his own personal control, all that would help him enormously.

12,872. I do not know whether you have seen the Institution at Ewell. I have recently visited it and I was very much struck with almost exactly the programme that you have described. It is for non-certified patients, of course. The patient enters at one villa and proceeds from villa to villa with increasing liberty, until he reaches the last one before discharge, and there he is practically a free person, and the patient is entitled to go into the grounds and into the town, increasing degrees of liberty being given. Of course, unfortunately some fall by the way and have to be certified, but those on the upgrade are taken stage by stage from villa to villa with the maximum of freedom until the discharge?—That is excellent, because to send a patient out into the world, straight away from an asylum, is a thing which is very dangerous to him. He may be undetainable, but he may get into bad habits at once.

12,873. Then I would like to have a few minutes with you on the administrative side. I rather take it from your book, and from the notes you have been good enough to give us, that you think that the Board of Control as the central body should have greatly increased powers given to it?—A reformed Board, I agree.

12,874. Accompanied, I understand, with much larger executive powers?—I think so. If you have a Board at all it ought to have much more powers of control. I think one of the reasons why the Board's inspections are often so ineffectual is that they cannot do more than suggest. If the asylum people say, "No, we will not," then the Board cannot say anything else.

12,875. Then you wish some sanction to attach to their recommendations?—Yes.

12,876. On that subject we have had evidence from the members of the Board of Control, and they are the first to tell us that the work which is imposed upon them, upon their relatively small staff, is very severe, and it must be, of course, especially as they have to be 'en voyage' through the country for such a large part of the year. The idea has been mooted that it might be an advantage to have district Commissioners throughout the country and a central body, to which these district Commissioners would report, and which would have executive powers in the way of giving directions throughout the country. How does that strike you?—I have got a whole chapter on that explaining exactly the same thing. I think it would be a great advantage to have local Commissioners or Boards of Control, if the country were divided up into areas or provinces, and for these people then to have the duties of inspecting the asylums in that area and reporting to the central Board in London. I think that would simplify to a large extent the work of the Board as it exists now: economise it too, and it would create a feeling of 'esprit de corps' in the provinces themselves. I mean to say if you have a local Board of Control with a local office and secretariat in the capital town of a county and they had all the asylums in their area to inspect—

12,877. Earl Russell: That surely is adding a good deal to the expense if you do nothing more than inspection—if you put a local office and a secretary there?—They would have to have a secretary of some kind.

12,878. Not if the papers were sent to the central office where the filing is now done?—You think not?

Earl Russell: I do not quite see what the point of it would be.

12,879. Chairman: If you have a district Commissioner with an area given to him in which he should reside, and with large visiting powers and powers of supervision, I do not see that we need hamper him really with a great deal of office staff and accommodation?—Would you have only one? Would you have a legal, or a medical, or both.

12,880. I do not know really. I should have thought a medical man would be the better man there. The legal man is more wanted, if I may say so, to see that the law is complied with when questions of

Dr. MONTAGU LOMAX, M.R.C.S.

difficulty come up. You see this would not be certification we would be dealing with here?—No.

12,881. This is the administration of asylums?—Quite.

12,882. I quite agree to the importance of the legal element in certification, and in any question of illegal detention, but that would probably be a matter for the central office on report?—Yes.

12,883. What we are anxious to see is whether by having a responsible local official who would be in touch with the asylums, hear the gossip, in short, of the district, and get to know all about the place, you would be providing a valuable safeguard. It would to some extent lighten the immense labours of the Board of Control?—I think it would.

12,884. It would be a sieve through which the local material would pass in the first instance?—You mean that each of these local Commissioners should have to inspect and report?

12,885. I think so. I think these district Commissioners on the spot would be able to make a much more thorough investigation than the Commissioner who comes down for a couple of days from London?—You would have to have more than one. An enormous amount of work would be connected with drawing up his report.

12,886. Earl Russell: That depends entirely on the size of your districts?—Yes.

12,887. Chairman: If he were a whole-time official with a district of reasonable size under his charge he could do a good deal of inspection; that would be his main job, you see?—Quite, and he would be able to come and go in a much more unexpected way.

12,888. Yes, there would not be the pomp and circumstance of the visit of the Commissioners?—No.

12,889. Earl Russell: Nor would he have to put up at a hotel on the way where his presence would be known?—Quite.

12,890. Chairman: I think that it is a practical suggestion which is well worth following up?—I am sure it is; it is practically the same as the one I have suggested here, only I have two instead of one.

12,891. One has always to keep an eye on expense in these matters?—Obviously, yes.

12,892. And I think for the local man a medical man is better for that job than a legal man would be?—Yes.

12,893. Earl Russell: Can you show us any real help it would be to add a legal man to the medical man in this local inspection?—No, I do not think I can.

12,894. Chairman: I really cannot think of any. It might happen that a case of illegal detention came up where a patient said "I would rather have a talk with a lawyer than a doctor." I can imagine that case being put; but if it were a serious case of doubt it could be referred by the doctor to the central Board, where there would be legal advice. However, that is a detail in your scheme?—Yes.

12,895. Now, I think, Dr. Lomax, we might dwell for a little on the question of private asylums. The only comment I would venture to make on any observations you have on that topic is, that you have not personally had experience of these institutions?—Only as seeing people in them. I have gone to see some patients in them.

12,896. Have you visited some of these private asylums yourself?—Oh yes.

12,897. Have you visited many different types of institutions?—Yes, I have visited small ones and large ones. I mean I have gone there as an alienist to see the patients there.

12,898. Earl Russell: About how many?—I do not think I have been to more than about six.

12,899. Chairman: You must have been to a certain number. I think you have visited Ticehurst professionally?—Yes.

12,900. And Moorcroft?—Yes.

12,901. I would like to ask you this general question. Having seen a number of these institutions, as far as your experience goes, are they well conducted or not?—All the private asylums I have seen I should say were quite well conducted. I have not the least doubt in my own mind that private asylums in England are conducted as well as they are in any part of the world, but I have a fundamental objection to the principal of private asylums at all being owned by private individuals. I do not object to the principle of private asylums which was mentioned yesterday—the case of the rich man who wants to go to a place where he can be surrounded by his comforts and luxuries. I think it ought to exist, but I do not think it ought to be under private proprietorship. I think they ought to be bought up by the local authority or the State, if they are going to nationalise all asylums, and the owners ought to be compensated; and the officers of those asylums ought to be appointed either by the local authority or the State. I am not alone in thinking this. A number of doctors have thought the same. A very eminent alienist 50 years ago, Dr. Bucknill, wrote a book which it would well be worth the while for the Commission to study on the subject, in which the question was discussed. He was a very eminent alienist indeed. He was the Lord Chancellor's Visitor; he was the President of the Medico-Psychological Society, and so on, and so on, and he was most emphatic on the subject in his book. It is the principle of the financial motive that is involved which we want to dissociate from the care of the insane altogether, if we can. I do not think it ought to be to anybody's profit to treat insanity of that type.

12,902. Yes, but will you permit me just to take it by stages for a moment. No doubt the observations of Dr. Bucknill were most valuable, but you say they were made 50 years ago. Since his period we have had the code of 1890, which at least tried to introduce many safeguards in the very context of licensed houses; whether they have been effectual or not I am not here to say, but let me just follow it by stages. You say that so far as you have seen licensed houses yourself professionally, their conduct at least seemed to you satisfactory?—Quite.

12,903. That is an important step. Do not let us minimise that, because it is useful for us to know that you can give that commendation to them. Those that you have seen appeared to you to be well conducted?—Yes.

12,904. And were they full?—Yes, all full.

12,905. The point that occurs to me at that stage is this: Do they not fill a want?—I am sure they do.

12,906. And would you not really deprive people of a facility or a convenience which they want, by converting those licensed houses into State Institutions? Is it not the very idea of their being private places that is their attraction to certain classes of the community?—Quite.

12,907. Earl Russell: It is a new idea that the funds of the State should be used to provide luxuries for the rich?—The rich provide them for themselves.

12,908. They are doing so apparently?—All I mean to say is that the rich pay, and the private proprietor of the asylum makes the profit.

12,909. Chairman: Think of this for a moment. If you were able to show to us that these places in private hands were being badly managed and that they were also places in which patients were being wronged in this sense, that they were being detained when they should not be detained for the motive of making gain out of their infirmities, you would make a strong indictment of the whole system, but are you able to make such a case?—From personal experience, no, but from the experience of attendants of many years' standing in private asylums I should say "Yes," and also from what has been told me by a doctor himself who owned a private asylum and gave it up, because he was unable to reconcile his conscience with certain events which took place. I have not any experience myself at all. I make no imputation whatever upon the owner of any private asylum in the kingdom. I have no evidence to go upon that they take unfair advantage of patients except what has been given to me from outside. I have no personal experience whatever. It is the principle of private proprietorship in what really comes to be the bodies and souls of unhappy people.

12,910. Of course it needs no demonstration, that there is an interest to detain a person who is paying you 20 or 30 guineas a week?—Quite.

Dr. MONTAGU LOMAX, M.R.C.S.

12,911. One may say, of course, equally that there is an interest in the medical profession to keep on attending a wealthy patient; rather more visits are charged perhaps than are necessary. I have even heard it said of my own profession, that there is a tendency to foment a litigation with a wealthy client, but I do not know that it has been established that on that account either the medical profession or the legal profession should be nationalised to remove them from the possible temptation?—No, I do not think so either, but again it is the question of the liberty of the subject largely involved.

12,912. Let me follow that up. If all these institutions are full, then there would be the less motive for these owners of licensed houses to detain persons, just as we know that a doctor in very large practice is anxious to get patients off his books as quickly as he can, or a lawyer with a large practice is probably the best man to go to, because instead of wanting to have you as a client he is regarding you as a nuisance. Now similarly with regard to institutions which have a waiting list, there is no particular motive there to detain one patient for the purpose of making gain out of him, if they are full up?—Not if they are of the same paying class.

12,913. And is there not this also, that an institution will have a much better reputation and be much more attractive if it has a remarkably good rate of discharge?—Yes.

12,914. So I should have thought. While there is of course the pecuniary motive which may be present, there is equally the other motive of establishing a reputation for a home where patients have better chances of recovery than anywhere else?—Certainly there is.

12,915. What is the result of that balancing of considerations; do you think it means this: the abolition of that class of premises?—No, I do not want to abolish them. I want to keep the asylums where the patients can have all the luxuries that they can afford, but what I do want is to remove the financial motive for detaining patients. Of course these places are not all full, I presume. The places I happen to have seen are fairly full, but I presume some are anxious to get more patients into them. It is the principle of private proprietorship that I feel is wrong.

12,916. The accommodation is steadily dwindling, while the population of this country is increasing at the present moment?—Yes.

12,917. Because certain licences are falling in?—Yes.

Earl Russell: I am told they are short already of necessary accommodation.

12,918. Chairman: Yes. (To the witness): You say that private institutions like private nursing homes are quite excellent, but you do not like private proprietorship. Are we not getting very near a contradiction in terms? You would like a private home publicly conducted. I am afraid a private home necessarily has the idea of private proprietorship?—Yes, if it is a private home it has, of course.

12,919. One knows, of course, a great many nursing homes which are very often run by a nurse who has had experience and has taken premises and then runs them, generally in connection with some doctor's practice?—Yes.

12,920. But I have a little difficulty in seeing exactly your idea. You say there is not to be private proprietorship of these homes and yet they are to be private homes. How are we to accommodate these ideas?—Well, I mean there is the country house in nice grounds, and the patient has the surroundings he is used to, the social surroundings he is used to, the comforts he is used to, and the privacy he is used to.

12,921. But who is to run it?—A doctor appointed either by the State or by the local authority; they will appoint the doctors to run the places at a certain salary and appoint the staffs, and so on.

12,922. Earl Russell: If they are State-owned, they will all be run by the Office of Works and have the same kind of garden and the same kind of roof?—I agree; but I am not proposing to nationalise all asylums right off.

12,923. I thought you said the State was to run them?—I said if they were to be nationalised.

12,924. Then who is to own them?—Could they not be bought up by the local authorities in the county?

12,925. There, again, you are asking a local authority to spend public money for providing private luxuries, which is quite a new idea to our administration?—If the patient is paying the cost of the luxuries, it does not make any odds who is asked to provide them.

12,926. Chairman: But it is not consistent with the idea of local government. You could hardly expect any authority to proceed to supply the premises for an institution which is to cater for one class of the community. The answer is: if these people are willing to support their institution, let them support it?—Yes.

Earl Russell: We have not got beyond parks, so far, and perhaps an extra swan, in the way of providing luxuries.

12,927. Chairman: If I may suggest it to you, I think that the provision of possibly even more stringent safeguards is the direction in which more satisfaction would be obtained. I sometimes think it might be better to have more of these institutions rather than fewer of them. I know that view is not entertained by everybody, but I can imagine that they play a rather useful part in the economy of the country?—I think they do, if they are properly inspected. That is the crux of all these asylums.

12,928. If they are properly inspected, then there does not seem to be much real reason for objecting to their being privately owned?—Do not you think that the private asylums, anyhow those that are owned by a board of shareholders, should publish the list of shareholders every year and an annual balance sheet?

Earl Russell: Why?

12,929. Chairman: As Lord Russell says, why? Why should this particular form of industry be selected for this publicity? I will assume it has been well reported upon by efficient inspectors; it has been well run and well conducted, and the patients are properly looked after and well-treated. If that be so, is not the proprietor of the place entitled to say: "I have done my duty; there is no complaint against this place. Why should I publish my income any more than the publican who conducts his public house next door"?—Again, it is the liberty of the subject which is involved. We get hundreds of very serious complaints from private asylums; and we know of instances. There was one the other day in the Harnett case; and, again, the case of Mr. H., who came before you the other day and whom I know well. If he had not escaped, he might easily have been there now, in the same way as Harnett might. Were those asylums properly inspected, if the only solution of the problem of a man's detention is that he should have the opportunity of escaping?

12,930. Earl Russell: How will publishing the balance sheet help that?—The balance sheet would not help that, of course; but what I meant was this: that one would have an idea of the profits made and the extent of the financial motive involved.

12,931. You mean you think you would see when his conscience was getting near the breaking point?—I do not know where the breaking point is, but I am told one of the largest licensed houses in the country to-day is paying its shareholders between 44 and 46 per cent.

12,932. There are plenty of industrial concerns doing that?—I know; but do you think that that sort of percentage ought to be made as profit out of patients who suffer from one of saddest infirmities?

Chairman: I am not sure that that is sound economically, because, as we know, some of the industries, the best conducted, are among the most profitable and they pay very large dividends. You may dislike large dividends in principle; that I can quite understand; but the mere fact that an undertaking pays large dividends does not necessarily mean that it is an undesirable undertaking.

12,933. Earl Russell: If you are conducting the thing properly, what right have you to object to the return?—If you are.

12,934. Chairman: It would rather suggest to me that every doctor who is making more than £5,000 or £6,000 a year ought to publish his accounts, lest it be suggested that he is making too much money out of his patients. It does lend itself to a reductio ad absurdum?—It does.

12,935. Earl Russell: I understood that you have information from attendants who have been for years in these places?—Yes.

12,936. What length of service have the attendants had in any one place?—I have the case of an attendant with 21 years' service.

12,937. 21 years in the same private asylum?—It was not a private asylum in that case; it was a registered hospital for paying patients of a good class.

Earl Russell: You mean it did not make private profit?

Chairman: It cannot, you know.

Witness: But there are others connected with private asylums as well.

12,938. Earl Russell. I thought you said this attendant told you what went on in these licensed houses?—He did.

12,939. How did he know if he had not been there?—I am speaking now of a second one we had.

12,940. How long had he been in a licensed house?—I think he had been there three or four years.

12,941. Have you known other attendants who have been for a long time in licensed houses?—I have got the proofs of two or three, I think.

12,942. I am asking you this because of what the witness said yesterday. The witness said yesterday that they never stayed for more than three months?—I think that that is the case perhaps in some instances, but the proofs of men I have here show that it was evidently much longer than that.

12,943. Chairman: Will that be one of the cases you are going to hand us?—Yes.

12,944. Now we have explored the question of the private institution. I see that you, like so many other witnesses who have favoured us with their views, are strongly in favour of the elimination of the pauperisation element?—Yes, I am.

12,945. That is, to some extent, linked up with the Poor Law institutions. There is a practical difficulty there. Where are we to put the unhappy patient?—There is a difficulty; the practical difficulty is great; I mean to say, 60 per cent. of the patients who come into asylums go through the Poor Law infirmary.

12,946. I wish you would give us your view as to how we are to eliminate the pauper element from the whole administration of the Lunacy Law, if it can be done?—The only way I can see is this. We cannot build mental observation hospitals ad libitum; if the Builders' Union will not build houses, they will not build asylums. We have got to take the asylum infirmaries and hospitals we have got and make the best of them. The infirmary wards, I think, are the worst feature of the asylum system, because not only is the patient often very imperfectly treated, scurvily treated at times, but he is pauperised as well, and all that happens before he is certified; often he is sent there and pauperised straight away. I do not know how you are to get rid of the infirmary wards until you have got mental observation hospitals which will take all classes of patients. Until then you have got to use the infirmary wards; but I should prefer them to be in separate buildings away from the workhouse altogether, if it were possible. I do not see why a patient should be pauperised, even a poor man, simply because he has become insane. He has got to be sent somewhere; he may be an urgent case. He is taken, in the first place, to the police station, and then is sent straight on to the infirmary, and I do not know anywhere else you can send him to, except you have these observation hospitals built, and it will take a long time to build them. Unless you empty an asylum of all its inmates and turn it into an observation hospital, pure and simple, for all classes.

12,947. That would only be possible in a large centre of population?—That is all.

12,948. Earl Russell: You can only do that where you have three or four asylums to play with?—Quite so.

12,949. Chairman: However, you subscribe to the view that as far as possible the element of pauperisation should be dissociated from insanity?—Certainly, as far as it can be.

12,950. Now there is one matter which affects the medical profession and which I see you allude to in your communication to us, which is rather a serious matter. I see you state, "It is no secret that many medical men are refusing in the absence of these safeguards" (that is, safeguards of their professional position) "to certify to insanity at all." Do you find that, in consequence of the legal risks which medical men run, there is a reluctance to certify?—I do.

12,951. Of course, if medical men are deterred by those risks from certifying, is there not a danger that the whole machinery of the Lunacy Law will break down?—Absolutely; but then, if you have the mental observation system, the man who certifies, in the first place, does not run a risk at all. He certifies merely that the person is detainable.

12,952. Mr. Micklem: Why does he not run exactly the same risk as the doctor does to-day, except that it is for a limited time, so to speak?—He does not certify the patient insane; he certifies the patient detainable.

12,953. Suppose the patient alleges afterwards that he was not detainable?—Then the magistrate comes in in three days' time, and backs up the doctor or not. He has then to write the order for the detention for 28 days.

Earl Russell: He will still be shot at.

Mr. Micklem: The position is just the same.

Earl Russell: It is only that the measure of damages may be a little different if it is three days instead of 12 years.

Witness: How are you to avoid it?

Mr. Walter Stewart: This is the real point, I suggest: would you put it to witness, Sir? If it is a true judicial proceeding, there is absolute privilege for the medical man.

12,954. Chairman: I am afraid Dr. Lomax does not suggest that; that is not his case to us at all. What I want to get is this: I see the value of the observation period, and you may say that a doctor takes much less responsibility when he says, "This man may be detained for 28 days"; but I am afraid he puts once more his professional opinion in peril, because an action would lie against him equally for that detention as would lie against him for a certificate of insanity; the damages might be less?—That is so.

12,955. Mr. Micklem: In the case you refer to, Dr. Bond, I think, detained the patient for six hours, and he was held liable for £25,000 damages?—Yes, but then Dr. Bond was exceeding his powers.

12,956. Chairman: I think they linked up the whole of the periods. But whatever be the view, even suppose the judicial element entered into it, as Mr. Stewart suggests, there might still have to be a certain amount of detention preceding that judicial investigation. Even so, I mean the most ideal system that could be devised would always involve a certain interference with the liberty of the subject. I think what has been suggested there is that you must take your chance of that; but one is anxious to see that the doctor who has sincerely tried to do his duty, not only as a doctor, but as a citizen carrying out the law, should not be deterred by the idea that he is exposing himself to unknown legal terrors and, possibly, to ruin?—Certainly not.

12,957. That is an intolerable state of affairs?—Absolutely.

Mrs. Mathew: Would notification cover these cases, as is the case with notifiable diseases?

12,958. Chairman: Again, notification is not a ground of action. Detention is a ground of action always. It is the actual detaining of a person against his will, which is an interference with his liberty, which results in damages. Of course, the doctor knows, when he grants the certificate, that he ought to do it with every sense of responsibility; but if he does it sincerely and honestly, even though mistakenly, he ought to be protected?—He is now, is he not?

12,959. He has to protect himself in a court of law, and you know what that means. Now an ordinary witness giving testimony in a court of law is protected absolutely?—And you think the evidence on the doctor's certificate ought to have the same privilege?

12,960. It is just a question whether that is not giving it too high a privilege, because too high a privilege might have, as its correlative, carelessness?—Quite.

12,961. However, you have not any particular suggestion to make on that topic?—I have not, except that after the Harnett case I believe a number of doctors suggested that Lloyd's should be approached and liability should be underwritten.

12,962. That is not a proper remedy. I mean, we should not have the medical profession put in that position?—Certainly not.

Chairman: Those are all the questions I have to put to you, Dr. Lomax. I can assure you that we are very much indebted to you for your evidence. My colleagues may now wish to put some further questions to you.

12,963. Mr. Micklem: Dr. Lomax, I only wish to put one question to you. I have been very much impressed with a good deal of your evidence, and I think it will be of considerable value to us, but there is one part of it I am troubled about still, and that is your evidence as to ill-treatment. You very frankly told us that although you have had considerable experience in two hospitals, you have never yourself seen any instance of it, and that on only one or two occasions has it been brought to your notice by patients?—Yes.

12,964. Now during the last three or four years at least this question of ill-treatment has been pressed very hard, I think, partly by yourself and certainly by the many Reform Societies and others?—Yes.

12,965. And statements have gone about and have been issued publicly as to this question of ill-treatment?—Yes.

12,966. So that in every mental hospital in this country the medical men must have been on the lookout for it very carefully, must they not?—We hope so, yes.

12,967. I mean, if it was brought to their attention—you know what your profession is, and you know the very high standard it attains—they would take every means in their power to ascertain if in their particular hospital such a thing did exist?—Certainly; if the reports were brought to their attention.

12,968. Do you think we can get any corroboration from the medical men at all of the statements that you have been making?—No, I do not know that you can, because when I was an asylum doctor myself, I should not have been able to corroborate any of it.

12,969. But if when you were in the asylum you had the knowledge which you suggest you have got now?—I had not got the knowledge of ill-treatment that I have got now.

12,970. If you had had that knowledge, you would have been very awake to the fact, and I put it to you that medical men throughout the country must have been taking that attitude for some time?—Yes, I think so.

12,971. Do you think we shall get any corroboration from them of the statements that you make?—No; because I think that a great deal more care is being taken now.

12,972. That is to say, there is much less ill-treatment?—I cannot say, except that the patients and attendants who have come to me have not told me of things that have happened in recent years. The last bad case I heard was the one I gave you, in 1920; and I am perfectly convinced of this, that the attendants have been very much more careful, and doctors, too. I think it has been due a good deal to the public attention which has been paid to the subject. But I must explain—I want quite clearly to explain that my knowledge of these things has not been personal; it has been due to accumulation of evidence which has absolutely convinced me by its mass, its volume, its congruity, its character altogether. I have investigated it personally in a number of instances by examining patients who told me. I formed a very high opinion of their veracity, of their reliability, of their sanity. I have been told it by ex-attendants and ex-nurses as well. I am going to give you the proofs of two or three. The conviction has been borne into my mind irresistibly that a great deal of ill-treatment goes on which we never hear anything of.

12,973. Would you not say that it did go on, because you have told us that none of this evidence was recent?—No; I do not think that anything has reached me within the last three years.

12,974. Miss Madeleine Symons: Dr. Lomax, there is one point I should like to ask you about. You told us that you thought that this preliminary method of detention was necessary, perhaps particularly in early cases. Do you mean that you are contemplating that all the early cases should be dealt with, either in these observation hospitals or as voluntary boarders in existing hospitals? You are not advocating the establishment of clinics without certification, or are you advocating those as well?—Certainly I am. I advocate strongly the hospital clinics or the mental observation hospitals without certification in all these instances. I advocate very much the system of hospital clinics, if it can be done on the principle on which it is done in France. The clinic there is a sort of annexe to the hospital or asylum, and the patient is sent in there uncertified, and is not certified in the clinic at all. They are treated there as patients; they are treated in a variety of ways. I think it would be an admirable thing if we could do that in England. The difficulties are immense as regards hospitals, because in our large towns the hospitals have not got the facilities for having clinics; the hospitals can hardly support themselves as it is. If they are going to be asked to make large additions to their wards, I do not think they could do it.

12,975. There are a few now, are there not?—Yes.

12,976. You are not suggesting that this preliminary method of detention should apply to them, are you? Are you suggesting that they should be voluntary?—They are voluntary, but I think that every voluntary boarder who goes into a hospital clinic must sign a paper of some kind, by which he gives the people in his clinic the power of controlling him, if it is required, because an early case often requires control much more than a later case. These hospital clinics would practically be half-way asylums; they would have to be under some control or other; they would have to be inspected and reported upon. I do not see who is to inspect and report upon them except the Board of Control or some body of that kind. You cannot treat the patients in these hospital clinics like the patients of an ordinary type who can come and go as they like, except they go as out-patients only and not as in-patients; but when once a voluntary boarder has gone as an in-patient into a hospital clinic, I do not think that patient ought to have the power of leaving at any moment he likes by signing a paper, and then perhaps going outside the asylum and throwing himself under an omnibus or under a train. They are often people who need to be protected from themselves. I am speaking as an alienist here,

Dr. MONTAGU LOMAX, M.R.C.S.

12,977. Earl Russell: Dr. Lomax, I have just come across this sentence in your précis; you were asked about part of it before. "I would impress upon the Commission that even the Board of Control admit that patients are often wrongly certified and unjustly detained." Do they admit that? You refer to the Report for 1922, and you say there are 22 cases who were not insane upon admission?—That is so.

12,978. That does not show they were wrongfully certified, does it?—No, because the Board of Control say it only means that they were not insane on being admitted; but it does not prove that they were wrongfully certified a day or two before. It leads to a very grave suspicion.

12,979. Nor does it prove that they are unjustly detained if they were found to be not insane on admission and set free. Do you mean that these 22 people who were found not insane upon admission were kept in the asylum?—Certainly.

12,980. How long for?—Probably for a month, until the discharging committee met again. They are kept in for that time, and I do not think the superintendent of an asylum has the power to refuse to accept them. If they come under certificates, he has to take them. All he can do is to refer them to the Board of Control, who send down and examine them and discharge them.

12,981. He can let them out on trial, of course?—I do not think he would as a matter of fact, for the first few weeks.

12,982. Why not—if they were not insane?—I think he would sooner wait till the first discharging day. He would not do anything at all until he had sent the papers up to the Board of Control to be overhauled. I think the law ought to be altered in that respect. I think the superintendent ought to have the power to refuse to accept a patient of that kind.

12,983. I am asking you about a power he has got under the law now. Do you say that when a patient is brought who is not insane the medical superintendent would not send him out on trial until the committee met?—I do.

12,984. A conscientious superintendent?—I do not think he has any option to refuse to take the man in.

12,985. He can take him in on the asylum books, but when he is sent out on trial he is still on the asylum books?—You mean sent out on trial the next day, or sent out for a few days in any case to see how he is going on? You cannot establish the sanity of a man straight away.

12,986. If he keeps him a few days, that means he is not sure he is not insane. I am taking you at your own stage, where you say he has found the patient is not insane. I ask you then, why should he keep him and not let him out on trial?—I suppose he would be able to, but he would have to send the certificates up to the Board of Control, and the Board of Control would have to say whether the patient is to be discharged.

Earl Russell: That does not prevent him letting the patient out on trial.

12,987. Chairman: He has to get at the visitors before he can let him out on trial?—I think not.

Chairman: I do not think he could really let him out on probation without the intervention of the visiting committee.

12,988. Mrs. Mathew: Dr. Lomax, some of the things you have been telling us you say are three years old. I would like to come to something a little more recent. What about the asylum food? Have you any recent knowledge of asylum food?—I have knowledge only of the Report of the Subcommittee on Dietaries, which made very startling recommendations as to improvements in the food required; that is all I know. Of course, I know from internal sources that the food has improved a lot in the course of the last few years, but the Report of the Cobb Committee stated that the food, the thought, was quite good. As soon as they appointed the Departmental Committee, the report was diametrically opposed to that; they state that the food wants very serious improvement.

12,989. You have no later knowledge?—I have not, except that I hear every now and then from patients to thank me for having a kipper sometimes which they never had before. That is the only sort of personal knowledge I have.

12,990. And you would favour the light late supper?—Certainly.

12,991. And the later bedding?—Certainly. I think it is an awful mistake to go from half-past five to seven o'clock the next morning, considering what the quality of the last meal is; it is extremely poor in quality—bread and margarine, and weak tea; and they have not anything at all to eat till eight o'clock the next morning.

12,992. And that, again, is all a question of finance, is it not?—Purely.

12,993. Sir David Drummond: What view have you, Dr. Lomax, on the question of female attendants looking after male patients?—I think it is an excellent plan. Wherever it has been tried, it seems to have succeeded; that is to say, I have heard, in the Scotch system, of asylums in which a number of females are employed in the male wards, and the results have been excellent.

12,994. You would not object to it?—Not in the very least.

12,995. You know that we had strong evidence yesterday against it?—I know that some of the representatives of the Asylum Workers' Union do not approve of it; but it strikes me that it would be an excellent plan, especially in the hospital wards, to have female nurses for male wards. I do not see why it should not succeed in the asylums; it certainly succeeds in the hospitals.

12,996. I was very much struck with a statement in your book on page 102 with regard to the administration of croton oil. You state there that the effect in some cases is not only to scour out the bowels but to strip off the mucous membrane?—Yes.

12,997. Have you seen that yourself—I am speaking as a pathologist?—I do not wish to dispute the actual portion of the bowel which was stripped, but all I can say is that shreds of skin were frequently to be seen.

12,998. Mucous is often mistaken for mucous membrane—that is just the point?—Quite.

12,999. I notice that you advocate that larger sections of the asylum should be allocated to the hospital part?—Yes.

13,000. You are very much impressed with that?—Much impressed.

13,001. I thoroughly appreciate that, I must say. Just one more question. I think you have stated that certain people are wrongfully certified?—Yes.

13,002. Do you mean that they are absolutely sane, or that they are insane people who ought not to have been certified? It was not the best treatment to put them into an asylum. Do you mean they are actually sane people who are certified?—No. I think in a number of cases that certification does not prove insanity; that the facts related on the certificate do not prove certifiable insanity.

13,003. But you do not mean to say that they are actually sane people?—No, not actually sane. I do not think anybody is certified without some reason or other, often an inadequate one; but I am perfectly certain it is an honest certificate as far as the doctor who certifies is concerned. He may not be a very capable man, but he is doing the best he can.

13,004. It is his opinion?—Quite so; it is his opinion.

Chairman: Thank you very much for your attendance to-day, Dr. Lomax, and for the help you have given us.

WESTMINSTER, S.W.1

TWENTY-THIRD DAY.

Tuesday, 10th March, 1925.

MEMBERS PRESENT :

THE RT. HON. H. P. MACMILLAN, K.C. (in the Chair)

THE EARL RUSSELL.

SIR THOMAS HUTCHISON, BART.

SIR HUMPHRY ROLLESTON, BART., K.C.B., M.D.

SIR ERNEST HILEY, K.B.E.

MR. W. A. JOWITT, K.C.

MR. N. MICKLEM, K.C.

MR. H. SNELL, M.P.

MRS. C. J. MATHEW.

MISS MADELEINE SYMONS.

MR. P. BARTER (Secretary)

MR. W. FAIRLEY (Assistant Secretary)

Mr. Cremlyn: May I intervene just for one moment, Sir? I am asked to put this to you as Counsel for the National Society for Lunacy Reform. You recollect that a certain statement, a somewhat long statement, was sent in, and you took exception to a purple patch of it, and also to one or two other matters.

Chairman: I remember.

Mr. Cremlyn: I have just to ask you whether you consider that you could in any way make any use of that document, or attach it to the case, if it were considerably curtailed or cut down.

Chairman: To tell you the truth, I think it would be a pity to ask you to take the trouble to cut it down. Really what I was concerned with was this, that I did not want the public to get an idea that all institutions were open to those criticisms, which might produce a degree of alarm and unhappiness. That was affecting my mind. I thought that some of the statements in it were rather extreme if made public. But I have read it through myself, and I was proposing to keep it by me until we come to prepare our report, because there are some drafting suggestions in it which may be useful; and therefore, although we did not mean to publish it, I do not think it will be lost sight of.

Mr. Cremlyn: If you please, Sir; that was what was in my mind. I thought that you did indicate that you would do something of that kind, and that the document would not be lost sight of. A kind of idea seems to have been created in some minds that it might be said you were giving a preferential treatment to the British Medical Association by publishing theirs and not publishing ours.

Chairman: Of course, the two documents are rather different in type. Your document would be quite useful to us for its practical suggestions, and I shall read it in that light; but I do not think it would be reasonable to ask you to recast it merely for a few passages which were really written from the advocate's point of view.

Mr. Cremlyn: If you please.

Alderman J. G. TAGGART, J.P., and Alderman Sir WILLIAM HODGSON, called and examined.

13,005. Chairman: This morning we are to have the advantage of evidence from the Mental Hospitals Association, who are represented by Alderman Taggart and Sir William Hodgson. I think that the latter also represents the County Councils Association. Perhaps the most convenient course would be to take Mr. Taggart's general evidence first, and then to take the more detailed evidence which Sir William Hodgson has to give us. First of all, would you tell us, Mr. Taggart, what is the Mental Hospitals Association; we like to know the constitution of the bodies who are before us?—In the first place, it is a body consisting of representatives of nearly the whole of the 98 asylums in the country.

13,006. A voluntary Association?—Yes, and at the present moment some 85 per cent. of the authorities are members of the Association.

13,007. Do they all appoint delegates to your Association?—They do; they appoint an executive that carries on the work from year to year. They meet in July of each year, and they appoint an executive to carry forward the work.

13,008. What is their function—what do they do?—Springing from that executive there are one or two things; there is the ordinary executive body of the Association, and there is a Conciliation Committee consisting of ten of that executive body, who also meet a similar body of the National Asylum Workers' Union, which is the recognised organisation of the employees; and the Conciliation Board so constituted has been very effective in dealing with disputes during the last two or three years of the existence of the Association.

13,009. It acts really as a Whitley Council, I suppose?—In that sense, yes.

13,010. As a means of discussing and deciding questions arising between what one may call the employers' interests and the employees' interests in this matter—that is one important function?—Exactly.

13,011. Does the Association discharge other functions?—It takes a general interest in the management of institutions generally in so far as it allows a combination of the two; invariably the chairmen, or the leading members of these various asylum committees, meet to compare notes together, so that they can, and do, assist others in a variety of ways. We consider the advisory work of the Association to be very very important indeed.

13,012. Then the membership of the body, I take it, consists of representatives of different local authorities?—Quite.

13,013. They are not medical men, but are gentlemen engaged in local government?—They may be medical men, but they are simply the elected members on the visiting body in every case.

13,014. They might happen to be medical men, as Sir William is himself, or they might happen to be lawyers?—Quite.

13,015. But in their capacity as members of the Mental Hospitals Association they are really persons engaged in local government, in this aspect of it?—Quite.

13,016. Have you offices and a secretary and some organisation?—We have a permanent secretary, and a permanent office at the Guildhall in London.

13,017. And periodical meetings?—Of the executive, yes, at the Guildhall.

13,018. Do you publish reports?—Yes, which are sent to each of the authorities.

13,019. It would be rather interesting to have one or two of your reports?—We have several copies; I will hand them in. (Handing in the same.)

13,020. Then, coming to yourself, you are a past President of the Association, are you not?—I am.

13,021. And you are at present a representative of Liverpool on the Lancashire Asylums Board?—Yes.

13,022. On which, I think, you are at present the oldest member, having served since 1890?—Quite right, with one slight hiatus due to political misfortune.

13,023. That sounds as if you had stood for Parliament and had not gone in?—I have not gone that far yet.

13,024. You are Chairman of the Winwick Mental Hospital, which is one of the six mental hospitals under the Lancashire Asylums Board?—That is so.

13,025. You are an Alderman of the City of Liverpool and have been a Member of the City Council for the last 37 years; and you are a Justice of the Peace for the City of Liverpool?—Yes.

13,026. So that you have obviously had a large experience of local government and its association with the work of mental treatment?—I claim that.

13,027. I understood from the précis you have been kind enough to send us that you propose to confine your evidence to certain more general considerations resulting from your experience?—Yes.

13,028. And, in the first place, as a general ideal in any reforms I gather that you want to eliminate as far as possible the pauperisation element which at present enters into lunacy administration?—Quite; I feel very strongly upon that point.

13,029. Of course, you are alive to the fact no doubt that there are certain difficulties in entirely eliminating that element?—Yes.

13,030. I suppose one may take it that a considerable proportion of the patients are persons who would be paupers in any event?—Very slight.

13,031. Is that so?—I should imagine less than five per cent.

13,032. Then may we take it in your experience that the larger proportion of the patients have become in law paupers in consequence of their illness, rather than as being members of what one may call the pauper population from the beginning?—Yes, that, together with the procedure, makes them paupers.

13,033. Looking at it again broadly, if through the misfortune of mental illness a person has to be maintained in an asylum which is kept up out of public funds, at present such a person, being rate-aided, is treated as a pauper—is not that so?—Yes; he would be.

13,034. Then the ideal you place before us is this, that an ordinary citizen, who is not in any sense a pauper but who becomes afflicted with mental illness, should be in the same position as such a person becoming afflicted with any ordinary illness?—Typhoid, or smallpox, yes.

13,035. Who goes to a hospital, receives treatment, and returns to his life without having incurred any stigma of pauperisation?—Quite. May I indicate what is in my mind?

13,036. Please?—Liverpool, unfortunately, has 3,000 lunatic patients. Through the operation of the law, all of them are pauper patients.

13,037. Because they all reside and are treated in rate-aided institutions?—Yes, but for these rate-aided institutions there is one governing union. There are 27 unions in the whole of Lancashire, but in one particular Liverpool union, of the 3,000 patients I venture to say 2,800 of them are not at all paupers in any sense or shape. Although they receive rate aid, yet their friends do contribute directly to the poor rate, not only by way of paying rates, but they pay a contribution on top of that. It is the practice for the Poor Law authority to collect what they can from the relatives of the patient, and in many cases that I know the Poor Law authorities are able to get practically the whole 20s. in the pound that they pay for the maintenance of the patient.

13,038. But does such a patient not exchange his position into that of a private patient?—No.

13,039. I thought that if a person entered an asylum on the basis of a pauper, but the relatives contributed sufficient for his maintenance in the institution, the patient changed over from a pauper status to that of a private patient?—That is true. What I speak of is with regard to local authority patients that are sent to each of the six county asylums in Lancashire. The unions in question send them, and they are subject to a precept by the Lancashire Asylums Board—that is the authority. The friends of the patients who have to pay this money do not pay to the Asylums Board at all, but they pay to each of the 27 unions who themselves have to pay the money that is recovered from them by precept.

13,040. They are contributory to the central board?—Quite, if any money was paid to the central board over and above the pauper charge, then they would be transferred to the private side, if such exists, and there is one asylum only of the six where it does so exist.

13,041. That seems rather special to your district, because of the existence of the Board?—Yes.

13,042. In the ordinary case where guardians are chargeable for a pauper lunatic who is in an asylum, and the relatives come forward and pay for the patient, the patient has the status thereafter of a private patient?—I do not think so; that is not my experience.

Earl Russell: You must remember the pauper charge only covers maintenance, it is not the whole cost.

13,043. Chairman: Yes, but I thought we had some evidence that patients changed their status from paupers to private patients, if contributions are made by their relatives?—Unless there is a private side to the asylum, that cannot possibly be so. I am certain they have them in Cheshire.

13,044. It was not suggested that they were separated from the other patients, but they had a different status?—No, a different status entirely; we separate them, and they are treated privately; they have different treatment, a better class of society.

13,045. Now in what cases do you treat patients as private patients and give them those advantages in your asylums in Lancashire?—In the private accommodation in question the furniture is better, there is carpet on the floor as against the absence of it on the pauper side. The food is pretty much the same, it being good in each case. There are other comforts:—a smaller number, say, of five, six, or seven, in a small ward as against possibly ten in a similar ward on the pauper side.

13,046. Just to show you what we have in mind, we have had evidence from the London County Council, and they informed us that where patients who had begun as pauper patients paid 24s. 6d. per week, the patient was transferred to a private list and had that status, but did not receive any differential treatment; but that may be confined or course to the London County Council institutions and possibly some other local authorities?—I am afraid that is peculiar to London.

13,047. Earl Russell: I think Mr. Keene told us it was the law?—If we had a pauper patient in any of our Lancashire asylums whose friends came and relieved the Poor Law authority, we would willingly transfer the patient in question to a private side, and the patient would get different treatment; he would get, for instance, drives into the country.

13,048. Chairman: We have the patient who starts his asylum career as a pauper. What machinery have you for transferring him into the other category of a private patient? How does that happen with you?—We simply transfer him upon the request of the Poor Law authority. If the Poor Law authority do not pay, we transfer him to the other side, because the other authorities are paying instead. We simply transfer him from one building to another.

13,049. So far as your Board is concerned, it is indifferent to you whether you receive the payment from the Poor Law authorities, or from the patient's friends?—Quite.

13,050. But if the Poor Law authorities recover from the relatives, do they then apprise you of that fact, and do you then transfer the patient to private treatment?—No; we know nothing of the patient's conditions. We have no opportunity of knowing when the patient comes to us whether he is a millionaire or a miner.

13,051. Where do your private patients come to then?—Direct to the institution.

13,052. Then apparently the result of the way in which things are worked with you is this, that, once a pauper in your institutions, always a pauper?—With few exceptions, yes. We have known a few transferable.

13,053. I should have thought a more satisfactory method would be that if the Poor Law authority contributory to your Board received payment for a particular patient, that should be notified to you, and that patient should then have the status of a private patient rather than that of a pauper patient, because he was maintaining himself in your institution?—We think that may be so in many cases. Our present charge is 19s. 10d. to the Poor Law union for the maintenance of our patients. It does not include the rental charge, which may be 5s. per head per week. The standing charge, of course, is borne by the County Council authority, who are the owners of the building, but the permanent charge being 19s. 10d., that is all that the union are asked to pay us, and all we demand from them. If they collected the whole amount—we have no evidence of anything of the kind; I cannot conceive them collecting the whole of the money, because the person's friends who would be able to pay the union 19s. 10d. would surely stretch a point when they know they can be put on the private side for 24s.

13,054. If a patient comes to you direct as a private patient what is the charge for it?—We charge 24s.

13,055. So that the difference seems to be 4s. 2d.?—Yes. Of course that does vary, you know.

13,056. Naturally, but does that difference represent what you may call the standing charges, or does it represent the cost of the additional comforts that you give to the private patient?—In the one case the County Council authority pays the standing charge, the rental charge, so to speak; but when the private patient is sent to us he pays no part of the rental charges.

13,057. So that the 4s. 2d. evidently represents the difference in the standard of the comfort of the private patient?—Practically.

Mrs. Mathew: Is 24s. the full charge for maintenance?

13,058. Chairman: No, it does not include standing charges?—There are 24s. and 32s., and even £2 odd. We get voluntary offers from people in better positions in our asylums to secure exceptional treatment, and in one asylum we have to provide for that, a suite of rooms or a special attendant upon one patient, for two or three guineas a week.

13,059. Then 24s. is the minimum which entitles one to the status of a private patient in your institution?—Yes.

13,060. Mr. Snell: Does that include all the overhead charges?—No, not the standing charges.

13,061. Chairman: They are paid out of the county rate?—Yes. Some private patients pay as high as two and three guineas.

13,062. Now I would like to examine with you a statement you made just now, which was very interesting, namely, that out of your 3,000 patients you are of opinion that, roughly, as many as 2,800, not being paupers before, become paupers in consequence of their affliction?—Quite, and through the procedure.

13,063. Under the present legal system?—Yes.

13,064. Now one must bear in mind the difference between the case of the ordinary citizen who has an illness, and who goes to a general hospital, and the mentally affected in this respect, that unfortunately many of the mental cases are cases which are irrecoverable. The ordinary patient goes into a general hospital and remains there generally for a period of weeks, and is then restored to health and to society; whereas a considerable proportion of the inmates of institutions for the insane unhappily have to remain there for long periods and some even for life?—Yes.

13,065. Now there is that difference, is there not?—There is.

13,066. It is rather a striking difference is course?—But I do not see the ill effect of it.

13,067. It means that the cost of these cases that are permanent must necessarily be very much heavier, because it is far more prolonged than it is in the case of a relatively short treatment for a passing disease or ailment?—Does it matter whether it is an asylum, or hospital, if the rate pays?

13,068. Is it your idea that while the rates should pay for the treatment of the mentally afflicted, at the same time they should be removed out of the category of pauper patients?—I am rather quarrelling with the existing circumstances. Six people on the average go mentally wrong per week in Liverpool, and are so removed. There are potentially known to the medical fraternity in the town probably hundreds of cases who are not sufficiently advanced in mental illness to be certifiable at the moment. No provision is made. I do not want to animadvert upon the medical fraternity in the slightest degree, because I am a poor layman; but there is no opportunity given to the medical fraternity of segregating their particular patients who are in the incipient stages of insanity.

13,069. We are rather trespassing upon a topic I am going to ask you about later. For the moment, I am concerned with this aspect. We should all like, if practicable, to eliminate as far as possible the idea of pauperisation, but there are several points of difficulty in the idea; one is this, for instance, that many cases have to be dealt with at once and must be taken to some place for their own protection and for the protection of the public. At present there seems to be no place to which such persons can be taken other than to Poor Law institutions. The moment they get inside a Poor Law institution they receive Poor Law assistance, and then automatically there attaches to them the status of pauper by the mere operation of law. Then some of them pass out and recover, merely transitory cases, but for the time being they have been subject to the stigma. On the other hand, others pass into rate aided institutions where they may remain for indefinite periods supported by the rates. Have you thought out practically how you could dissociate the administration in both those aspects from this element of pauperisation?—Yes.

13,070. What practical ideas have occurred to you?—I think under the Public Health Act we ought to be able to take the incipient case of insanity which is not removable to the Poor Law institution in the first instance to a clinic attached to a general hospital. I can see no stigma attaching to that; that is maintained by the same public rate.

13,071. Earl Russell: The hospital maintained by the rate?—Yes, it is so in Liverpool—the Infectious Diseases Hospital I am speaking of.

Chairman: That is not a general hospital.

13,072. Earl Russell: You said a general hospital?—I beg your pardon, I meant a corporation hospital. I mean the ordinary public hospitals where we deal with tubercular cases; they are all on the rate.

13,073. Chairman: Your idea is that mental ailments should be dealt with as one of the classes of disease with which the public health authorities concern themselves?—Typhoid, tuberculosis, venereal disease and the like.

13,074. Yes, and that treatment should be devised rather on those lines?—Yes.

13,075. Take your clinic, the attendance at which, of course I agree, if such a clinic were established, would involve no pauperising element. That might be satisfactory enough for the initial stages, but suppose the patient is found to be certifiable and requires permanent treatment in an asylum, what is your suggestion at that stage?—Then you would have to revert to the present system, bad as it is; I see no alternative, but I am certain if the first step were taken a very large number of people, who are at the moment waiting to be worse before they can be treated for being better, would never go near an asylum.

13,076. We have heard some interesting evidence on that point. You might entirely obviate a large number of persons reaching the asylums at all?—Quite; that is our hope.

13,077. But under the present system, or any reformed system, you do not see any means of obviating the ultimate pauper status of permanent patients, or of patients who have to be relegated to an asylum in the long run?—No, except the abolition of the Poor Law, which has been suggested.

13,078. That is rather a big issue which we cannot go into, but the position is that a number of persons who are ill mentally perhaps only for a short time have, unfortunately, under the existing system, to incur this stigma of pauperisation, and you propose that that might be obviated by reforms in other directions?—There is no other stigma except the Poor Law stigma attaching to it.

13,079. Take a person who unfortunately becomes violent in the streets of your town and has to be dealt with at once, at the moment he is taken to a police station by a policeman; do you suggest that he would be taken to your clinic?—I think so, in the first instance, yes; I should use it as a sieve.

13,080. You would need to set up a new institution or associate an institution with some of the existing ones?—We could extend one of our many hospitals.

13,081. You would have a mental department there?—Yes.

13,082. Which would have the necessary means of restraining persons who were violent?—Of course, if they were very very violent—it is the question of degree in every case—that I should leave to the particular medical superintendent in charge of that particular clinic.

13,083. A very violent case might have to be sent to an asylum?—Clearly.

13,084. But you would wish to eliminate the stage of the Poor Law?—Yes, and to establish the treatment for the persons who were suffering and were ultimately going wrong, and could be treated to prevent them going wrong.

13,085. Have you in Liverpool at present special hospitals for infectious diseases?—We have.

13,086. Have you a clinic for tuberculosis?—Yes.

13,087. And a clinic for venereal diseases?—Yes, four.

13,088. Do they have in-patients as well as out-patients in this clinic?—No, all out-patients at the venereal disease clinic.

13,089. But for tuberculosis, all in-patients?—Partly in and partly out in one place, but mostly in-patients.

13,090. Have you separate premises provided for these patients?—Yes.

13,091. Do you contemplate that if a mental clinic were established to which incipient cases might resort and which might be treated as a clearing house, you would have to provide different premises?—I think we could do it with our present premises in Liverpool, with a little extension perhaps.

13,092. You have mentioned six cases a week—a much larger number would come in if you had treatment for incipient cases?—I apprehend so, in the first instance.

13,093. And you think you would have accommodation for dealing with those cases?—I think so, and we have several houses attached to parks which were recently purchased; we have two or three large mansions on the outskirts of the city which could be admirably used in this way. I see no physical difficulty in the way whatever as far as the Corporation is concerned.

13,094. You would have a clinic established there to which patients who were in incipient stages might be brought for advice and diagnosis?—Yes.

13,095. You would also contemplate that in these premises there would be beds for those patients?—Both in and out patients, I hope, would be provided for.

13,096. That would be the kind of sieve, as you call it, through which the cases would pass, and the ultimate fate of those patients would be either to be restored to society, or to be passed on after study and observation through certification to the asylum?—Quite.

13,097. Probably of course Liverpool, like other progressive cities, has means of dealing with cases which might be difficult in less wealthy communities?—I daresay Lancashire as a whole could do the same.

13,098. Earl Russell: But Lancashire as a whole is a wealthy county?—It is one-ninth of the rateable value and one-eighth of the population, and Liverpool is one-twenty-sixth.

13,099. Chairman: You see we have to legislate also for rural districts where you cannot do this thing so perfectly?—Speaking again of Lancashire, there are 33 corporations who constitute the asylums authority under the Lancashire Asylums Board Act of 1890, this central authority consisting of 60 members, a quarter from the county, a quarter from Liverpool, a quarter from Manchester and Salford, and a quarter from Bury, Bolton and places of that description. There can be no doubt that the whole of the county and the whole of the boroughs in that county could fix upon a scheme. As regards the outlying places, like Macclesfield, or places just across the boundary in Derbyshire, or, if our friends in Cheshire wanted assistance, I see no reason why there might not be a combination of authorities in that way.

13,100. Earl Russell: Take a place like Wilts or Dorset?—They would be no worse off, even if we were doing well.

13,101. Chairman: If we have to suggest legislation to deal with the country at large, we have to look at the districts that are less well off than your district?—If you would give us permission—do not tread on our tail, let us go ahead. If Lancashire can beat London, so much the better for England.

13,102. What Manchester thinks to-day, we are told, London thinks to-morrow. But do you suggest that the provision of facilities of that sort might be made optional in the first instance, and would be taken advantage of by some of the larger authorities, and that that example might ultimately permeate the whole community?—Quite. We think in Lancashire we are sufficiently strong, if we had the power, to put it in practice, and we think that (all things considered) it would be a benefit. After all, it is no advantage to Lancashire to have a raving lunatic in Dorsetshire.

13,104. Chairman: Of course, in a highly organised community you can have a very much better system with facilities of all sorts; but unfortunately people become insane throughout the whole of the country, and it is much more difficult to deal with cases, say, in a small rural area where there is nothing but a small Poor Law institution with a superintendent and a porter?—Does not that apply to any other disease as well, even in the smaller places?

13,105. That is quite true. Then would you suggest that, taking advantage of the increased transport facilities that exist nowadays, you might have in the larger counties some central institution to which the patients might be brought in the first place?—Quite. I think an arrangement of that kind could be made.

13,106. Earl Russell: Or even a group of counties, if they were poor and sparsely populated?—Yes. I see no reason why that should not obtain.

13,107. Chairman: These clinics which deal at present with other diseases are, of course, partly supported by grants?—Yes, some of them will be.

13,108. In fact there is a large grant?—You mean from the State?

13,109. Yes?—50 per cent.

13,110. I thought it was a 50-50 basis?—Yes.

13,111. And the other 50 per cent. is supplied by the local taxation?—Yes.

13,112. You would contemplate, I take it, that a grant would be made for the mental clinics as well?—I would hope so. We are complaining that the 4s. given to the union is quite inadequate now; it is a mere bagatelle. When the rate was 8s. per week for the maintenance of a pauper patient the 4s. was quite right; it was stereotyped in the Act of Parliament then; but now we are charging at the lowest 19s. 10d., the 4s. is out of all reason.

13,113. When one contemplates a fresh charge on public moneys one always looks to see whether there are any accompanying economies. Do you think that the institution of clinics of that sort might possibly decrease to some extent the asylum population and save the extension of buildings there?—I think so—I am sure of it in fact. I am sure a large number of people who are now going to asylums will never go there if we have the clinics we suggest.

13,114. I would very much like to have some statistics showing how many patients who enter asylums are discharged within a short time?—I can speak for Lancashire; the average is about 33 per cent. of the year's admissions who are out within the year. Eleven per cent. of the resident population are discharged, but 33 per cent. of the reception cases a year is about the average for the six asylums in Lancashire.

13,115. Let us take your whole asylum population. May we take it that of that whole population 11 per cent. in every year pass out?—Yes.

13,116. But that if we take the numbers admitted in any year, at the end of that year we will have found that one-third of them have passed out?—That is roughly correct.

13,117. Could we look at it even a little more closely? Of the one-third that are discharged within the year, are any of them discharged shortly after their admission?—Yes, many of them. Nearly all puerperal cases, cases that ought never to be sent, are discharged fairly reasonably early; they never stay longer than two or three months.

13,118. If you take the admissions, we will find there is a steady outflow as well of cases?—Quite.

13,119. And some of them are out as soon as two or three months after admission; others possibly nine months, and so on, but at the end of one year we find that one-third of the admissions in that year have been discharged?—Yes, I would hope so.

13,120. Earl Russell: Could you give us a table, drawn up in any way you think fit, to illustrate this point, as you seem to keep these statistics carefully in Lancashire?—The individual Committee send the reports, and I have first to digest them. I might have got the figures for them.

13,121. Chairman: You see how closely it bears on your suggestions; because if the position be this, that you find in your experience that quite a large number of patients only require temporary treatment and at present receive that treatment in asylums only through the medium of certification, your suggestion of the institution of a clinic where they might be dealt with in the first instance would obviously have this result, that quite a considerable number would never reach certification and never reach the asylum. It would be very interesting to see how the figures work out, and how many people are resident only for a short period in the asylum, because these are the people who under your reform would possibly never reach the asylum?—You may take it that 11 per cent. of the population are discharged per year, and that 33 per cent. of the cases received in any one year are discharged—not all cured you know.

13,122. It is the latter figure which is the more interesting because the general discharge figures will include those who may have been there for years?—Quite.

13,123. But you might turn it over in your mind when you leave us to-day and see if you could get out any* figures which would give us an indication of the number of short term patients at your institution, say three months and six months, because these are people who might be dealt with through the medium of the clinic?—I will do that and let you have it.

13,124. We might just link up your evidence at that point with some evidence we got from Dr. Barham of Claybury, one of the London County Council institutions. He told us that of his discharges the greatest number were persons who had been in from three to eight months, showing, of course, that there is a considerable number of cases of short duration. These are the recoverable cases, and therefore one would expect they would provide the largest number of those who are discharged?—Quite.

13,125. And that chimes apparently with your experience?—Yes, that is pretty well my experience, and the class of patients must be similar as between Liverpool and London.

13,126. In dealing with infectious diseases you have compulsory powers of notification and removal?—Yes, of certain diseases, but I think that a magistrate's order would pretty well operate even in those that are not. I think it can be done; it would be difficult. I do not wish to suggest that we should compel people to visit our clinic for mental diseases. I only want the opportunity given to the medical fraternity to send their patients to a clinic, so that the patients who would not go near an asylum would go to the clinic.

13,127. Earl Russell: And on the medical evidence we have had you could have out-patients?—I hope there would be out-patients.

13,128. Mr. Micklem: You do not want to have them made notifiable?—No; I only want power given to the local authority to make that provision, in order to give the patient an opportunity of going to these places under the advice of the medical practitioner of the town.

13,129. Chairman: The out-patients department would present considerable difficulties in widespread areas. Country patients could hardly come in for daily attendance and observation?—No. You know the Irishman who would like to sell the Lakes of Killarney in a warm place!

13,130. Earl Russell: But often advice as to treatment and conduct at one visit would go a long way, and would keep the patient going for a month or two?—In some cases, yes.

13,131. Sir Humphry Rolleston: You have referred to the puerperal cases; and said that it is most desirable that no stigma should attach to a poor woman who was violently insane for a short time; so you would treat them in the clinics?—Yes.

13,132. How would you get over the obvious difficulty that you could not restrain them against their wishes?—I do not think they would be restrained against their wishes. If they knew that the asylum was the alternative they would willingly stay in the clinic.

Earl Russell: But they are not able to appreciate that.

* See Appendix XXIII.

13,133. Sir Humphry Rolleston: You mean you would restrain them?—I would advise the medical practitioner to send them there.

13,134. Chairman: We have had some evidence to this effect: that this provisional period which has commended itself to many reformers should be coupled with some power of detention, possibly less rigorous than the code which affects persons after certification; but that some power of detention would be required is obvious. Take the case of a person really quite mad and dangerous. He would reach this clinic as an in-patient and would obviously have to be restrained. You would need to have, as Sir Humphry points out, some power to deal with those persons, although not certified; you would have to adopt some form of provisional certification?—Clearly, a typhoid patient who is not under a certificate is at many times delirious and you do detain him. I suppose it is illegal detention up to a point. I do not know. No one grumbles at that. I should class the puerperal cases in the same category. My feeling is this: it is the greatest crime the country can commit to allow such a woman to go to a Poor Law asylum.

13,135. Chairman: Because it is simply a disease?—Yes.

13,136. Earl Russell: Do you suggest that these people should be detained and deprived of their liberty without the intervention of a justice or anybody representing the public? That would very much frighten people. They think they are very often wrongfully detained when a justice does come in?—Is not a fever patient equally detained without any magistrate's order?

13,137. Chairman: I think this is difficult, Mr. Taggart?—Yes, but I think we can always remove difficulties; that is why we are on this earth.

13,138. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Do you think you can educate the public up to your standard?—I am sure of it. The outcry that would be raised against the detention of a puerperal case would soon balance itself when people saw that the reverse was very, very sad. They want to see the other side of the picture to see how necessary it is to have detentive powers.

Earl Russell: You appreciate that the doctor who did this would be quite unprotected by law?

13,139. Chairman: And suppose his diagnosis of a case were wrong?—That is the case to-day in an asylum. We have heard of actions at law by people who are supposed to have been wrongly diagnosed and sent to asylums.

13,140. But they have been protected. I quite see your general point: that in the case of many illnesses a person may become hysterical and the nurse or doctor will restrain that person, and nobody seems to have created any difficulty about that, although in a sense it is interfering with the liberty of the subject. But we are now concerned with interference with the liberty of the subject in the case of persons who have been mentally afflicted. You propose to admit to the clinic persons who would be most unwilling to be treated, but who nevertheless, for their own good and for the good of the public, ought to be detained. Must you not have some safeguard against improper detention there?—Yes, but a certifiable case would always have to be certified, and if the poor woman in question were certified she would be certifiable anyhow, whether she was in a clinic or her own home.

13,141. But you want to avoid certification of a woman in that condition, who is merely passing through a phase and is ill for the time being, but the illness happens to have attacked the citadel of reason. That person is, after all, just a sick person, but (although a sick person) may require detention contrary to her own wishes?—Yes.

13,142. How are you to safeguard that state of matters? How are you to safeguard detention against the wishes of the patient?—I should protect the public by certification. At the present moment the medical officer of health is responsible for a patient of the fever class.

13,143. You mean there must be some modified form of order made in such a case?—Quite; that is all I want. I do not want certification at all if possible, but a modified form in the interest of the patient and the public, to enable the case to be restrained in some way.

13,144. We will assume you have a clinic. We will assume it is being attended by incipient patients who have gone there on the advice of their doctors and friends; they may be told what they have to do, what medicines they should take, and how they should regulate their lives, and so on. Then in addition to that we will assume that this is a clearing house for cases which are beyond the incipient stage, that patients are brought to you there. It is desirable that they should be under observation in order that they may pass through this sieve, as you put it. These are cases of persons who are at present certified right away?—No. They are kept in the Poor Law infirmary for a considerable period before certification follows.

13,145. They are seen within three days?—Yes, and they are generally detained up to 21 days.

13,146. That is taking advantage of the periods which the Act provides?—Yes.

13,147. Take your case, where they would be in a clinic: you would need to provide there for some form of order which might be made on one doctor's certificate?—Yes.

13,148. Entitling the head of the clinic to restrain and detain such patients for a period of observation?—Yes; there must be powers of detention. I would make the doctor in question the medical officer of the district. He would no doubt receive the advice of his colleagues, of course.

13,149. Just think again. Must you not introduce also some protection against the purely medical element. Must you not have some intervention by some representative of the public, such as a justice of the peace, before you can detain anybody, even provisionally?—I suppose for the sake of public sentiment, yes, but there is really nothing in the justice of the peace's signature to a document. I sign many of these things. I had better not say what I am thinking.

13,150. That is what we have heard, and what we have been alarmed at?—One does one's best, but what can one do? I would rather take the medical man, who is au fait with the subject, than call in a magistrate.

13,151. Earl Russell: But the intervention of the magistrate is not to decide whether the patient is insane or not. It is really to see that nothing is being done that is improper, or unjust, or irregular?—I have not the slightest doubt in every case that is so.

13,152. Chairman: And observe also that it has this value, that it enables representations to be made to you. Take the case of a patient whom you are seeing. Suppose a patient is brought to you with a medical certificate and all the documents are in order. Do you see the patient yourself?—Every time.

13,153. Suppose the patient said: "I want to speak to you, Mr. Taggart, about my case." You would give him an opportunity of doing so, would you not?—In every case, yes.

13,154. Suppose he was able to say to you "There is a mistake about my case. I did say something very foolish to the doctor. I would like to have my case more fully considered." Do not you see the safety valve that you provide in such a case?—I do not see much advantage in bringing the justice of the peace in then.

13,155. Surely?—It is supposed to be an additional safeguard, but I do not think it is of very much value.

13,156. Suppose the relatives came with the case, as they do sometimes, and said to you: "This certificate about our brother is all wrong; he is perfectly sane; he did something very stupid last night; he was drunk, or something, and he has been certified quite wrongly." Would you not take the matter up at once and see that he was not sent to an asylum?

—Quite, but I would rather take it to a doctor than to a magistrate.

13,157. Earl Russell: That is where the magistrate comes in: he can call in a doctor?—I have much more confidence in the doctor than in the magistrate.

13,158. Suppose, for instance, the doctor had not been quite honest about the matter. If you thought there was any reason to believe that, you would call in a second doctor?—That is the practice to-day.

Earl Russell: That is a protection to the patient.

13,159. Chairman: It assumes that the magistrate represents the law and represents this point of view, that neither the doctor, nor the relatives, nor anybody else, shall have the ultimate say as to whether a person is to be detained against his will or not. I quite understand in the majority of cases there is very little difficulty—the case is obvious. But if you are taking a case where there is really some doubt, or where there may be suspicious circumstances, where the relatives may have an interest to get their unhappy relation put away, surely the fact that the patient comes before an independent magistrate, to whom he has an opportunity of making his representations or to whom his relatives may have an opportunity of making representations against the doctor's certificate, provides a useful safeguard, does it not?—It clearly does, but he would be equally safe in anyone else's hands who is not interested.

13,160. Earl Russell: Are you not rather treating him as a justice who is trying any other case?—On the evidence before him, which is very short.

13,161. But as the Chairman has pointed out, you may have elements which may raise suspicions in your mind?—The magistrate can only take evidence as in the case of an ordinary trial. You must not turn him into a doctor.

13,162. Chairman: I do not suggest that for a moment. Take an actual case. He has before him first the patient, and secondly he has before him the medical certificate and certain documents. He can look through the documents in the first instance and see that they are in order. If the documents are unsatisfactory, if they do not disclose sufficient evidence to satisfy yourself, would you not look further?—I should refuse to sign, of course. Then I should take the evidence of the relatives as well, and I would weigh that. If the relatives did satisfy me that he or she ought not to be certified, I should, as a magistrate, give that evidence the value attaching to it.

13,163. And you would withhold your signature until you were satisfied. I think you are belittling the value of the magistrate, you know?—I think you are exalting him too much. I would rather have the public authority.

13,164. Earl Russell: But on the other hand the public have more confidence in an independent justice of the peace than in any public authority?—I should not say so. I happen to be one. I do not think they have much confidence in me.

13,165. Chairman: You are very modest. Of course, you may say that of any tribunal. But the public do insist, and I think rightly insist, that no persons shall be deprived of their liberty without the intervention of some representative of the public?—I agree.

13,166. Mr. Snell: Have you considered the possibility of a second doctor almost automatically agreeing with the decision of the first doctor?—In practice that is so. If there is any question whatever, on the furnishing of the documents to the Poor Law authority, which arises in consequence of the written statement in front of the Poor Law doctor, he can, and he invariably does, bring in an assistant to help him in his diagnosis and to justify it, and when you take his evidence you find that the two doctors have not consulted.

13,167. You have not seized my point, I am afraid?—I am sorry.

13,168. You prefer, apparently, the opinion of a second doctor to the independent judgment of a magistrate?—I do.

13,169. I am suggesting to you that there might be a possible danger in the second doctor, for professional loyalty or other reasons, agreeing with the first doctor's certificate.

13,170. Chairman: Merely saying "Ditto," is Mr. Snell's point.—There is the same danger with anyone who certifies as a magistrate.

13,171. Mr. Snell rather puts this: that a second doctor called in might, as he says, for professional reasons, not afford much additional safeguard, because he might be disposed merely to endorse his colleague's view and simply say "Ditto," but on the other hand it is proverbial that doctors differ?—Yes, but they are very clannish; and magistrates sometimes differ, too.

13,172. Are they clannish? I do not think that applies to magistrates, perhaps?—I will not answer that.

13,173. I think we have the general upshot of your idea. It is a spacious idea, and one which one would have difficulty in applying in detail, but your view is that we should have clinics, both in- and out-patient clinics, which would have the advantage of enabling incipient cases to be attracted and dealt with at the early stage?—Without certification.

13,174. It would operate also as a clearing house for cases, many of which would escape certification altogether, and would relieve the asylum population to some extent. You further suggest that the example of the infectious diseases hospitals or the venereal diseases clinics might be followed, and that the system might be aided by State funds as well as local funds?—I have a very broad view on the State contributions towards these things.

13,175. And you also advocate some qualified order being pronounced so as to enable these patients in your clinic to be detained if necessary against their wishes for that provisional period?—Quite.

13,176. But that order or certificate should be something short of the full certification which precedes the entry of a patient into an asylum?—That is exactly my idea.

Sir Humphry Rolleston: I am very anxious to know whether Mr. Taggart can give us any guidance as to how, if such a form of detention became common in the in-patients' departments of these clinics, the public generally, whose opinion one must respect, can be prevented from gradually regarding the in-patients' department as being an outlying wing of the asylum?

13,177. Chairman: Yes. Would this mental clinic not be liable to attract to itself the same stigma as the asylum itself? If it was known that so-and-so's brother had gone off to the indoor clinic and had stayed there, it would be tantamount to saying he had gone off his head?—That would be countered by the fact that it would be known that the brother of some one else had been there, and had come home. A great number would not go to the asylum. It will balance itself out in time.

13,178. Of course, no amount of legislation or reform will ever camouflage the fact that a person who has suffered from mental disturbance is in a more difficult position in after life than a person who has suffered from measles, let us say?—Quite.

13,179. Obviously you cannot eliminate that altogether?—You may patch the jug, but you will always see where the crack has been. Close the vase as you will, the scent of the rose will hang round it still.

13,180. But your aspiration is to try to assimilate as far as possible the treatment of mental illness to the other diseases?—Quite; that is my sole aim.

13,181. Now I will pass to the question of discharge. Under your system, how do you work the discharge provisions of the code?—Of course, under the Act each asylum committee has the power of discharge of itself, and they vary slightly in practice. We have the usual forms of discharge—relieved and not relieved, and so forth, and cases that can be sent to the workhouse. We have different kinds of persons who are to be discharged.

13,182. You have some views, I think, as to the present method of discharge—You may get on the local committee a crank—perhaps I am one—of some kind, who thinks that certain patients who have been in the asylum for the last two, three or even ten years ought to be discharged. He converts a colleague to the same view. The committee consists of 27 members, yet any two of them, with the medical superintendent, can discharge a patient, and three without. Now if three cranks, in spite of the other 24 members of the committee, can release and do release and have released patients, I think that is very wrong, and rather stupid. We had a case quite recently at one of our asylums where three visiting members discharged ten patients, after consultation with, but in spite of the medical superintendent, and notwithstanding his diametrically opposed wish that they should be detained. I think of the ten patients discharged eight were almost immediately returned. But it is a weakness in the Act which allows any three to do it. The power of discharge should be in the custody of the committee, and theoretically it is, because it is only between one meeting and another when these visitors by twos and threes can and do discharge.

13,183. Earl Russell: But you do not object to their doing it with the concurrence of the medical superintendent?—No; it is in spite of it that I object to.

13,184. Chairman: It is really only in the case of the three visitors who may discharge at their own hand, whether the medical superintendent concurs or not. That is your objection?—Quite. I think the committee should rule in all cases. I am perfectly satisfied that the committee would never go against the advice of the medical superintendent. We meet monthly, at each asylum, and we discharge patients who are paraded before us for that month. There is an automatic discharge in that way. That receives the prima facie consent, of course, of the committee in question upon the recommendation of the doctor. There are doubtful cases brought before the committee, also, cases where the patient has not fully recovered, but has sufficiently recovered as not to be dangerous to himself or to others, and who might be sent to his home if the conditions are satisfactory. The committee then, and not the medical man, are the judges of the home comforts, and those are inquired into by bringing the patient's friends to the asylum and hearing the case, so the committee decide those discharges; but then as between that committee meeting and the next, I, as Chairman, and the deputy-chairman, go through the cases. The doctor says the patient has recovered, and he takes the responsibility from our shoulders. But where two or three men go into the asylum and discharge patients who ultimately would not have been discharged by the committee, that I think is a very wrong procedure.

13,185. One thing you have said rather struck me: that no visiting committee would discharge contrary to the views of the medical superintendent. That is just one of the points where we have got to be a little careful, because one of the complaints made is this, that the medical superintendent is apt to be too dominating in the fate of patients in asylums, that is to say, the visiting committee is apt to be complaisant to the views of the medical superintendent?—That is not my experience. Frequently we have done it in spite of the doctor.

13,186. That is very interesting. You say, in your experience you have very frequently, and, may I take it, justifiably, discharged patients, notwithstanding the opposition of the medical superintendent?—That opposition, of course, might not be violent; it might be less severe; he will offer no opinion. He will say: "As a medical man I cannot say this case has recovered, but you are discharging an unrecovered case. You, and not I, take the responsibility, having regard to what will happen in the future," and he throws that responsibility upon the committee.

13,187. Take the case you refer to of the ten patients discharged by the three members of the visiting committee, contrary to the views of the medical superintendent; that is evidently an extreme case?—It was.

13,188. And you say the persons were probably inexperienced?—They were old public men, but were new to the asylum committee work.

13,189. And they formed the impression that these people ought to be at large, and they were discharged contrary to the views of the medical superintendent. We are more concerned with the normal cases. Your suggestion that the independent outside authority (that is, the visiting committee), would not go against the medical superintendent's view seems rather to accentuate what we have heard, that the medical superintendent's power of control over the fate of the patients is what we may call the dominant factor. Probably it may be right that it should be so?—I do not think so, in practice. He has only the power to express that opinion to a very disinterested body of gentlemen coming from all parts of the country, and who have no axe to grind in taking his advice or refusing it.

13,190. But he is dealing with gentlemen who are laymen in this matter and are considering a case of illness upon which they really cannot have an expert opinion at all?—Yes, but is not the majority of a committee always safe?

13,191. I do not think so?—Perhaps not. I am a politician, and I say no.

13,192. I do not think the opinion of a majority of laymen is worth the opinion of an expert upon a matter where expert opinion is necessary?—Is it not more reliable than a minority of laymen?

13,193. Earl Russell: Do you mean more than this: if he said, "I tell you gentlemen that patient is actively suicidal" the committee as a whole would not discharge him?—Clearly. When it becomes a matter of opinion, that the patient is neither dangerous to himself nor to others, and when it is a question of home surroundings and the probability of his return, that is entirely a matter outside the medical jurisdiction.

13,194. Chairman: Your observation rather led me to this, that you were representing the view of the medical superintendent's almost uncontrolled disposal of the fate of the patients, because the visiting committee would not go against his wishes. Have I understood you, or have I put it too high?—I hope the committee is intelligent in every case. The case book is produced, the whole of the status of the patient to that moment is before the committee, the committee hear the whole facts from the medical superintendent, and upon that evidence they decide.

13,195. Of course the medical superintendent's view must necessarily be of great consequence, because he is the person in charge of the patient?—Clearly; he is living with the patient; we are not.

13,196. Do you see the assistant doctors, who are more closely associated with the patients?—Always. We examine the books.

13,197. But do you see the assistant doctors themselves?—Very often; we parade the wards with them, as a rule.

13,198. Do you see the individual patient whose case is being discussed?—In every case.

13,199. Do you have a talk with him?—Yes; we bring them before the committee and examine them closely, and with their friends as well, with or without their being present.

13,200. Have you sometimes discharged cases on your own responsibility, that is to say, the responsibility of the visiting committee, although the medical superintendent was not able to say that he thought the case was safe for discharge?—I have had 37 years' experience and I have only known three cases of that kind.

13,201. But in the three cases you did it?—Yes.

13,202. What was the result of those cases?—Two went to America and I think the third one committed suicide; we were wrong.

13,203. It is not a very happy result?—I should be very chary to fight the medical superintendent in any case. He can have no axe to grind in wishing the detention of a patient.

13,204. Is not your suggestion that the whole of the visiting committee should deal with the discharge of patients rather a cumbrous one, because you might have patients detained for some time, until you had a meeting of the committee?—That is always done. A patient does not recover in 24 minutes or 24 hours. The patient is very happy to stay awaiting the discharge day. Two or three of us go through with the medical superintendent, take the responsibility, and report to the committee what we have done; that is always adopted as a minute by the committee. We can put the patients on trial for a month and automatically discharge them while they are out; we do that frequently.

13,205. That is another section. But I am a little surprised at your suggestion that the right of discharge should be vested in the whole visiting committee as distinguished from the provision under the Act at present. How often does your visiting committee meet?—Every month.

13,206. You might have a patient waiting for three weeks to be discharged, although anxious to get back, and perfectly well?—The doctor in that case would be the authority who reports it. He would at once send for two visiting magistrates and discharge the patient.

13,207. Earl Russell: But he cannot, under your system?—I think if you would put it that way it would be all right. The committee would have it reported to them at the next meeting.

Chairman: That is the existing system.

13,208. Mr. Jowitt: Your point is that you want the whole committee, if they are differing from the doctor?—Yes. I think that power should be taken from the three members or from any minority.

13,209. Chairman: Then finally you have views on the question of persons suffering from senile decay. There is a considerable proportion of that sort of case in your asylums just now?—Yes.

13,210. Is it your view as the result of your experience of local administration that they ought not to be in an asylum?—I think when a person has been there 20 years he would be much happier in a workhouse than in the asylum; in fact they would go back now, but for the question of cost. We can feed them cheaper, because of the large number, than the unions themselves can feed them; certifiable, of course, all of them, still, not dangerous to themselves or to others, and not fit to go to their homes; they will be better off in a workhouse than in an asylum. That is an individual opinion. My Association have given me no lead in this matter whatever.

13,211. Earl Russell: The workhouse would still get a grant of 4s. if they went back?—No; that would cease.

13,212. Chairman: We are told that the asylums in this country are rapidly reaching a stage when their accommodation is about to be exhausted, and that may mean that large expenditure may have to be incurred in extension. If the senile cases were taken away from the existing asylums and restored to the Poor Law authorities, might you not get some relief in that way, and obviate some of the extension which is in prospect?—Years ago we used to have an asylum on the stocks every five years, and we reckoned that the rate of increase, which is about 300 a year over the previous year, in the years 1909, 1910 and 1911, would necessitate our building an asylum every five or six years. That was an alarming thing for Lancashire. But the senile cases which would be sent back to the workhouses would at the moment relieve us to the extent of one asylum. Our asylums contain the following beds: Lancaster 2,625; Rainhill 2,155; Prestwich 2,707; Whittingham 2,838—I think that is the largest in Europe; Winwick 2,100.

13,213. Mr. Jowitt: Of course, it would tend to congest the Poor Law institution beds. Are they short of space?—No; it is the opposite way.

13,214. Chairman: There are a lot of unoccupied beds in Poor Law institutions just now?—A very large number.

13,215. Is not that partly due to the Old Age Pension system?—Yes, partly, and also to the fact that we can keep them cheaper than they can keep themselves, and also because they get the 4s. grant.

13,216. But it is very undesirable that new accommodation should be provided at great cost for cases which can be accommodated in premises at present not fully occupied. Re-distribution is indicated?—Yes; but, mind you, the figures I quoted do not obtain to-day. There is a great diminution, though not in female insanity, and the number is much less now than it was before the war.

13,217. What is that due to, do you think?—I suppose on the male side it is due to the war—so many killed; the male population has suffered in consequence of that.

13,218. Mr. Micklem: Has not the Mental Deficiency Act affected it?—That is another aspect of the same question. The application of the 1913 Act has been the means. We have put one of our six asylums for the purpose of holding those people, Whalley Asylum, and we have 2,400 beds in it. In that asylum we are catering for the boy and girl who in the past were the cause of insanity. We are now removing a greater means of the spread of insanity than we have hitherto dealt with.

13,219. Chairman: That may also account for the diminution in the numbers?—I flatter myself that Lancashire is showing a very good example to England in that regard.

13,220. Earl Russell: You mean you are stopping the breeding?—Yes, we are confining the breeding. The "Silly-Billy" no longer roams the streets, and your "Silly Sally" who was out for trouble no longer roams the lanes and streets of the country.

13,221. Chairman: Are they taken to the mental deficiency home?—Yes. We have it more in hand in Lancashire.

13,222. That may have some effect in diminishing the propagation of insanity?—I have not the slightest doubt it has.

13,223. Have you in your own territory a considerable amount of unoccupied accommodation in the workhouses to which these senile cases could be sent?—Yes. Speaking for Liverpool, we could take back a matter of 800 or 900 of them if necessary.

13,224. Is there this aspect of it, too, that if the asylums were freed from those occupants, the doctors of the staff would be able to devote themselves more to the cases of true insanity which have some hope of recovery under treatment?—At the moment the doctors divide their patients into two classes. They get every consideration if nothing can be done for them; but the medical staff do concentrate upon the recent and acute cases, and that is where the good work is being done by the medical staff.

13,225. But at the same time, even those senile cases must occupy a certain amount of the medical staff's time?—Yes, but the layman with 10 or 12 years' experience is almost as good as a medical man with that particular type of patient.

13,226. We hear that these very large institutions containing 2,000 or 3,000 patients are not the best, because they are so large that the medical superintendent cannot keep an eye upon everybody. Why should he be keeping an eye upon one-third of the population of an institution, when nothing can be done for them? Would it not be much better to have institutions which were really devoted to the treatment of insanity, as apart from merely housing persons who cannot be treated at all?—In practice it is done. After all, a doctor has 300 patients; he classifies them.

13,227. But they are still under his charge if they are in an asylum, and he has to look after accommodation for them and arrange amusements, which may tend to distract him from attending to his real duty towards his patients?—Some of them do not require very much attention from him. The doctor need not waste much time in organising a dance or in arranging for them to go to the picture show or to the cricket match. He does devote his time to those who require his medical care.

13,228. He certainly ought to?—I hope in every case he does.

Chairman: We are much obliged for your views, Mr. Taggart. I think we might pass now to Sir William Hodgson's evidence, unless any of my colleagues would like to ask you questions on the views you have developed.

13,229. Mr. Micklem: There is one question I want to put to you, Mr. Taggart, with reference to the discharge of patients from asylums. Do the Committee consider any cases except those which are brought forward by the medical superintendent with a view to their possible discharge?—Yes. The visiting committee have before them a list upon the discharge day—the meeting day; a list that the doctor supplies. Then in addition to that the committee, after discharging, will appoint, in our case, four visitors who must pay the cross-visit once or twice between that and the next meeting, and as we perambulate we receive from the individual patients, from their own lips, applications for discharge; we note and bring before the committee such a list in addition to the doctor's list; so that the visitors' recommendations are always received on the day of discharge, and, if the visitors recommend, the patient is brought there, with or without the doctor's consent, to be examined by the committee.

13,230. Then you really have a duplicate list?—Yes, and a third; an application list from the relatives or friends. We bring all those forward.

13,231. And the committee consider all those with equal care?—Yes.

13,232. Earl Russell: With regard to the increase of the grant, which you were speaking of, you suggest, as I understand, that it should be put up to something like 10s.—If it is of any value at all it ought to have some relative value. It was fixed at 4s. when the cost was 8s.; the cost is now 19s. 10d.

13,233. I do not want to go into the question of what services the national funds should contribute to, and what they should not, but assuming that this grant were increased, or even continued, would you associate the giving of it with any sort of control by the Board of Control?—I do not like the idea of the Board of Control, because it seems an absurdity that whereas we get 50-50 in the case of venereal disease—

13,234. Sir Thomas Hutchison: It is 75 per cent. in the case of venereal disease.—Thank you. But they do not give anything like that for the most important of all diseases.

13,235. Earl Russell: You know, for instance, that there is a grant towards the police from the central authority, and that that is coupled with a certain amount of control before the grant is given?—Yes.

13,236. The Board of Control, as you know, have the power to make any recommendations about these asylums, but they have no power to insist on their being carried out?—Yes, but one does not like to invite Governmental control. The one thing I do not want, and I am sure Lancashire does not want, is too much Governmental control.

13,237. That is usually the view of the local authorities. But supposing you find a case, as I have found, in which letter-boxes are not provided in the wards, and the Board of Control one year, and the next year, keep on drawing attention to it, and say they should be provided, do you still think it should remain a recommendation in the air; that they should have no power to withhold a portion of the grant until it is done?—I do not see very much value in the grant at all. The grant from the Imperial Exchequer comes from the same pockets as the rates.

13,238. I thought you told us that the grant ought to be increased?—I would increase it or abolish it; I do not care which; but if as a concomitant it brings in governmental control, I would rather not have it at all. I would rather have Lancashire Home Rule.

13,239. Lancashire, no doubt, is a well-managed place, but if you have backward places which are not up to the standard, if you can only make recommendations and no attention is to be paid to them, how are you to bring them up to the standard?—That I do not know. I do not see how you can.

13,240. Do you think there is anything wrong in doing that partially by the control of the grant from the Imperial funds?—I think it would be wrong. The Board of Control may not always be right.

13,241. There are six asylums in this district you have been speaking of?—Six in the county of Lancashire, yes.

13,242. How many patients are there for each doctor, on the average?—About 300.

13,243. And how are your medical superintendents appointed—by seniority or rotation?—By the quarterly meeting of the Board.

13,244. Do you advertise a vacancy?—We advertise a vacancy in every case.

13,245. And get all the applications in?—Yes.

13,246. That is the way you start on the business; but will you tell me what is done in practice? Does it go by seniority, or do you appoint outside medical officers to be superintendents?—In practice it goes by seniority.

13,247. Would a man in the same asylum be promoted to be medical superintendent if there were a vacancy?—It has happened on two occasions only; but in most cases, no; it would be from a neighbouring asylum under the same Board.

13,248. But an outside man is practically never appointed?—He would be brought in as third or second and be moved upwards. We want new blood in if we can get it. As a matter of fact, we have only one Lancashire doctor in the six asylums; the others, naturally, are Scotsmen.

13,249. Chairman: Even in Lancashire?—Yes; we do not complain.

13,250. Mr. Jowitt: I want to ask you about these clinics. You contemplate two separate clinics, one for out- and one for in-patients; or would one building do for the two, do you think?—The one building would do for the two.

13,251. Then you contemplate that there must be some powers of compulsory detention?—Yes.

13,252. Have you considered this: the population that is going to your clinic is going to be a voluntary population, with no compulsion in going there?—That is so.

13,253. Do you think that the knowledge and fear that when once you enter the portals you may be detained may prevent these people from being ready to go?—I do not think so.

13,254. We have had that view put before us, and it rather struck me as being a possible result of a system by detention?—It would be the lesser of two evils if it were so. The man or woman who develops the idea that he or she is only taking the first step towards an asylum by going to a clinic is the one who is now graduating for the asylum proper.

13,255. Are you not, by having a system of compulsory control, rather supporting the view of those who say that the clinic is merely an offshoot of an asylum?—Yes; but you see a person who is on the verge now of certification has no opportunity of treatment; and has no opportunity of consulting with anyone who is an expert in psychiatry.

13,256. Treatment and consultation: both those you could get without the power of detention. I am assuming you have got your clinic. At the present time, of course, you have not got a clinic at all?—No.

13,257. Assuming you start a clinic: I want to discuss with you the advisability of having or not having control. I point out to you that if you have your clinic, even without compulsory power of detention, you could give treatment and consultation?—Quite.

13,258. Why do you insist upon your compulsory powers of detention?—For the odd case; the case of the person who would not submit to treatment and who was clearly going wrong.

13,259. Then, for the sake of the odd case, you are really going to make what would be a purely voluntary place into a possible sort of prison; that might be the public point of view?—It would not be so applied; we were thinking of the puerperal case at the moment; and there would be an enabling power to prevent a puerperal case having to go to an asylum.

13,260. I quite agree with you. Have you considered at all what your compulsory power of detention would be and how it would be exercised?—Pretty much in the same way as it is now. It must be a certificate of some kind to enable the public authority responsible for the clinic to detain the patient for a period.

13,261. It might be a certificate to the effect that for reasons of health such a person ought to be detained?—Yes, fixing a certain period.

13,262. And would you give the medical superintendent of your clinic power to detain for a very limited period of time, 24 hours, on his own responsibility, and for a longer period with the consent of the relatives?—Yes, I think so, with the consent of the relatives.

13,263. The mania in puerperal cases will generally last for about three weeks?—3 to 6 weeks, yes.

13,264. And, with the consent of the relatives, would you contemplate compulsory powers of detention, even without a magistrate being brought upon the scene?—That is a matter of machinery. That I do not think has much weight. The magistrate would do no harm. As a make-weight, yes.

13,265. Mrs. Mathew: I do not think I have anything to ask you, Mr. Taggart, except this: Would you give the medical superintendent power to discharge without the committee?—I would not give him the power; he has already the power of refusal. Some time ago one of the unions sent us a patient; upon arrival the doctor, in making the initial examination, discovered that the patient was not insane; he telephoned for me, and I went over. He said "What will you do?" I said: "Send him home at once."

13,266. He has that power?—Yes, he has that power now, I take it. Whether he has it or not, we refuse to take a person who is not certifiable. I think he can set his opinion against the certificate, as he certainly did in this case of admission. We can refuse a patient, and we have done so.

13,267. Earl Russell: You do not think it ought to be regarded as a case of instantaneous discharge?—At all events, his refusal to accept a patient was rather checking the stigma of certification.

13,268. Mrs. Mathew: That was not quite what I meant. What I meant was, after treatment and observation should he have the power to discharge?—No, I do not think he ought; it might be open to abuse. I would rather vest the power of discharge in the public authority than in the officer appointed.

13,269. Chairman: I think he must receive a patient who is addressed to him with a certificate; he must receive him in the institution. After that the patient becomes an inmate and he gets into the machine, and he can only be discharged through the provisions of the Act; but, of course, if the medical superintendent is satisfied that he is really quite a sane person, he will see that the proper machinery is put into operation as early as possible for his discharge?—In that particular case the man came in the ordinary way, and as soon as the doctor saw he was not insane, he sent for me, and I discharged him; I took the responsibility. I reported the matter, and there the matter ended. Mrs. Mathew asked me if a patient had been under treatment for a month or thereabouts, would I leave that in the hands of the doctor. I say no; I think the committee should in every case act.

13,270. Miss Madeleine Symons: In the six asylums in Lancashire have they all got a private side?—No.

13,271. How many of them have?—One of them has a private side; that is Lancaster Asylum, which is 170 years old; it is on the borders of Morecambe Bay, in a magnificent situation, and we have there provided a handsome villa for patients, with 106 beds.

13,272. That is the one, is it, that you told us provided accommodation sometimes in the shape of suites of rooms?—Yes.

13,273. I was interested in that, because certain witnesses, who were of opinion that the present licensed houses ought to go, suggested that the private accommodation, even private accommodation of an expensive kind could be provided by the public authority?—So it is. All the public authorities are willing so to provide it, and some do. We have done it very extensively. In addition to that, we could provide special accommodation at the other five places.

13,274. Do you reckon in those cases simply to make a charge that covers the cost, or do you reckon, where patients are able and willing to pay, to make something towards the cost of other patients. What is the arrangement on which you base your charges?—Of course, we have nothing to do with bearing the cost of the pauper case.

13,275. No; but I meant in these private cases, do you fix your charge simply to cover the cost of what the people get; or do you reckon to make anything out of it?—Yes; we make a very good profit out of it, which goes to the relief of the rates. We had a relative of a Lord Chief Justice for a long time as a patient, who contributed five guineas a week; obviously we made a profit out of that; he had a suite of rooms which might have been occupied by three or four persons, but at all events it did not cost us £5 to keep him. We made a decent profit; we were sorry he died.

13,276. Earl Russell: Does it go to the relief of the County rate, or do you credit the maintenance rate?—It goes to the maintenance rate. A portion could go to the new buildings too; we could claim that.

13,277. Chairman: Is five guineas the maximum charge?—No. We fix these scales now. We say: "You can have a scale of 24s.," 19s. 10d. being the rate. We have scales of 24s., or 35s., or 2 guineas. That is in three different classes of situation, aspect, light and the garden. Over and above that, someone suggests that they would like something superior, and very exceptional patients are treated for five guineas.

13,278. Have you ever had a case in which the magistrate has declined to accept the evidence of insanity put before him by the medical certificate?—I have known such cases.

13,279. What happened in such a case?—The magistrate in question refused to sign, and the patient was taken back to the workhouse for further observation.

13,280. And what was the ultimate fate of that patient?—Eventually he was so sent. The magistrate (perhaps right at that moment) was wrong. Eventually the patient came to the asylum three weeks afterwards.

13,281. In deciding whether a person should be discharged or not, is the same standard applied in judging of his condition as is applied in judging of his condition for certification?—I think so. In the discharge of a patient who is cured, no question arises; it is an automatic matter; but in the discharge of a patient who is really not cured, then it is a question of degree as to the home surroundings he is going to, and of the discrimination of the committee who discharge him; they will weigh that, just as the magistrate has weighed the matter in the first instance.

13,282. There is the discharge of the patient who has recovered: that person ought to be discharged if he is no longer certifiable?—That is automatic.

13,283. On the other hand, there are cases which are relieved and which might be discharged to the care of friends or relatives?—Or the workhouse.

13,284. And in all these matters does your committee pass judgment?—Yes; we send them out month after month on probation.

13,285. Now, Sir William, perhaps you might take up the running. You, like Mr. Taggart, represent the Mental Hospitals Association?—Yes.

13,286. And are you a Member of the Executive Committee of the Mental Hospitals Association, as well as Vice Chairman?—I am.

13,287. I think you have also been Chairman of the County Asylum at Chester for many years?—For many years.

13,288. And you are an Alderman and Chairman of the Cheshire County Council?—Yes.

13,289. You are before us this morning also as a member of the Executive and other Committees of the County Councils Association?—Yes.

13,290. Have you been a member of the latter Association since its formation over 30 years ago?—Yes, ever since it began.

13,291. Have you also been associated with a Municipal Corporation?—Yes.

13,292. You have been Mayor of the Borough of Crewe; you are a County and Borough Magistrate, and you are Chairman of the Cheshire Joint Sanatorium Board, and in your private or professional capacity you are a doctor?—That is true.

13,293. We have heard of the work of the Mental Hospitals Association, but perhaps before we go into your evidence you might tell us about the County Councils Association and its interest in this matter. What is that body?—That body is an Association of representatives of all the County Councils in England and Wales, not Scotland, and they act through an Executive Committee. Each Council nominates four on the Executive Committee, one of those is put on the Education Committee of the Council; another one is put on the Highways Committee and the Public Health Committee. They are distributed among various Committees. The Executive Committee meets monthly except in the holiday season, and, of course, they have a great deal to do with either opposing Bills or promoting them. Sometimes we have introduced Bills in the House of Lords that have come down to the Commons as approved Bills.

13,294. May I take it in general terms that they concern themselves with all kinds of local government affecting the County Councils?—Yes.

13,295. In all its various branches?—Yes.

13,296. And they are regarded as the body representative of the County Councils' interests?—Yes, of the county authorities.

13,297. And of course, the county authorities have, among their various functions, the duty of concerning themselves with the treatment of the insane?—Yes, they provide the public asylums.

13,298. And that is one of the departments with which the County Councils Association is concerned?—It is.

13,299. Now, in the course of your own public work, Sir William, have you had a considerable experience of the working of the Lunacy laws of this country?—Yes.

13,300. And have you been in contact with the various Departments of State which deal with this matter?—I have.

13,301. Including the Board of Control?—I have had a number of interviews and disputes with them.

13,302. Now taking the matters in order, I think, first of all, you agree with Mr. Taggart, that it is desirable to eliminate, as far as one can, the association of mental treatment from the pauper system, the Poor Law system?—I think it wants removing entirely.

13,303. But do you recognise that so long as we have the Poor Law as at present, the best that one can achieve is a mitigation of the association?—Quite. You cannot get everything you want all at once.

13,304. I think that you, like others, take exception to the use of the word "asylum," because of its association?—Yes, we think it is very unfortunate, and it certainly has created a great deal of heart-burning among people whose relatives may have to go there.

13,305. The trouble is, whatever name you may select may ultimately attract equal disfavour?—People do not object to the idea of a hospital. If they got to know that an asylum was a mental hospital in the same way that other specialised hospitals are being run for special complaints, I do not think they would feel the same about their relatives going there.

13,306. There is no doubt something in the psychological effect of a name?—There is more than a little.

13,307. Do you think that if the title were changed, and, if one may call it so, the atmosphere surrounding the matter were changed, people would be less reluctant to take advantage of existing institutions?—Precisely. It is a good thing for the people who are working in the hospital as well to know that they are working in a hospital and that they must have a hospital atmosphere. These are sick people having definite complaints which must be treated.

13,308. And you find in your experience that people are deterred from resorting to the existing institutions because of their associations?—I have known some people.

13,309. I have no doubt that in mental disease, as in all kinds of disease, it is desirable that cases should be taken at the earliest moment?—Yes, very desirable.

13,310. Prevention is better than cure?—Prevention is always better than cure.

13,311. Do you think that in some cases patients have been deterred from going to the asylum, until the disease has become so advanced that it was not susceptible of treatment so effectually as it would have been if they had been taken earlier?—Yes, I think so.

13,312. On this topic generally may we take it you are in agreement with the views which Mr. Taggart has expressed, that is to say, the institution of clinics generally?—Yes; generally I am in favour of all that Mr. Taggart has said. There are one or two points of distinction which may come up perhaps as we go on.

13,313. But the scheme which was obviously in Mr. Taggart's mind has your approval?—Quite. It should be pointed out that you cannot get a scheme like that operating in sparsely populated districts and counties in the same way that you can in large urban aggregations of people. Lancashire has less difficulty than some other places. I do not think the difficulty would be quite as much as many people imagine. For instance, in Cheshire we are on the borders of both Manchester and Liverpool. There is an arterial railway communication running from both places right through Cheshire. It is not difficult to get about Cheshire from either Manchester or Liverpool where the large hospitals occur, where there are medical schools, where they have psychological sides to their tuition. I do not think it would be difficult to make a scheme with either Manchester or Liverpool, or both. We have two large hospitals. We could have a hospital clinic which could be used by the Universities of Manchester and Liverpool. I do not think we should find it so difficult. In some other counties where the population is more minutely scattered it would be difficult. It is not a remedy that could be generally applied; it is not a convenience that could be applied all over the country, but the point the Association has in bringing it forward is this: let us get as much provision as we can for the assistance of the treatment of a disease which has been neglected far too long. It is mainly to get the maximum provision of convenience in treatment.

13,314. Then, if empowering legislation were enacted, that would enable the more progressive parts of the country to take advantage of it and their example would no doubt tend to spread?—Quite. There are many useful Bills which have been passed with enabling powers; different authorities take them up one after another till often useful powers become general. It is an enabling power which could be usefully applied in this direction.

13,315. At the present time there are no such powers as you have with regard to infectious diseases and tuberculosis, and so on, for establishing clinics?—We have no power, and we have no power of voluntary reception either.

13,316. And you would like to possess some powers, and you are sure you would exercise them in Lancashire?—I am sure they would be exercised in Lancashire and Cheshire. I can give you cases which I have in mind, but I do not know that it is necessary. We had an Irish curate who used to come over every now and then from Ireland to our asylum. Our superintendent erroneously took him once or twice until he found he had no power. He used to feel the mental tremor coming on and he used to come over. We had to stop that, because it was illegal. There are a lot of people like that who are on the border line, full of mental difficulty, neurotic, they get attacks of acute neurasthenia, and they are sufficiently intelligent to know that they may perhaps go over the line, and they like to get safe.

13,317. Shelter and treatment?—Shelter and treatment.

13,318. Therefore you advocate the admission of such persons as voluntary patients?—As voluntary patients without certification, yes.

13,319. Mr. Snell: With power of detention?—I do not like the power of detention except as an enabling power for odd cases.

13,320. Chairman: Of course, if I may diverge into this question of the voluntary patient, there is a difficulty that the voluntary patient may at any moment become a menace to himself and the public?—Quite, he may.

13,321. And it may be necessary to detain him involuntarily for a time?—It might be necessary that there should be some enabling power for a short period.

13,322. The Mental Treatment Bill contemplates that the voluntary patient may be detained against his will for 72 hours?—Yes.

13,323. But, at any rate, whatever be the period, there must be a time during which his voluntary residence may become involuntary detention in his own interest?—Yes.

13,324. That time to be utilised in communicating with relatives and getting medical men on the case?—Yes.

13,325. Now, first of all, on the subject of the medical staff of asylums, which naturally interests you professionally as well as administratively, have you any view as to the qualifications which should be possessed by medical superintendents?—Yes, I have. I think every medical superintendent, who is the chief medical officer in a mental hospital, should have medico-psychological, technical qualifications, to show that he has passed a definite strict examination in mental disease. Every medical man has gone through some study and examination of mental disease; but they want something more than the ordinary study. Usually their mental qualifications simply merge in their general medical qualification. I do not think that superintendents should be appointed to large asylums or mental hospitals without they have special technical medico-psychological qualifications. I think the Board of Control quite rightly has the same idea. It has not been possible to get many men of that type; of course, there are a limited number of men who possess those qualifications, and are appointed. It is getting less difficult now, but it has been very difficult.

13,326. Would this supply of especially qualified men be increased, if greater facilities were given to the subordinate members of the medical staff to study and to pass these examinations?—Yes; that is what we want to inspire. We have had some young people who have come to our asylums, both young men and young women, who have not shown very much desire to develop on those special lines; but, as a rule, they are keen, and they are more keen now than they used to be; but there should be the inspiration of the necessity for development among the junior medical staff, and an interchange of the medical staffs in various asylums would be exceedingly useful. We have sometimes sent a medical officer to another asylum and paid his salary just the same, and supplied a locum tenens in his place. I think if a sort of rota of interchange were to be undertaken by a central controlling committee (the Board of Control, for instance, could do it), much more useful work than sometimes might be done, and I think it would be generally taken up.

13,327. You think there should be a more or less organised medical service dealing with mental institutions?—Yes, an interchange of service, but that all their service at each place should be counted as continuous service for the purposes of pension. That, by the way, should be applied to the medical superintendent—I think it is very important.

13,328. Is a man apt to get in a rut if he is too long in one place?—They do get in a rut. I have seen more than one superintendent get absolutely mentally stale and get quite into a rut, and committees have been very glad if they could make a change. No one can live in an asylum for many years without being influenced. We have had superintendents who have committed suicide without any apparent cause or anything indicating a suicidal tendency. It is almost impossible to say what influences are brought to bear on the medical staff by their work; and there is a nervous influence in the mentality of the medical service of asylums which is detrimental to the mentality of those who are in it. What I want to see, and what many of us want to see, is that for this special service, the oversight of the asylum, the chief medical officer should be a young and up-to-date man, who should not stay there too long. He should have a shorter period of service, and should retire on an early substantial pension so as to ensure change. I do not think anybody can live with lunatics, and we have 1,500 at the asylum I have had in charge, for many years—I do not think anyone can live among 1,500 lunatics without getting stale. Every now and again we say to our superintendent: "Get away for two or three weeks," and he comes back freshened and better. People are apt to forget that there is a penalty attached to the service of those who are suffering in this way. If they go wrong it is not to be wondered at. What we are finding, however, is this, that if they have a laboratory, and they can get the hobby of research work in that laboratory, well equipped and up-to-date, it is astonishing how they brighten up. The fact is that they get a side interest in their work. We have just been making the malaria experiment at our asylum. The superintendent is a good man and has to go away occasionally for a week or two to get freshened up. He has one set of rooms fitted up for the malaria treatment of general paralytics. We lined the place with special gauze to keep the mosquito within the premises. We obtained our mosquitoes and produced malaria in the patient; we cured the malaria by the treatment, and we also cured the general paralysis, and two patients have gone out of the asylum cured. It is wonderful how the encouragement to branch out into research work like that will freshen them up. The point is this: we want the best men to take the central official oversight of the asylum. The younger staff should be interchanged in some regularised system of rota whereby they will come across different ideas at different places with different practices.

13,329. Now in that connection have you any views on the definition of the duties of medical superintendents, because if you are going to have highly qualified specialists such as you desire, surely it is unsuitable that they should spend their time in checking stores and filling up forms, and diverting their minds from the medical aspect of their work to merely administrative duties?—I quite agree.

13,330. Have you any practical suggestion to make upon it?—Yes, I have. The suggestion I want to make is this, that the administrative business should be taken away entirely from the medical side, that the medical staff should confine their minds entirely to their medical work, and be relieved of the business, the commercial side; for instance, there is a great deal of farming in some places—we have a big farm. I remember one superintendent—he is dead now—who took such an interest in it that he became a farmer, and a very good farmer, but he ceased to be of much use as a medical superintendent, and the work was generally done by the junior staff without taking his advice on medical questions.

13,331. Of course that is quite wrong, because the medical superintendent is responsible for the medical treatment of all the patients under him?—It is quite a wrong thing. The business and commercial side should be separated from the medical side, to relieve the pressure on the medical man.

Earl Russell: The medical superintendents themselves will not say that as a rule.

13,332. Chairman: No. It is a very practical difficulty. The head of the institution says "Well, I am no doubt a medical man, and medicine ought to be my province;" but the medical treatment of insane people is unlike the medical treatment of other people; it involves conduct, premises, and all those other things which an ordinary doctor is relieved of in a general hospital. He has to consider the lives of these people, and the regimen of their lives is actually part of the therapeutic treatment; and if he loses control of the establishment by delegating it to somebody else he may find that the establishment no longer chimes with his idea of an institution which will have beneficial results on its inmates?—I think, as a rule, medical minds are conservative—that is, they do not like alterations. The medical mind in an asylum does not like to give up positions of control and responsibility. I have met some medical superintendents who have those views. I have met others who have said "If I could get rid of all these blessed commercial details in this place I would be thankful; I have no time to think about my people." They are not all alike. Many men who have private pursuits find recreative occupation in public work, so it may be useful to medical men in asylums, but I have turned that over a good deal, and I have come to the conclusion very seriously that it would be a wise thing if the major portion, if not all, of the administrative business of the asylum were in the hands of some other person than the medical superintendent. I hope this will not be taken to have any reference to the asylums with which I am connected, because it might be misunderstood. It is a general view I am giving.

13,333. But how would you work it out—would you do it by regulations?—I think there should be a general administrative superintendent who should have control. For instance, the clerk of the asylum has a lot of clerks under him; we have a dozen or more in the asylum. In Lancashire I do not know how many they have, they have multiplied them there; but the administrative superintendent should have general charge over all the catering of the institution, the farms, and all the works in which they are engaged other than the treatment of patients.

13,334. Would you give the medical superintendent any control over that person—would he be subordinate to him?—That is a very difficult question.

13,335. I know, but it is one we may have to solve?—I know, of course, of its many-sided issues. As a rule, I think, the officers ought to be separate, and they should be both responsible to the committee. If the medical superintendent had any grievance against the "commercial" superintendent (we have not a name for it, but you know what I mean) the committee would settle it equitably whenever it was brought forward. I do not think I have known difficulties in large hospitals. It is the rule.

13,336. I was going to put it to you. One knows that in many large general hospitals there is a superintendent (sometimes he is a medical man), but his province is the general administration of the establishment, and he does not interfere in the least with the medical treatment of the patients?—He has nothing to do with them.

13,337. Is that the kind of model you have in your mind?—I want to see all the business removed from the medical man. I have seen so many overwhelmed with the details of petty business that they are absorbed with those, and their minds are taken off their patients.

13,338. Or if they are not overwhelmed with the detail work, they may be attracted to some of the other departments to the prejudice of their true work?—Yes. We made an uncommonly good farmer, and we lost a medical superintendent who retired very late in life on a good pension.

13,339. Then in order to get a supply of suitable men you are in favour, I take it, of the junior staff being encouraged to engage in post graduate work, getting leave for that purpose, and moving about among the different institutions to get diversified experience?—I think it is very important; it should be taken up seriously.

13,340. In your own experience of asylum administration, are you satisfied that there exists sufficient means for bringing to your knowledge anything that may be going wrong in the institutions?—"Sufficient" is a very difficult word. I do not think any system is sufficient to bring every information of every detail that goes wrong in a big place, but there is provision for such reporting of difficulties which I think answers very well indeed. It is not very often that a thing goes wrong. You must not forget that this is a business dependent upon the human element which is not always perfect. There is an occasional lapse of duty on the part of an attendant, or other official, which has to be dealt with, because it is the human imperfection that we have to meet; but it is the exception and not the rule. For instance, I do not know whether this is the right place for me to go on to what has been said about attendants not treating patients satisfactorily. We have known two or three cases in which we were satisfied when we investigated them, that the attendants were to blame. We have not known many cases. We always investigate every complaint, whether we hear it directly or indirectly, either from outside or inside the place. We always investigate a complaint, and as a rule the complaints are not well founded; but I do not think a counsel of perfection could be used in connection with these great places where we have people who, up till now, have not been too well educated for their job, and have not had, perhaps, the necessary sympathy which comes with the greater knowledge of it. We have a better class of young men and young women now.

13,341. Of course, everybody with common sense recognises that you cannot depend upon the human element, and you cannot get perfect medical superintendents, or even, if you please, perfect Royal Commissions. But what we are very concerned about is this, that there should be adequate means of bringing to a responsible authority's notice any instances where there has been a breakdown. If anything goes wrong on a railway system there is a Board of Trade Inquiry into it; and, similarly, where there is a breakdown in any institution one wants to know that the responsible authorities are apprised of it, and that there are means of so apprising them?—I am much obliged to you for giving me an opportunity of replying to that. We have such an administrative machinery that we do get information of anything that is going wrong. If we do get the information, and I think we do get it almost invariably, we certainly take great pains to investigate it and to put matters right.

13,342. Let me put this to you: the patient is in the hands of attendants primarily: suppose we have an attendant who is not a desirable person—such there must be among a large body. Is there not a risk of the patient being illtreated, or at least not well treated, and of that not coming to the cognisance of the authority, just for the reason that the patient has not any means of telling, or it may be that he is afraid of doing so, in view of the consequences that may be visited upon him by the attendant? One is so anxious to see that there should be a contact possible between the patient and the authority, and not the interposition of a barrier between the two. It is there that personally I am very much concerned to see there should not be any screen or barrier interposed. What do you say with regard to that?—With regard to our sources of information of how things are going on, first of all we get a lot from the patients themselves, the patients are very quick to report anything; if they see an attendant strike a patient it would be reported directly by half a dozen different patients; it is impossible to keep it back. The attendants also tell of one another; if they are working with someone that they feel they cannot work with, because they have not the right spirit, they will communicate with the superintendent and let him know.

13,343. Then do you find there is not such a reluctance to communicate with the visiting committee?—No, the visiting committee regularly gets the expressions of patients as to their grievances, and they are very numerous, and are always listened to; and if there is any definite grievance we have it investigated, as to whether or not there is anything in it.

13,344. I am sure that as regards the disposal of complaints you do your best; what I am rather more concerned with is to see whether every justifiable complaint reaches you?—Well, I think the vast majority of them do.

13,345. Of course, if you say you have a great number of them coming in, that must show that the channel of communication is pretty open?—It is always open. We are always there to listen to complaints. Anyone who knows anything of asylums knows, of course, that it is the natural thing for the patients when they go there to imagine all sorts of grievances, but when they get better these all go. It is the best test when you get a person who has really been violent and bad and difficult to manage; and, when he is going out cured we say "Now have you been well treated, have you any complaint to make against anybody in the asylum? This will make no difference to your going out, but if you have any grievance let us know, if you have been inconvenienced, or hurt in any way." That is the sort of thing said to every patient on discharge, and, as a rule, in 99 cases out of 100 they say "Oh, we have been very well treated." A man might say "I know I was difficult to manage at first, but I have got all right now, and everybody is kind," and so on.

13,346. Do some of them ever draw your attention to things which have gone wrong in their own case? Yes.

13,347. They do sometimes?—Yes, sometimes.

13,348. As they are leaving?—Yes, we have one or two complaints.

13,349. Has that deterred you from discharging?—In one case I had, on investigation we found that the complaint was justifiable, and we followed it up with the patient after he left the asylum and held an inquiry, and had the whole thing gone into, and we dealt out justice to those concerned.

13,350. Mr. Snell: Would a restored patient's memory be satisfactory as to what happened when he was sick?—It depends; it is very difficult to account for the memory of some people when they are not responsible.

13,351. Chairman: But he would not be likely to forget if he had had ill treatment?—When they are getting better as a rule they realise it. When they are very violent as a rule they know nothing and do not remember very much. They get told what they did for instance. Some men would be going about knocking about everything, carrying knives about ready to stick into everybody, and even committee men have to be careful in going round asylums. We have had some killed and maimed by patients. There are some patients in asylums who are always threatening to murder the superintendent if they can get a chance, and committee men have to tolerate that sort of thing. I have been threatened by I do not know how many patients who would have murdered me if they could have got me quietly, because they thought I was responsible for keeping them. You cannot prevent people having these impressions.

13,352. I could imagine that a great many of the persons who are in asylums, although they may be suffering from a particular delusion, and therefore quite proper persons to detain, may, on matters not relating to that delusion, be able to give you quite satisfactory evidence?—Quite. We have some cases where they are only deluded on one chain of ideas.

13,353. Take a person of that sort who, outside the particular sphere of his delusion, is more or less normal, what that person tells about the conditions in the asylum will be quite reliable, will it not?—Quite, and we get comments all the while from patients. We are on conversational terms with them all.

13,354. Yes, but I think it is desirable to remove the impression that what a patient says in an asylum about what is happening in the asylum is necessarily unreliable. It all depends upon the kind of patient you are dealing with, and the state of the patient?—Quite; it is often reliable.

13,355. Provided that it is not a thing permeated or tainted with his particular delusion?—Precisely.

13,356. Have you found you often get quite reliable accounts of what was going on in your institutions from patients who were actually certified patients in your institutions?—Yes; I can give you an instance of a telepathic delusion of a patient. Her husband was in South Africa. She swore that she could get regular communications through her eyes from her husband in South Africa. She was there in the asylum for a few months, and then we thought in talking her case over she seemed fairly sensible about everything else, and that she might be allowed out. Her delusion was not worth much. We allowed her out. She had not been out a month before she began visiting the police superintendent and threatening to commit suicide because she was getting messages through her eyes from the superintendent of the asylum, and she had to be sent back.

13,357. It may well be that a delusion may so permeate a person's life as to render them very properly detainable, but it does not follow that because a person is under a delusion on one subject, he may not be able to give quite reliable information on other matters?—What I meant was she was perfectly sensible and reliable except on her delusion. It was only when her delusion led her into violence that she had to be taken care of.

13,358. Chairman: I think, Sir William, in view of the fact that you have expressed your general agreement with Mr. Taggart on the evidence he has given to-day, it would be useful if we were to turn now to matters which he has not dealt with, and upon which you have views to communicate to us, particularly with regard to incipient cases on which, I think, you can supplement a good deal what Mr. Taggart has said. Of course, having your own professional knowledge, it comes in supplement of his administrative experience. I see that you make observations on the Mental Treatment Bill?—Yes.

13,359. On the subject of the Bill generally do you approve the principle of it?—Yes. We asked for that Bill by resolutions of our Mental Hospitals Association, and we consider that for a long time the necessity for such a Bill has been evident. We are struck with the fact that we might have been relieved of a number of cases that came in very badly affected who would probably, with a little gentler treatment in the early stages, have avoided the acute development.

13,360. So you want to fill up a gap in the existing system which you think should be supplied by some such scheme as the Mental Treatment Bill provides?—Quite, but unfortunately that Bill was very much enlarged. The Board of Control, when they introduced it, also introduced a number of things that we did not ask for, and we opposed that Bill very seriously; and shall continue to oppose, so long as it contains what we consider to be so objectionable that we do not want it at all, until we get a Bill relieved of those matters that we have such strong objection to.

13,361. One may have to be a little more accommodating; sometimes one has to give away a little bit of what one wants oneself in order to attain an object, but I admire your resolution. However, on the general question, which is the first matter of principle in the Bill, I understand, you are in agreement; but as to some of the machinery, and some of the methods provided, you are in disagreement?—Yes.

13,362. I have the last edition of the Bill before me, and I understand the first point to which you take exception is the constitution of the visiting committees, and particularly of the provisions for co-option?—Yes. Both the Mental Hospitals Association and the County Councils Association entertain very strong objection to that clause, not that they object to women—they do not object to women being on these committees, but they say they should be representative women who come to represent elected bodies, who are the only bodies who constitute these asylum committees.

Earl Russell: I wish you would take sub-section (1) and sub-section (2) separately, because they are two separate proposals.

13,363. Chairman: If you take the first sub-section, it empowers the local authority to appoint as members of a visiting committee persons who are not members of a council, but subject to a very restricted limitation in number. May I just put to you a suggestion, and that is this: that you may well have persons who would be interested in the welfare of the mentally afflicted and who might devote both time and work to the subject, but who might find the rest of the work of a local representative distasteful—I mean the election, and all the rest of it. Such a person might nevertheless be an exceedingly useful assistant in that one particular branch?—Might I say that is always the argument used for co-option. I have had a good deal of experience of the co-option on public bodies, and I cannot say that I think it has been entirely of a satisfactory character.

13,364. What was wrong—I would like to know the practical point?—We find that some of the co-opted members, very enthusiastic and desirable people in promoting the interests of particular lines, are men who do not consider the question of cost sometimes at all. The most expensive members on our education committees, as a rule, are the co-opted members, because they are not responsible to anybody who has to pay.

13,365. But there is no authority to spend money; they can only recommend?—But they have authority to spend money on these committees. On the education committee their votes count as much as the votes of councillors and other people who represent bodies.

13,366. But the visiting committee itself does not spend the money, does it?—Oh yes; it is absolutely autonomous.

13,367. I thought it was under the control of the authority?—No, it is absolutely autonomous—that is the serious part of it.

13,368. They could not build buildings?—Oh yes; it is absolutely autonomous. We simply issue a precept on the overseers and the guardians for what money we want, and they have to pay.

13,369. Earl Russell: But surely you are wrong about capital expenditure?—If the county council approves, all the work is handed over to these visiting committees, and, as those who have had anything to do with the details of building know, it is often the extras which make all the difference.

13,370. Chairman: I can well understand the undesirability of having persons who have a voice in expenditure, but yet who are not subject to the electorate in any way. That is certainly objectionable?—That is the principal objection. The County Councils Association is very strong indeed about it. They have passed resolutions.

13,371. Earl Russell: Why do you say they can incur capital expenditure? Look at Section 238 of the Lunacy Act of 1890?—That is the obligation to provide asylums.

13,372. If you couple that with Section 240 you will see the local authority is defined.

13,373. Chairman: But we must also look at Section 254. Apparently there is a considerable degree of freedom in dealing with plans and estimates, and so on?—I have been in two large extensions at my own asylum, one costing about £100,000, and the other over £100,000. I know the County Council had nothing to do with the initial sanction.

13,374. Take sub-section (3) of Section 254: "A Visiting Committee shall report to the local authority or local authorities by whom they were elected, all plans, estimates, and contracts agreed upon, and also the amount to be paid by each local authority, and such plans, estimates, and contracts shall be subject to the approval of the local authority, to whom they are to be reported, except where the amount to be expended does not exceed an amount previously fixed by the local authority." If that is so, does it not mean that any contract for expenditure of money upon buildings, or any other matter, is to have the approval of the local authority?—That is in the capital expenditure. I think that is quite right; but in the maintenance charges they have absolute power.

13,375. Earl Russell: Maintenance, I agree; you can give them plum pudding every day if you like?—Yes, champagne if you wish; but when the county council has sanctioned the plans it is simply a question of course of the introduction of detailed extras. My experience has been that buildings cost an enormous sum for details and extras in excess of what is originally sanctioned, and the local authority has very little influence really in upsetting the resolutions of these autonomous committees.

13,376. They have complete power?—I have never known them to be overridden.

13,377. Chairman: Perhaps that was because they were reasonable?—The principle I might say of this objection is that we insist on the representative character of the present committees representing the rate-payers, the people who provide the money; they are either members of county councils or borough councils; they are the people who ought to have the right to say what money shall be provided and in the maintenance charges to the unions they are absolutely autonomous; they can fix whatever they like. We get some interested people who will come on, and will say: "We must have this, that and the other," and they can be very lavish in their expenditure. And do you know, Sir, it is very difficult to resist a sympathetic appeal made on behalf of suffering humanity on any committee. It is quite possible to be lavish and extravagant unreasonably. I have sometimes heard an appeal made on different bodies which I should say is a sympathetic appeal creditable to the heart of the individual who makes it, but not considerate to those people who have to pay the costs. It might be modified in consequence, and it is very difficult to resist, and it is the same experience that different councils have had in these matters which have caused them to pass unanimous resolutions, because these resolutions were all unanimous, they were not by majorities.

13,378. It is the irresponsibility of the co-opted members that you fear?—That is it. If they came on as members of committees we should be delighted. On my committee we have two very admirable women, and I should be very sorry to lose them.

13,379. Earl Russell: How do you find that this works in practice with education committees. Do you find the same objections that you are raising there?—Sometimes we do. That is a criticism which comes to us very freely from boards of guardians, who are the very people who criticise our expenditure in these asylums. The boards of guardians are always passing resolutions protesting against the extravagance of the county council, especially upon matters of education, and they say the co-opted members are the most extravagant of the lot. I am passing it on for what it is worth.

13,380. Chairman: But has not the principle of co-option already found a place in this chapter of legislation, because under the Mental Deficiency Act provision is made for co-opted members?—Yes.

13,381. Then a further provision is made whereby the visiting committee for the purposes of the Lunacy Acts may be the same body as acts under the Mental Deficiency Act, so that in that way you may get actually a body under the Lunacy Act which contains co-opted members. Is not that so?—Yes, it is so; all the same we set forward the objection as much as we can. I am here as the mouthpiece of the two Associations to say this.

13,382. Earl Russell: Are you not forgetting also that this is a permissive power?—I have already said that in my précis. We recognise it is an enabling power; in the case of women it is compulsory.

13,382A. Miss Madeleine Symons: But you would not suggest that two women would be able to persuade the council?—I have seen two women who could persuade any council of men.

13,383. Chairman: I am sure we all think that the presence of women on the administrative bodies of these institutions is very desirable, among other things, because of the fact that there are more women mentally affected than men; and also because of their greater knowledge of household concerns, which makes them perhaps better critics of the administration of the institutions. How are you going to get women on, because there are practically very few women on local authorities?—We do not find any difficulty. On most of the local authorities in my district women are coming on in an elected capacity.

13,384. On your own visiting committee have you women?—Yes, we have two who come from the Borough of Birkenhead. We are in partnership with the Boroughs of Birkenhead and Wallasey; two of them come on from Birkenhead, and there is another one who goes on to the other asylum who is a member of the County Council.

13,385. So you have not had the difficulty of having to go outside your area for co-opted women?—No, because they come in appointed by the representative authorities who have the power to appoint.

13,386. I do not think that is so everywhere, you know, Sir William. I mean there are some places where there are no women on the visiting committee?—Well, you know, Sir, I am voicing an objection which is the product of what experience we have in these matters on various bodies where it has been done, and many of my colleagues on the County Councils Association come across it in many ways; and I was rather staggered by the amount of opposition which came from them; it was very keen indeed. I do not say that we in Cheshire have had any difficulty. My wife was a member of the Board of Guardians for 15 years before she died, and I know all about the difficulties they have. I am not against women coming on; it is simply that I am here to say that both these Associations which represent County Councils and Borough Councils say, "by all means come on, but come on in a representative capacity."

13,387. So your general objection is, as I take it, this, that you object to the principle of co-option, because it introduces into the governing body persons who have not the same responsibility as elected members. That is your general objection?—Yes.

13,388. And that so far as it is necessary or desirable to have women on the governing bodies, you think that in course of time they can be obtained from the elected representatives without the necessity of having the power to co-opt them?—They are coming on rapidly. Women have come to stay in these matters; we must recognise it. I do not think there is any difficulty.

13,389. Earl Russell: Do not you think if you had more active and more inquisitive co-opted members on the visiting committee, some of the criticisms which have been passed on Prestwich asylum might have been averted?—Prestwich asylum—I do not think it is quite fair to ask me about that, as I have had nothing to do with it. I know their difficulties; but my colleague here I daresay will be quite ready for it; but there was a lady on that committee, so Mr. Taggart tells me.

13,390. Yes, but I said active co-opted members?—I think she lost her seat because she was so active.

13,391. Mr. Snell: I cannot understand, Sir William, what objection there is to any person being co-opted who knows the subject, who is earnest and able and diligent, just because she does not wish to go through the strain of a contested election?—There again I hope I make it clear that I do not object to anybody on committees who may have particular knowledge, but my experience is that it is well to bring out people who have some sympathetic touch with those who provide all the money. I think that a father has a right to know how the expenditure is going in the house. I think these local bodies have a right to control expenditure, and if they say (I am voicing their sentiments) that their experience is that these sort of people are not representative, have no care about money, and are not the best people to appoint, it does not mean more than that.

13,392. Earl Russell: Your objection would not be met by an amendment in the Bill that they should not have any vote on financial questions?—Yes, it would. We suggested that from the County Councils Association, and the Board of Control turned it down.

13,393. But the Board of Control has not the last word?—No. We intended to fight it in the House, but it did not go further.

13,394. Chairman: Now may we turn to Clause 2 which is designed to extend the powers of visiting committees. Again, I think here you have a criticism to make of the Bill, in so far as it subjects to the approval of the Board of Control certain matters which in your view should be dealt with by the local authority without such supervision?—Yes. Take the beginning of Clause 2; "Subject to the approval of the Board of Control the visiting committee shall," then follow various clauses. Sub-clause (5): "undertake research in relation to mental disorder," and so on. We object to the Board of Control saying that they shall have the control of our research work. I was on a deputation that waited on the Board of Control some time ago to ask them to move the Home Office, which then had the Board of Control, to give a grant towards research work; and urged that it should be given and schemes approved, so that the money should not be frittered away. Public money so granted might fairly be claimed to be under an approved scheme, but this is different. In my asylum—and our asylum is a similar case to many asylums in this country—they spend large sums of money in fitting up up-to-date laboratories for research work; they have specially appointed officers in those laboratories capable of doing the finest work; they can make their own vaccines and sera, and everything, and their bacteriological work is everything that can be desired. Now we say, do not try to muzzle or to smother the impetus, the expressions of desire for getting on with discovering something; we say it is not needed. We say that that is not the way to deal with the research people. Research people have a peculiar type of mind. It is not the average mind, it is a discovering mind, the inventive mind; it is the mind of the pioneer thinker who prepares the way in a new direction, which has not been thought of before, and that is what research work is bound to be.

13,395. Yes, but I think the purpose of requiring the approval of the Board of Control, which would no doubt not be withheld in any reasonable case is rather this—it is to prevent duplication. For example, suppose two visiting committees in adjoining areas were both setting up laboratories, or pathological laboratories, for some particular line of investigation, when one would have been quite enough; you may have a considerable amount of expenditure by local authorities which is really superfluous. You may not want more than one or two centres for a specialised study of some particular branch of mental disease. You know the rivalry which arises amongst local bodies, and each one wants to do it better than the other. That is healthy up to a point, but it is very expensive?—Is it not up to this point, that there is only one who may be a discoverer and you do not know where he will be? I am in favour of team work under proper circumstances; I am not in favour of preventing the individual investigation of any competent committee acting through its well appointed experts.

13,396. But do you think the Board of Control would resist that, when one finds in their Report, which I have read, that they are all for encouraging research?—Why should they have this power, they do not pay the money—we provide the money. Why should they ask for power to control it?

13,397. They do not ask for power to control it. They ask that this step should be taken, that if research work is being undertaken and money is being spent upon it, it is desirable that their approval should be invoked, which has several advantages. It has the advantage, first of all, that they know what is going on; it has also the advantage that they might make suggestions that certain bodies might join together to have a laboratory for some particular purpose. It may have disadvantages, but I can also see that it has some advantages; I do not think it is all one way?—We think it has so many disadvantages that it is mischievous in the extreme. They do not do anything to provide these laboratories, we provide them ourselves; we have the right officials to work them, and we are quite alive and informed enough to work in team work wherever we think it is desirable. I do not believe in restricting the liberty of research; it is a great mistake.

13,398. Earl Russell: You said, "We are providing the money, and why should we not be allowed to spend it"; you, the local authority, are not providing the money, it is the ratepayers who are providing the money?—I meant the ratepayers.

13,399. If Parliament grants you here a new power to tax the ratepayer, why should not Parliament attach to that power any precautions it thinks proper?—Is it a new power?

13,400. If it is not a new power it does not require to be given?—It is a power we have and use.

13,401. They say here, subject to that, you shall have the power?—It is a crippling of the local authority's liberty.

13,402. Have you this power now?—Yes, we have it now, and use it, and we say we have no right to be restrained, we say "Hands off, we are quite capable of managing our own business, and this is our business."

13,403. Parliament may think the public may require protection?—If Parliament thinks we want preventing they will say so.

13,404. Chairman: What is the power under which at present you can make contributions to the expense of anybody engaged in research into mental disorder?—Simply that we are doing it.

13,405. That is not a very complete answer?—Nobody can prevent us; it is part of the equipment of the hospital.

13,406. You see the Board of Control, so far as I have read their Reports, seems to me to be urging upon many visiting committees the desirability of engaging in and encouraging research?—On their lines; they want to settle the lines. They want to say "You do cancer here; you do tumours that are non-malignant there; you examine for dysentery in your place." That is not the way to do it.

13,407. Earl Russell: If that is what they mean, I should be inclined to agree with you, but do you think it is what they mean?—It is what they mean.

13,408. Sir Humphry Rolleston: In point of fact have the Board of Control taken any action that seems to be capricious?—No, because they have not had the power. That clause has more opposition to it than any other clause in the Bill.

13,409. There is the advantage of having the advice of the Board of Control as to the correlation of what work is to be done?—I do not think there is, because we can correlate it as much as we like with the asylums who are doing the work. This is like a bolt from the blue. Why should we be interfered with? When our Mental Hospitals Association was discussing the question of asking for State grants, it was also found that the Association was not in favour of having any State grants if it meant more control by the Board of Control. I am giving the views, the decisions of the Association, and if we had offered to us larger grants with more grip on our liberty of action we would say "Take your grants, we would be better without them."

13,410. Chairman: Of course, we are the recipients of very many diverging views round this table. There is another view that has been put before us by some reformers that what is wanted is that the Board of Control should have larger powers, including powers to see that things are done by local authorities who are remiss?—We have acted under the Board of Control for many years. I have known them for over 30 years, and I have had a good deal of experience in dealing with the Board of Control, and with all other Government Departments, as you may imagine. My experience is that the Board of Control are wrong as often as they are right. I can give you illustrations to show you our difficulties. I will give you one, if I may, not to be too verbose, but I shall be very glad to give it; for instance, we had our plans for the last extension of the asylum; we had in those plans the provision of an operating theatre. Those plans were held up for I do not know how long; we could not get any definite information from the Board of Control as to what was their precise objection. They did not understand anything about that operating theatre. There were several other things, but that was the principal one. I went up to see the Board of Control, and I saw one of the senior members, who is also a medical man, and he said "We cannot understand what you want an operating theatre for." "What," I said, "we have 1,400 patients in that asylum; we are constantly wanting operations of a serious character; we often get acute abdomens, appendicitis is a common occurrence." He said "Why do not you take one of these small wards next to the dormitories?" I said: "That dormitory is a very septic place. If you ask me, I should say it would save time if you wrote your death certificate before you did your operation, if you are going to operate in a room like that." We had no further trouble. They passed the plans, and we have got our operating theatre. Every day we have operations of a serious and intricate character.

13,411. That is a very good illustration, and, of course, we all recognise that there may be objections often to central control, delay, and so on, and also a divergence of view; but your theory would carry you a long way, it would carry you the length of this, that local authorities should not be brought under the control of any central body. I hold no brief for the central body, but I merely have to consider the position, and we know that conflicts between central bodies and local bodies are not unknown; in fact, they are pretty frequent?—If local government is to degenerate into a sham, and to be simply a ventilation of public opinion, the sooner local authorities are disbanded the better.

13,412. Sir Humphry Rolleston: There is a question with regard to the research work. It is conceivable—not, of course, in Cheshire, but in some places—that the medical officers attached to an asylum might have a tendency to investigate some point on which they were, so to speak, obsessed, which it was well known to the rest of the profession was a barren problem, or did not offer any prospects of advantage from its research. Would it not, in a case like that, be advisable that a central authority who took a broad view, and would not in any way want to limit the liberty of people, as a rule, should be able to point out that this was a problem which had already been investigated, and it was not any good doing it again?—My experience is that team work regulated by central control is not successful work. I will give you our most recent experience of that, if I may, it is just hinted at in my précis. We have had foot-and-mouth disease in Cheshire; I have had something to do with all the councils which have been working under difficulties with the policy of the Ministry of Agriculture, and they have been slaughtering fifty thousand head of cattle, and have been spending millions of money on a policy of which we do not approve, but what is worse, they stopped us from investigation. We had Professor Beatty, who was working with us. I do not think there is a finer research bacteriologist than Professor Beatty, of the Liverpool University, in the country, and he had gone further than anyone had ever gone up to that point, and he had found that he had got what did produce foot and mouth disease in other animals, and was then going on to consider his preparation of other material for prophylactic work for the prevention of foot and mouth disease; and he was suddenly stopped and not allowed to go on any farm where there was foot and mouth disease, because he might carry infection round. That is our experience of team work. I think that team work in the Ministry of Agriculture has some alliance with another department. That is team work, and I say you cannot pick out your discoverers.

13,413. Chairman: That is elementary, but that, of course, would just go this length, that we should scrap the Ministry of Agriculture as well. It might be very desirable to scrap all the Government Departments, but it is not the way things are governed in this country. The system is, there is a hierarchy under which there would be delegated powers to local authorities coupled with a power of control in a central body. You may find that system irksome, and in some cases it no doubt embarrasses the activities of local authorities, but it is the system under which we have to live just now. What one is concerned with is, that there should not be undue interference; but a certain amount of co-ordination has been of value?—We welcome advice as much as you like, but we say the tendency now is that we are too much governed, and we want a little more liberty and not less.

13,414. Earl Russell: Would it meet your views in this sub-section (5) if it were worded—I cannot think of the words at the moment, but if it were so worded simply to give the Board of Control power to approve or not to approve of the expenditure of money on research, and then not enable them in that way to prescribe the method of research?—No, we want our liberty as we have it. We think the most precious thing we have got is to have the right of research work in our own laboratories with our own inspection, acting under the inspiration which our people could give.

13,415. You are sure you have it now?—Yes. I can give you some instances of very fine work done in our laboratory. We have the power now, I am satisfied.

13,416. Chairman: Let us examine that more clearly. First of all, the Board of Control's policy, as we know from their reports, and the evidence they have given us, is to encourage research as much as possible. Taking it that their policy is to encourage research, I have a little difficulty in seeing what the objection is to their being also invoked as the persons who are to approve of what is being done. I can understand your objection if it was to be a dead hand which was to stop all research work?—Do you not think it does stop us?

13,417. It might stop you where you ought to be stopped?—Can you give me any good reason why we should be stopped?

13,418. Yes, I think you might be stopped in a case where, as Sir Humphry said, a medical superintendent, not knowing that similar research is being carried out in some other place, was trying to persuade the visiting committee to spend £5,000 on a laboratory to investigate something which had already been investigated in another part of the country?—I do not know any illustration of that where it has been done.

13,419. Nor do I, but you asked me to figure one, and it seemed to me that might be a very good example?—We object very strongly indeed. We must press our objection here as we must press it elsewhere.

13,420. Believe me, I appreciate it is a perfectly sincere objection?—I am beginning from the circumference and working to the centre. We say what has the centre done for our research work? We have been living under them ever since we came into existence. I have been under them for 34 years, and they have done nothing for research.

13,421. Chairman: They have had no powers?—They have had all sorts of powers of an advisory character, and they have had powers to give us a lead in many ways.

13,422. Would you be in favour of the Board of Control being given powers to compel visiting committees to engage in research work where they are not doing it now?—I should be against that even.

13,423. And at the same time you are complaining that they have never encouraged it.

13,424. Earl Russell: They have had neither the money nor the power?—They have the money in that they have powers of sanction. We cannot get loans without we get their approval. They have the grip of the money in that respect.

13,425. Chairman: We have been told by many witnesses that the Board of Control has no power to do anything but advise, and that its advice need not be taken, and, consequently, when it advises something that is desirable the visiting committee may just snap its fingers at it?—May I point out where the power comes in? A local authority is going to put up a building; it has to spend so much money, capital expenditure; it has to raise that money; they cannot raise a farthing of it if they do not get the sanction of the Government Department. To begin with that gives them very great influence, and they can block a thing for ever so long if they think fit, as we have been blocked. I think we were 12 months before we could get proper answers from the Board of Control to our letters in our first extension.

13,426. Would it not be very improper for the Board of Control to block an extension of buildings in order to compel an authority to engage in research work?—I should say it was always improper to bring pressure of that sort to bear. You cannot compel local authorities after all in that way.

13,427. And you have just been complaining that in your 30 years' experience the Board of Control have brought no pressure to bear?—They have brought pressure to bear on research work; they have mentioned it once or twice.

13,428. Earl Russell: That is all they can do?—They can do a good deal more than that.

13,429. What?—They have got their team work; they have got the touch with the central research committee which acts under Government control and Government moneys.

13,430. Chairman: Do you approve of the Board of Control's existing powers being enlarged or diminished?—I think the existing powers of the Board of Control need no extra permission being given to them, to prevent us from doing work which we freely are able to do and to provide money for now.

13,431. I am afraid that does not answer my question. The Board of Control has certain powers at present—do you think those powers generally are too narrow, or do you think they are sufficiently wide?—Generally I think they are sufficient.

13,432. As they are?—As they are; I do not think they need any further control. We are against their having any further control. I have just told you that the Mental Hospitals Association's view is that if it means more control we will not have their money.

13,433. And equally that would apply to the Ministry of Health, if they became the controlling body in place of the Board of Control?—You know, Sir, there are great complaints against the compulsory powers of the Ministry of Health. There is a growing desire for the expansion of freedom rather than for the restriction of freedom.

13,434. Are you in favour of the existing powers of the Board of Control being diminished?—I am not in favour of their being increased.

13,435. Earl Russell: What you are in favour of is Soviet rule—local committees?—No, I am not in favour of that.

13,436. Chairman: It is difficult to see exactly where you stand, because I could understand your saying that you disliked more interference; that is a perfectly legitimate point of view; and that there should be more trust of the local authorities, and less intervention; that is quite a recognisable policy. On the other hand I think you must accept the view that in the matter of the treatment of the insane this country has decided that there shall be some central supervisory authority. The question comes to be what type of function ought that central body to have? Should it be supervisory, advisory on the one hand, or should it have what we may call executive powers on the other? That is really the problem, I think?—Yes.

13,437. You would assent to the view that we cannot at this time of day scrap the central body?—Quite.

13,438. The question comes to be what is the most valuable part that central authority can play in the administration of the lunacy laws?—I say the more it is advisory, and the less it is executive the more it will do well; and I do not think any effort which they are making in this Bill (because it has been put in gratuitously) any effort to get further executive powers over local authorities—is going to do any good. It will only create greater resistance, greater dissatisfaction. And there is one thing I wanted to say about it, there is no body of people who know better the advantages of publicity than the Board of Control; when the Board of Control speaks everybody listens, they have got the ear of everybody. They have only got to publish what they want to get any grievance remedied, and readily remedied. My experience is that when the Board of Control come down through their inspectors, if they say anything to us about our administration which is good we are delighted; we do not discard good advice, we welcome it, but if they come and find fault with something which we are satisfied is right and they are wrong, then we should not like them to have executive power to compel us.

13,439. Earl Russell: Do you provide more verandahs in your asylum on their recommendation at once?—Yes, we are doing so; they are doing it in some workhouses in Chester, too. We had a recommendation the other day to provide more verandahs so as to get more sunlight and shelter. I want to say that these committees are committees of the people, they are people who are elected from popular constituencies. They have to give an account of their stewardships. My experience is that the interest that they take in their work is magnificent; I have been amazed at the amount of time which some of them will give and the money they will spend on it, too, in order to carry out their work. Then take farmers. Now the farmer grudges the spending of sixpence more than a Scotchman. The farmer amongst us is known as a very economical spender. They pay their own expenses. Some of us think, of course, that it is not quite fair that boroughs should be able to pay the expenses of their members, but still they do it, and it is because they are interested. The amount of time and interest they give to this work is, in the last extreme, praiseworthy. I have met with it so much, I am bound to say it, and I never knew any good thing brought before them that they did not hold up both hands for it.

13,440. I have fought one or two county council elections, and I cannot say I recollect asylum management ever being mentioned much by the candidates?—They must have been very well satisfied with it.

13,441. But do you find it is a subject of discussion at the elections?—I have seen it raised in one or two of our county elections, but they are so satisfied with what they are getting that it was not raised at the last election at all.

13,442. Chairman: On the general question you know I have not the least doubt that in Lancashire, where you have evidently, as one would expect, a very lively interest in your local government, all may be well; you may have zealous people and good work done, but there are other parts of England besides Lancashire, and there are other local authorities who may not be so zealous; indeed we have heard of a number of things that have happened in other places which are very different from what you tell us. Now the kind of legislation we have to contemplate is not merely home rule legislation for Lancashire, but legislation for other people who may not be so efficient?—I hope you dissociate my county from Lancashire. I like Lancashire very much, but I am here to keep Cheshire up as much as I can.

13,443. I beg your pardon, I should have said there are other counties besides Cheshire and Lancashire. Of course, we know in London, for example, the problems are much easier to handle and require much less interference from above?—May I point out that that was the very reason why this Mental Hospitals Association was brought into existence, to provide advisory centres, confederal centres, where different committees could meet, discuss their problems, deal with all the difficulties, and, if necessary, with the Board of Control, advise one another generally in matters of procedure; and it was because we had done that that we have found it is exceedingly useful. We have had expressions of thankfulness from a number of committees for the help we have been able to give them, and I think that this is a way in which the development of liberty on lines of responsibility is to be encouraged rather than to be discouraged.

13,444. Earl Russell: Now if I find, as I did find, an asylum where the wards were very dismal and very badly furnished, and not properly heated, and where generally the whole administration was slack, what is to be done about that without a central authority to ginger them up. You may take it there is no active public opinion there?—But there has been a central authority to ginger them up all these years, and they have never done it.

13,445. But they have, I have read their reports; but they have no sort of power. Having done that the matter drops; nobody reads the reports except the superintendent and the visiting committee?—Well, we are gingering up all our authorities as far as we can, because there is no sympathy in the counsels of reasonable people with being behind what is necessary.

13,446. What would call attention to it would be if they had the power of withholding the grant?—We say we would rather have our liberty.

13,447. You would, but other people would not; how are you to deal with them?—Our Association says so. It is the combination of other authorities.

13,448. That is the one that Lord Clifford of Chudleigh used to represent in the House, is it not, and Lord Balfour before him?—Yes.

13,449. Chairman: But your objection, I gather, to the approval of the Board of Control being interposed affects only the fifth head of sub-clause (2)—is that right? On the other matter, I take it, you do not object to their approval being required?—Yes, we do; we object to the appointment of these new inspectors, such a lot of them, with all the powers of Commissioners.

13,450. But that is not under Clause 2. For the moment I was asking whether any of the other sub-clauses of Clause 2 are objectionable?—No.

13,451. Then when you come to Clause 3, which proposes a reduction of paid Commissioners and certain other matters, have you any comment there, Sir William?—Yes, the appointment of new inspectors; these inspectors are to have the full powers of Commissioners.

13,452. Earl Russell: Which, as we have just observed, are nothing?—Not if they get this Bill through. This is going to alter the complexion of everything. We are going to be under a tyranny if we get this. We have already had some experience of their inefficiency in the prescription of books and records. The tendency of all these Government Departments is to ask for multiplication of records and new books of all sorts. I would not say that if I had not had some experience of it in several directions; but we say that these inspectors, if they are to have the same powers as the Commissioners (they are practically Commissioners at a lower salary), will be inferior men. They will not be men we would appoint at high salaries; they will not be the best type of men, because they will not get the right type of men. We say it is the multiplication table again in their own direction, and in their own Department. I hope I will not be offensive in being so candid; I have tried very hard to avoid any language which would be offensive; I have no desire to be offensive.

13,453. Chairman: We have heard on all hands that the Board of Control is ineffectual; its visits are perfunctory, at all events, some say so, and it has no power; but you come and say there ought not to be more officials to inspect, and there ought not to be more regulations as to the inspections?—You can understand it is not pleasant to me to have to give utterance to these views.

13,454. We are welcoming your candid expression of opinion, but we have had equally expressive evidence that what the Board of Control wants is more control to inspect, and what is wrong now is that the asylums are not properly inspected.

13,455. Earl Russell: We do not mind the opinion a bit, we want to understand it?—I have seen these inspectors as they have come to asylums; I know their work. Suppose they come to my asylum, of which I have been Chairman for so many years: they will see 1,500 patients all in a day, quite possibly go on for two days. What can they see in two days with 1,500 patients?

13,456. Chairman: Therefore their inspection is ineffective?—Yes; I say it is worth nothing. When they go up to the laboratory and have got anything to suggest we are all agog at once. If they pick out any new case and suggest any treatment we should be delighted. They generally pick out things which are of very little value.

13,457. Sir Humphry Rolleston: In a nutshell, do you think the Board of Control should be dispensed with?—I do not quite know that I should, because I do not think I have said anything that calls for that. I do not like the term "control."

13,458. Earl Russell: You have not said anything which shows they are of any use?—I do not believe they are doing good effective work.

13,459. Chairman: If the Board of Control is doing no good effective work, why should it continue in existence?—I should not be sorry to see it scrapped—I am giving my Association's opinion; and if they are to have more control we would rather scrap their grants.

13,460. If they are to be scrapped, should anything be substituted for them?—Not a controlling body—an advisory body, yes. I think the committees which are appointed by the people, by popular vote, are in direct touch with the people; these people know the members of the committee, go and interview them, buttonhole them,—I say that is the best system of control after all.

13,461. Of course, there should be no Ministry of Health, either, on that view?—I venture to say this, that the reductio ad absurdum argument is hardly fair in this respect, because I am a local government man, and I have had to deal with a great many Government Departments; but my experience has been, and it is the view of a great many of our associational bodies, different sets of councils, that we are getting far too much interference from central governing bodies, and that we could do better if we had less.

13,462. Earl Russell: That is just what the Chairman put to you?—I do not want to be pushed to the other extreme, to say there should be none of them. I think that there ought to be some central bodies collecting information on their own and diffusing it, but when it comes to controlling it, I think there is too much control already.

13,463. Do you object to the central control of education?—Very often. I have objected to a great many of their controlling powers. It just depends upon what they happen to be for the time being. I have been Chairman of the County Education Committee for a very long time, not now, but I have had reason to differ a great deal from the Board of Education.

13,464. Anyhow, you think public opinion and public election is quite sufficient safeguard for all these things?—I think it is the best safeguard in the ultimate resort.

13,465. Chairman: That is with regard to the matter of inspectors. Is there anything else in the Bill to which your Association takes exception?—Yes. May I point out that this is the way the Board of Control frame their Bill? In Clause 4 you will find an arrangement made by which these voluntary patients who are certified shall be certified wholly by certain sets of medical practitioners. We think that that is not the right way to do it, unless they assume that it is necessary for these medical men to have special information of a medico-psychological character, and that there are enough of them to act as certifying doctors.

13,466. Which clause have you in mind?—Clause 4, sub-section (4). It is carried out in the schedule; there is a schedule of certificates, part II.

13,467. Earl Russell: Sub-section (5) you mean, do not you—not sub-section (4)?—Sub-section (4). It begins: "A recommendation for the purposes of this section."

13,468. Chairman: It is sub-section (5)?—I have not got as late a copy as you have.

13,469. That explains it?—We say, to begin with, the only effect of that will be that there will be the selection, from either social or political causes, of several people in every area who shall be asked to be the certifiers. That it is not a technical qualification. If they were men with a technical qualification we should not say anything, but it does not presume that they will have greater knowledge than other practitioners, and it introduces a social and political means of patronage which is very undesirable. I know how it works. I have seen people selected in that way for appointments; sometimes social influences operate, sometimes political influences, and Party Whips are not free from blame in the way of appointing people.

13,470. This is not an objection to the Board of Control, because I see it may be either by the Board of Control or the local authority?—We object to either as a matter of principle.

13,471. What else do you object to in the Bill?—I do not think there is anything else to which I need refer. To the principal clauses of the Bill, apart from what I have alluded to, we give a whole-hearted approval. We say these are foreign to what we want. We say we want to be able to let these people come in voluntarily, and let them go out—that is what we ask for.

13,472. Might I put one point to you of some general interest. It has been said that the Board of Control suffers rather from being too centralised. Would you be in favour, or would you be against, any project for setting up district Boards of Control, that is to say, for having Commissioners to whom areas would be assigned, and who would operate within those areas instead of their all being in London?—It would be very much more convenient for the executive government if they did not control more. If they had greater powers of control I think it would be worse still, because they would be too exacting; but at the same time, if you grant the necessity for having the functions of the Board of Control well exercised directly, and with some widespread influence, you must have district boards. London is impossible with these few Commissioners. I really ought to say this. I always felt they were in a hopeless position, that they could not do anything if they would; but I do not like the multiplication of men in any central Governmental position in London that will still have its controlling power all over the country and say, "You shall do this," and "You shall not do that," and so on. Now in any distribution of their powers, if it is right for them to have those powers, and right for them to be exercised in the way I have said, then they ought to be in districts.

13,473. But you see you have just said once or twice very emphatically that the Board of Control is in a hopeless position?—Yes.

13,474. It is part of our duty to consider whether it should be left in a hopeless position. That is one of the things we must consider. We are giving your evidence the most serious attention. You tell us that a body which is set up and paid at the present moment is ineffective and in a hopeless position. We must address ourselves to the problem of what it to be done about that body. Have you any constructive suggestions to make about it, as to what we should recommend, because it would not be proper for us to leave it in our report baldly that the Board of Control is in a hopeless position, and not make any proposal to remedy the position. What is your suggestion?—My suggestion is this: Commissioners having purely advisory functions, who would be able to visit every asylum in their districts at more frequent intervals, to confer with the officials and committees of the asylums; and they should go to the meetings of the committees. They shy from that a great deal. I think only once did I ever succeed in getting a Commissioner of the Board of Control to come to a committee meeting. They do not like to come to committees—I do not know why.

13,475. Earl Russell: Is it not partly pressure of time?—Very likely; but, at any rate, we have never been able to meet them in that way, and they do not see the committees. They come and write their report in a book and there is an end of it. That has, of course, no binding power except for what it is worth. I want more influence from those who have information. I do not want to have more control from the central government.

13,476. Chairman: There is just one other matter before we part which I would like a word with you upon, and that is the question of after-care, which is another matter you have studied, I know. Is it your proposal that there should be some organisation of that kind under the local authority?—I think that it is a very difficult question. I think whatever is done will have to be done by money being found from some public source other than exists at the present time, and I think it would be most difficult to carry out. Our experience has been this (we have tried this after-care business to a limited extent), that people when they have been in an asylum want to forget it, and (what is more) they want other people to forget it. They do not like to see visitors coming to them. It is not as easy to go into after-care in these cases as it is in cases of tuberculosis, or any other disease, and I think the after-care of people who have been in an asylum is a very difficult question. I do not know how it is going to be done unless it is with the provision of money which does not exist now. It can only be done, I think, through the quiet private nursing activities of people who can be interested in them locally.

13,477. Well, Sir William, I think apart from matters which Mr. Taggart dealt with, we have covered the special points which you wished to bring before us. I will ask my colleagues if they have any questions to put to you?—May I mention the matter of the question of the superintendent? The County Councils Association thinks that when anyone is appointed as a Commissioner, as an inspector under the Board of Control, or anything like that, service under the Board of Control, if he has been a superintendent of an asylum, should be counted for continuous service for the purposes of pension. At the present time a man loses his pension if he leaves an asylum and goes to the Board of Control; the service is not continuous. We think that has been forgotten, and ought to be rectified as soon as possible. If you pick a smart, good, up-to-date young man from any of the asylums and make him a Commissioner, his service ought to be continuous in his new position, and rank eventually for pension, as though he had remained in the asylum service.

Chairman: We will note it.

13,478. Mr. Micklem: I want to ask you one of two questions about the nurses. You say something about them in your précis. In the asylums in Cheshire and Lancashire do many of the nurses take the Medico-Psychological certificate?—Yes, a good many of them.

13,479. You are interested in getting the nurses better educated than they have been up to now?—Yes. The Mental Hospitals Association appointed me with two others to meet the Medico-Psychological Association to draw up a new scheme.

13,480. Did you have something to do with drawing up the syllabus of the examination?—I had something to do with it; I will not say I was responsible. In this respect, we altered them first. They only had two examinations in the three years, and they suggested it should be spread over three years. We found they were wasting a lot of time between the first and the third examinations, and that it would be far better to have annual examinations and spread the work over three years instead of over two examinations at the first and third years.

13,481. Does it strike you that the syllabus covers a very wide ground, and is extremely difficult?—Yes, it is, but it is not too difficult.

13,482. Has it not the possible effect of preventing a large number of nurses from ever obtaining a certificate?—It does prevent some of them, but a large number get it. We have regular lectures given by the staff, and we have a fairly good attendance, and there is a strong incentive in it, that they get more money if they get certificates.

13,483. Does that apply in all the asylums in Lancashire and Cheshire?—I think so, and throughout the country now. Most of the decent suggestions in this new Departmental Nursing Report are things which we suggested long ago.

13,484. There has been a good deal of difference of opinion expressed by witnesses whom we have had before us with regard to the desirability of female nurses in the male wards. Would you tell us something about that?—We have tried it very fully in Chester; we are superseding the male nurse as much as ever we can. We only keep the male nurses where they are really needed, where we have ruffianly cases which could not be allowed to be near a woman; but whenever they are needing any nursing at all, we see they are nursed very much better by women. They have a finer influence. It is astonishing how well a woman can manage a man, if she has tact about her especially, and if he does not know it. It is when he knows, it is difficult. We find that with female nurses the men are more amenable, and there is always protection in numbers, and there is always plenty of help about. We have never had the slightest incident in our asylum in Chester that made us regret that we extended the sphere of women in these wards. In the sick wards they have absolute control.

13,485. And to a large extent in some of the other wards?—Yes.

13,486. Does that apply in Lancashire?—Mr. Taggart: I quite share that view; where we have tried it it has been a great success.

13,487. Of course you are aware that the Asylum Workers' Union took a view the other way?—I am quite aware of it.

13,488. We had the evidence of one particular nurse who said she had herself had experience during three years, and spoke very strongly against it?—Sir William Hodgson: I wish you would come to see us at Cheshire. Mr. Taggart: Or Lancaster.

13,489. The north country is very advanced in these things?—We think we try to get what is best.

13,490. Miss Madeleine Symons: Do you happen to know how many of the hospitals who are members of your Association have approved that plan?—A good many; I do not know how many. We cannot tell the number.

13,491. Is there a general view in favour of it?—Yes. We have had it up at our meetings, and the general feeling is in favour of the female nurse being multiplied as much as possible. I know that the Asylum Workers' Union does not like it. I know why, but I have nothing to say about it.

13,492. Earl Russell: I just want to get this on the note about expenses. I understand the travelling expenses of attending an asylum can be paid by a county borough, and they can also be paid in the county of London, but not apparently by other county councils?—No county council can pay the expenses of its representatives on these asylum committees.

13,493. The London County Council can, but no other county council can?—No.

13,494. Of course you suggest that it would be reasonable that they should?—Yes.

13,495. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Sir William, you spoke about team work, and you thought it was a bad thing rather, did you not?—No, I did not say that.

13,496. I thought you gave that impression?—No. I think team work is good in its place. I am against any restrictions on research.

13,497. But team work should expand the possibilities of research?—Team work will perhaps avoid the necessity of some individual work, but I think it is common human experience in the history of the past that we have found the great discoverer and pioneer, not by selection out of a team, but by individual prominence of great personal intelligence.

13,498. Has not a great deal of valuable work in neurology been done by team work?—Yes, but I do not think there is any reason why we should prevent personal work on it.

13,499. Oh no, but you would have no objection to team work?—I have no objection to team work—not a bit. I believe in team work, of course, properly carried out and selected, but my objection is that they want to stop the individual from working, and I say I do not want that power to be given to anybody; that we must not restrict the intelligence of the individual, and the opportunity for doing work. I would multiply team work in some cases as much as possible. It is being done.

Chairman: We are much obliged to you for your attendance here to-day, and for the assistance you have given us.

Further evidence (on behalf of the British Medical Association) by Dr. R. LANGDON-DOWN, Dr. J. W. BONF. Dr. C. O. HAWTHORNE, Dr. E. W. G. MASTERMAN, Dr. CHRISTINE MURRELL, Sir JENNER VERRALL

13,500. Chairman: We are much obliged to you for attending again this morning. In the interval we have read over the notes of the evidence which you gave us on the last occasion when you were here, and my impression is confirmed that the greater part of your contribution has already been made to our deliberations; at the same time, one or two topics were either very lightly touched, or not touched at all. Now we should like you this morning to complete your evidence. There is one topic which I should like you to discuss shortly with us, and that is the position of the private licensed house. You deal with it in paragraph 54 of your memorandum, and I observe that "The Association is satisfied that there exists a desire in the community generally that many patients should be able to be treated otherwise than in public institutions, and should the existing veto on the setting up of new licensed houses or the extension of existing licensed houses result in the diminution or inadequacy of this provision it may be necessary to repeal that veto or to provide extended facilities for the treatment of patients in small numbers in private hands under proper safeguards. The opinion of practitioners in general practice in various parts of the country has been sought on this point, and the unanimously expressed opinion is in favour of the continuance of such provision, as meeting the wishes both of patients and of patients' friends." That I take to be the opinion of your Association?—(Dr. Langdon-Down): Yes.

13,501. The whole question of the licensed house seems to raise a question of policy which we must consider, of course. In 1890 the opinion of the legislature seemed to be on the whole rather adverse to that type of institution, because they placed an embargo upon the further extension of them, with the result that from that date onwards there has been, I take it, a diminishing amount of accommodation of that type, although at the same time the population has been increasing. I suppose the objection in principle to this type of institution is the possibility of conflict between interest and duty which may arise in the person in charge?—Yes. I think that is the basis of the a priori, the theoretical, opposition and objection; because, as far as I can understand, the actual reports of the conduct of these houses have not been adverse to them in the main—the reports, I mean, by the official inspectors. I am sorry that unfortunately Dr. Edwards, who has made this particular point his special study, is unable to be with us to-day to represent the matter; but, as we have said, we feel, after all, this is a question not of what doctors want so much as what patients want. So far as doctors go, it is granting a certain number of doctors a monopoly. We put before you what we believe to be the wishes of the patients of our members through the country for their convenience. It is really for the benefit of the patients, and the patients' friends, that we urge that this is a thing that is needed and wanted in the country.

13,502. I can well understand that a certain class of patient and the relatives of that class of patient may well prefer an institution that is not public in any sense of the term, but is more analogous to a nursing home, and is conducted on private lines, where facilities, and shall we say comforts, can be given on a different scale and in a different atmosphere?—Yes, partly that, but taking your original question as to the conflict of interest—

13,503. That is the crux of the matter?—Yes. I think that people who put forward that view overlook very important motives which in all forms of enterprise are very strong: the desire to do a good thing, and do it well, by a private individual; the desire for good reputation. As a matter of fact, the success and prosperity of an enterprise of this kind depend far more on a good reputation and good results than on cheeseparing management, I think.

13,504. There are obviously a number of elements in the problem; one quite appreciates that the proprietor, and, if he be a separate person, the superintendent of such an institution, may best prosper if he conducts his place well, and has a good record; but there does seem to be some anxiety in the public mind on the question of the profits made by the owners of such establishments out of this line of business. It is suggested (I am putting it in its broadest form) that persons in that unhappy state should not be exploited for the purpose of making large financial gains; and there is the usual suspicion that large profits are made and are not disclosed, and that this line of business is very profitable, with the consequent temptations?—I am afraid I am not in a position to give precise evidence in regard to the profits that may be made; but as to exploiting, that would involve the suggestion that people are retained when they should not be retained for one thing, or that efforts are not made for their benefit which should be made. Dr. Edwards, I remember, gave us some figures. Unfortunately, as I say, relying on his being present, I have not got the actual figures before me, but he gave figures to show the recovery rates of private asylums, which compare quite favourably with the recovery rates in public institutions, and I think I am right in saying that he told us that of his fresh admissions only 19 per cent. remain and become chronic residents, in his own experience—I think that was the figure. I must not lay too much stress upon it, but Dr. Edwards will be available shortly no doubt; but it was a very striking figure. Then, as I understand it, these suggestions are in the main hypothetical, a priori, based upon general principles, and not on concrete facts. For instance, I notice that Dr. Lomax in his evidence made this suggestion, that private asylums were undesirable; but, as far as I gather, he did not produce concrete evidence in support of that statement. It was hypothetical, theoretical, and, as a matter of fact, in so far as he had objections to make in regard to treatment, and so on, they did not apply to occurrences in private asylums but in public asylums.

13,505. But to do Dr. Lomax justice, he said frankly he had not much knowledge of that type of institution; that his experience had been entirely in public asylums, and he entered a caveat against us laying too much stress upon his evidence with regard to private asylums?—Yes; I only saw the brief report in the Press.

13,506. Let me put this to you, because it is a very interesting topic. In the case of patients who are rate-aided and in public institutions there is really comparatively little motive for the retention of any patients at all beyond the time when they ought to be under care. The only suggestion put before us hitherto has been that sometimes a patient becomes so useful in the institution as a worker that the discharge of that patient may be delayed, because of his very utility, because practically, one may say, of his very sanity. But when you come to deal with the licensed house, I think it is with regard to that type of institution that possibly more public anxiety is aroused; because the inmates there are generally persons of some means, and in their case there may be a motive on the part of relatives interested in their estate to have them retained longer, and there may also be a motive in the owner of the establishment to continue their profitable occupation of his premises. There are two sides to it you see, and the danger of the wrongful detention of a patient seems possibly to be greater in the case of a licensed house, because of those two factors?—Yes, I must recognise that.

13,507. The relatives' interest is possibly adverse to that of the patient, and so also the pecuniary interest of the conductor of the establishment. These two factors are present, and present only in this type of institution, in contrast with the public or rate-aided institution, where the natural desire is to get rid of patients as quickly as possible. Now it is these two aspects of the case that give the public a little anxiety, I think; and you must take along with it, of course, this, that with the diminished accommodation, and the increased population of the country, probably very few of the licensed houses have to look far for their patients now; it is not a case of their having to try and get patients, it is rather a question of their trying to accommodate the people who want to get in. I take it that is the general experience of the profession now?—Surely then there is very little temptation to run any risk.

13,508. One wants to assemble the various aspects of the question?—That points to the fact that at all events the section of the public that uses these facilities has confidence.

13,509. Apart from the question of ill-treatment in such institutions, which is probably less likely than in rate-aided institutions, because the people have more means and better attention can be obtained for them, it is the element of possible wrongful detention that has caused some anxiety. I think behind the whole thing there is possibly this idea, too, that it is not desirable in the public interest that private profit should be made out of the afflictions of that section of the community. That is a large question, of course?—Yes, it is. My answer to your first question, I think, puts the other side of that.

13,510. Yes. Of course, if the public want this type of institution, and if this type of institution can be properly safeguarded against abuse, then it meets a want?—Quite; we are quite content with that statement.

13,511. We have had some suggestions that the accounts of such institutions should be made public in order that the profits obtained should be disclosed; have you any view about that?—We have not discussed it in the Committee at all.

13,512. Then it would not be fair to ask you to deal with that, but from the general point of view of policy, I take it that the professional feeling is that this class of institution meets a felt want and ought not to be discontinued?—That is our point.

13,513. And you would like us rather to direct our attention to the safeguarding of the conduct of these institutions on the hypothesis that they ought to be continued?—Yes. It seems to me that the present situation is quite illogical; either the things are really an abuse and ought to be suppressed, or they should not be limited in number arbitrarily on mere grounds of suspicion.

13,514. I see the logic of that certainly. If the thing is wrong, it should not exist at all, even in a limited quantity?—Quite so.

13,515. If, on the other hand, it is right to have such institutions, the supply should meet the demand?—Yes.

13,516. And then would come the question whether you can supply such institutions consistently with the public interest and with their proper conduct?—Yes, and we believe that the records are favourable to them. (Sir Jenner Verrall): It seems to me that those who oppose these private asylums are rather proving too much. We believe there is a demand from the public for these places. Those who oppose them can only oppose them because they thought that demand comes from interested people who were going to get rid of their relatives. Surely the onus of proof lies upon them. If this is at all a common complaint, this abuse of these institutions, it should be possible to get evidence in favour of that. It seems to me the proof is too large, it carries you too far.

13,517. I do not think we shall be entirely without evidence that abuses have occurred in licensed houses as well as in public institutions.—No doubt.

13,518. And that, of course, affects the general question of stiffening up the safeguards; but I appreciate the point, that if the public at large, which is composed both of potential patients and of their relatives, wish this kind of institution, there should be no general ground why that wish should not be met, provided it can be met consistently with the proper conduct of the institutions.—Except for a sentimental objection, and the fact that there is a feeling that there is a possibility of abuse in making money out of this disease, there is a priori no particular reason why money should not be made from them, as from any other ailment in a nursing home.

13,519. At present one knows that the nursing home is an institution that has come to stay in this country. To a very large extent now people who are ill and have to be operated upon go into a nursing home, because of the greater facilities and the better treatment they get there. The licensed house, I should have thought, in principle, is just a nursing home for mental cases, but one has always got to remember that in a nursing home one remains a free agent—more or less a free agent—I am not going to say absolutely a free agent, but at any rate the atmosphere is different, because there is not just that legal ingredient. Throughout the whole of our study of this matter we have always come across this question of the interference with the liberty of the subject; and that aspect with its attendant risks is present in connection with the licensed house perhaps in a more pronounced degree than it is in other institutions, because of the pecuniary motives that exist; but your considered policy, I take it, is that if safeguards are adequately provided and possibly fresh safeguards, the type of institution is one that should be encouraged rather than discouraged.—(Dr. Langdon-Down). Certainly.

13,520. Of course, we must take this along with the other suggestions in your memorandum for institutions of a rather different type, for cases of mental disorder which have not reached certification or certifiability. What I was thinking of was this, that you would like to encourage persons to go to licensed houses as voluntary boarders, as they do at present in large numbers?—Yes.

13,521. Of course if the voluntary patient of the wealthier class wishes to go into an institution he will naturally select a licensed house in the ordinary case under the present régime?—Yes.

13,522. And you want to encourage it?—Yes.

13,523. With the existing accommodation, it would be very difficult to cater for any large number of voluntary patients of that type?—We quite realise that there might be an inadequacy of provision.

13,524. Earl Russell: There is no probability of this demand being met by anything like disinterested management for quasi-charitable purposes; it would not meet the demand?—I did not think so. The difficulty of raising funds for semi-charitable purposes to-day is much greater than it used to be. I think it is only right I should mention that the attitude of the legislature in 1890 was modified in 1913 when the Mental Deficiency Act was passed, in that it again recognised the wisdom of recognising and allowing for private and semi-charitable institutions. Indeed, a great deal of the work of the Mental Deficiency Act has been done by semi-charitable homes.

13,525. Chairman: That is what is called the approved house?—No; the approved house may be either a privately run home, or a semi-charitable home. The definition does not depend upon the type of management, you understand; but there are institutions under the Mental Deficiency Act which are run by committees originally supported by charitable donors, and also there are private certified houses comparable to the licensed house of the Lunacy Acts.

13,526. Earl Russell: I suppose it would hardly be possible in the case of a private licensed house run by one doctor himself to have anything at all resembling a visiting committee; it either could not function at all or it would interfere with his management?—Yes, I think so.

13,527. Sir Humphry Rolleston: With regard to your suggestion, to provide extended facilities for treatment, you limit those extended facilities in your précis really to small numbers of patients in private hands. Is it not desirable that Section 207 of the Act should be in some way altered, so that the existing institutions which have already got the facilities should be allowed to take a larger number?—Yes, the repeal of the veto should do that, and I think really we ought to substitute the word “and” for the word “or”.

13,528. Earl Russell: Which paragraph are you on?—This is paragraph 54. I think that would meet your point Sir Humphry.

13,529. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Do you think there would be any advantage in extending the existing institutions rather than setting up new ones?—Yes, I do; but we should not like it to be said that we are in any way trying to fortify this monopoly. We are not out to benefit specially the existing holders of licences.

13,530. Has that veto on the increase in number of licensed houses been relaxed in any instance?—No, I think not.

Chairman: I think the quantity is steadily diminishing; the numbers are always limited.

Sir Humphry Rolleston: They are limited by the Act. I did not know whether they had been in any way relaxed.

Earl Russell: I do not think the Board of Control have power to, have they?

13,531. Chairman: I think not. (To the Witness): Then do you think that institutions on the lines of what are called registered hospitals in the Act, that is to say, institutions wholly or partially philanthropic in character, would not meet the case? Is it because of the insufficiency of supply?—I do not think they would meet it.

13,532. You know in Bethlem, which is the typical hospital, voluntary patients are received, and that has great advantages, because the excess payments of the voluntary private patients go to the support of the institution, and there is a sort of mutual benefit derived from that. It is rather an attractive idea. It is also carried into the Mental Deficiency Act, as you know. Institutions are provided for, which are partially or wholly on philanthropic lines; but, following your analogy, I observe that in the Mental Deficiency Act, while such institutions for defectives are contemplated, supported wholly or partly by voluntary contributions, there is also a class of premises where defectives are received for private profit?—Yes.

13,533. I take your point. It is rather odd that in 1913 it should have been recognised that premises may be approved for the reception of defectives, although for private profit?—Yes.

13,534. Then it goes on to impose rigorous conditions. The Board have to approve the premises or house, and they may grant their approval subject to such conditions as to inspection, the making of reports, and otherwise as they may think fit. Then of course the approval may be withdrawn if there is dissatisfaction on the part of the Board. Do you think that that indicates on the part of Parliament some relaxation of the prejudice against the home run for private profit?—I should think that they were simply contemplating the needs of the particular case, and they recognised that to satisfy the needs it was necessary.

13,535. It is difficult to see why, if a private establishment is allowed for defectives, although run for private profit, without objection, there should be an objection to one for insane persons, unless it be this, that in the case of defectives there is not so much risk of unlawful detention, because the defective type of person of course is different?—Yes, that is so.

13,536. Earl Russell: As against that, defectives are not as likely to be able to complain, are they?—That is so.

13,537. Chairman: However, the practical upshot of your evidence is that this class of institution is required?—It is.

13,538. In your view it ought, indeed, to be encouraged, provided that there are adequate safeguards?—Yes.

13,539. Do you think that the demand for such institutions justifies their retention or encouragement, notwithstanding the special risks attendant upon them?—I think so. I think the public may be divided from this point of view into the public that has not got relatives, who require care and detention, and the public that has. The public that has not takes impersonal views, a priori views, but the public that is interested in individual patients asks for and wants these places. I am sure it is so among mental defectives, from my own knowledge; I believe it is so also in regard to the insane.

13,540. Of course, it has been chiefly with regard to licensed houses that cases of abuse have been made public. I mean the class of case that comes up from time to time of complaint of ill-treatment or detention is generally one relating to a licensed house, is it not?—Yes; of course, financial opportunities encourage that, I suppose.

13,541. That may be because the persons who have been detained there have more means to assert themselves in the Law Courts than occupants of public asylums?—Yes, and I suppose they think there is more to be got.

13,542. That is another thing. You mean that a medical proprietor is a better person to shoot at in the Law Courts than a public authority?—Yes, and I do not think you can claim there is absolute immunity in the case of the public institutions.

13,543. No; far from it. In your previous evidence you indicated that the opinion of the profession was that the safeguards, by which I mean the formal safeguards in the code, were adequate; but have you any suggestions to make, as the counterpart of your proposal to remove the veto on the number of licensed houses, for the stricter supervision of them? It would be difficult for us to recommend the reversal of a policy unless we accompanied it with some additional safeguards.—We have not considered that, but the safeguards are very great, the very frequent visitation; for instance, the houses near London, I believe, are visited six times a year by the Board of Control.

Earl Russell: I think it is eight.

13,544. Chairman: Of course they are under the direct supervision of the Board of Control, unlike the provincial houses?—Yes.

13,545. I think one must not forget to link up this proposal of yours with your general proposal for the provisional order, because that again is related to this?—Yes; it is.

13,546. The provisional detention might eliminate a number of the cases which reached the licensed houses, and in that way diminish their transitory population to some extent?—Yes.

13,547. Earl Russell: Just to consider what precautions are possible, if you have a patient in a licensed house, although he is a rich man, he is not in command of money while he is there?—Yes. I might have pointed out that is an additional safeguard also in regard to the wealthy person.

13,548. Is it?—Because in addition to being under the safeguard of the Lunacy Act, if his property is administered by the Court, the Court supervises the application of his property, and there is appointed a committee of his estate and a committee of his person.

13,549. What was passing through my mind was this: supposing he wanted to see his solicitor, or a solicitor, and even supposing that the authorities raised no objection, the solicitor might rather wonder who was going to pay him, as the patient would not have command of money himself. I am assuming the man is there, and he says, "I have a complaint to make, and I will see my solicitor." I am assuming that the medical superintendent puts no obstacle in the way. Before the solicitor takes any steps, he would like to know where the money is coming from?—As a matter of fact the Lord Chancellor's Visitor is the person for the purpose in question.

13,550. He may not have the same confidence in him as the man he instructed himself?—That is the safeguard to meet that particular point.

13,551. I can see it would be a safeguard if a patient could send for his own solicitor and see him, but I do see that the solicitor might be unwilling to act if he did not see where the money was coming from?—I cannot conceive that a charge of that kind would be refused by the committee of the estate or objected to by the Master in Lunacy—a solicitor's charge, I mean. You are presuming again that there is a sort of conspiracy?

13,552. Of course I am, and I am presuming the action being taken is hostile to the committee?—Yes. The safeguards are in the appointment of the committee, which you know is done carefully in a private Court.

13,553. But the lunatic is not effectively represented?—Such representation as is possible is provided for.

13,554. Chairman: It is true, is it not, that where a person of means has his estate administered in Chancery by a receiver or committee, the Chancery Visitor has a special duty?—Yes, he visits the patient personally.

13,555. He visits the patient for the purpose, among others, of seeing that the patient is getting the benefit of the expenditure. He is charged with that duty to see that the money which he administers is applied for the benefit of the patient. He is at least concerned to see that he is getting value for his money?—Yes.

13,556. It is a safeguard in this sense, that the patient is brought into contact there, not with a person who has mere general supervision, as the Commissioners from the Board of Control have, but with a person who is expressly charged with the individual case of that patient, and who therefore when he goes there goes to see his man and not the institution as a whole?—Exactly.

Earl Russell: On the other hand, you have the chance of one official being ready to be satisfied with the assurances of another official, if any complaint is made.

Chairman: Not if they belong to different departments.

13,557. Earl Russell: True?—And the individuals vary from time to time. The visitors that are sent up by the Lord Chancellor vary from year to year.

Mrs. Mathew: Mr. Chairman, are all patients in licensed houses presumed to be under the care of the Lord Chancellor?

Chairman: No. If they have any means, their means may be either in the hands of a committee, or they may be in the hands of a receiver, but of course there are some persons who have no means. Take a daughter in a home, who may come from quite a wealthy home; she may have no means of her own, and therefore she does not require her estate to be put in charge. That case may arise and does arise, no doubt. I do not know whether she would be visited in that case. I rather think not.

Earl Russell: Not by the Chancery visitor, I think.

Chairman: I rather think not.

Sir Humphry Rolleston: The Lord Chancellor does not control any lunatics except those so found by inquisition?

13,558. Chairman: Except that when a receiver is appointed now, the Chancery visitors have a jurisdiction. It is at least a topic we might consider, as to whether we could preserve or increase the contact between the patient in the licensed house and the independent authority outside, which of course is always a safeguard?—Yes. We are not at all opposed to increasing the safeguards if there is a lacuna anywhere.

13,559. Of course there is just this trouble, that we may run a risk of imposing so many safeguards that the time of the medical superintendent would be occupied entirely in filling up forms, and so on, instead of attending to his medical duties?—Yes.

13,560. That brings me to one of the other things upon which possibly you might give us the view of the Association, because it is a large professional question. We have had a considerable body of evidence to this effect: that the association of the medical superintendent's work as a doctor with the administrative work of an asylum is in some cases at least calculated to divert him from his proper medical work, and to make him much more a hotel manager, putting it in the baldest form, than a doctor concerned with the treatment and cure of his patients. Has the Association any view upon that subject, as to the desirability of a dissociation of those two functions?—I do not know that we have discussed that. I might perhaps be permitted to make some observations about it.

13,561. If you put it personally, it will not bind the Association. Having you here, we should like your view upon that. Can you give us an unbiassed opinion?—I must say that I am associated with a private institution under the Mental Deficiency Act.

13,562. In what capacity?—As proprietor.

13,563. All the better; we will have the knowledge from the inside?—Yes, but I must not allow you to go away with a false impression on that point. My general view is that it is the whole life of the patient that is concerned in the treatment, and I can see there are difficulties in dividing the management of an institution under different heads. It seems to me that the supreme authority ought to be the medical superintendent, and he should be able to impose his will in every department of the life of the place.

13,564. Take the analogy for the moment of a nursing home. I suppose everybody nowadays has been in a nursing home at some time or other. A doctor conducts the home; very often the doctor himself runs it; he attends there and he sees the patients, but he certainly does not concern himself with the administration of the place in detail, beyond seeing that everything is going all right; he gets a good matron in, generally, and trusts her with the administration of the place. Of course, if complaints reached him that the patients were not getting proper diet, he would give a direction that that was to be put right, but the surgeon or physician who has a nursing home is not cumbered with much serving, like Martha, at all; he is free to attend to his patients from the medical aspect.

Sir Humphry Rolleston: I rather doubt whether there is the proprietary aspect you suggest.

13,565. Chairman: I may be importing barbarous notions from the North. I know of a certain number of eminent medical men in the North who have homes. However, the analogy would remain. The question is whether it is done by himself or done by some ex-nurse who has devoted herself to running a nursing home. The surgeon or physician does not concern himself with the régime of the place, beyond seeing that it is a comfortable place, and that proper food is given to the patients, and so on. He is not cumbered with the detailed work?—No in that instance he would not be; but then of course it makes a great difference whether you have a resident medical superintendent or a medical man living outside. I do not think you can very well compare the two positions.

13,566. The former is supervising the whole life of the place; and one has to remember this, too, that the day-to-day conduct of that institution is itself intimately associated with the treatment of the patients?—Exactly; that is my point.

13,567. Earl Russell: We had very strong evidence from Sir William Hodgson yesterday that the medical superintendent should do no administrative duties whatever.—Of course, if the place is big enough he should have departmental chiefs under him, but in my opinion he should be supreme.

13,568. Chairman: We had a case given us. We were told yesterday of a medical superintendent who became so attracted by the farm work that he developed into a most admirable farmer, but ceased to be an admirable doctor. Of course that is not right?—No. Presumably the medical work was deputed by him to capable subordinates.

13,569. Just there you touch the heart of it. Has he any right, in view of the very responsible functions that are put upon him, because he is the authority to discharge the patient, to have his attention so diverted from these matters to administrative matters, that he finds it necessary to depute the care of his patients to his subordinates, and only to receive reports from them?—No, I do not regard that as the ideal arrangement.

13,570. We have been told it is a matter of individual temperament. Some people are far more interested in the medical side of it and dislike the business affairs. Some minds, on the other hand, are much attracted by business, and go off on that side rather than on the other side. Some are able to delegate, and some cannot delegate. We know the different types of men?—Yes. I want to enter a caveat against co-ordinate authorities in the asylum.

13,571. Earl Russell: You do not want another independent head, as it were?—No.

13,572. Chairman: I think that would be awkward because you might have friction. It seems to be rather a matter of guiding medical superintendents in their duties by, say, statutory rules or regulations, and in that way directing their conduct of the institutions?—Yes.

13,573. That might be the way out?—Yes.

13,574. I mean that would give a certain guidance to persons who were inclined to diverge from their medical duties, and also to the medical man who is inclined to neglect the other side, if one were to suggest the laying down of administrative rules defining provinces?—Yes.

13,575. I am sure you will be in favour of this: that the medical superintendent should, so far as possible, be relieved of unimportant routine matters of administration?—Yes, I quite agree.

13,576. And again you will agree with me that the main thing is that he should have his mind concentrated upon the study of his patients?—The general welfare of his patients.

13,577. Earl Russell: To some extent you could do that by making the steward, or whatever you call your business person, the man who would be responsible for the accuracy of the accounts, and not the medical superintendent?—Yes.

13,578. Chairman: That is the thing, to get responsibility associated with duties, because at present if he has the responsibility he must, to some extent, investigate detail, but if he is relieved of detail he would say, "That is not my affair," if the visiting committee calls him in question?—Quite.

13,579. One does feel that, with the very responsible duties placed upon the medical superintendent, it is eminently desirable that his mind should be concentrated on his work with regard to his patients, and also upon the study of his subject; because the subject is a growing one, and I should imagine, in your profession, as in the practice of all professional men, the mere keeping up to date with the progress of knowledge, the reading of home and foreign and technical periodicals, the reading of new books that come out, and keeping abreast with the experimental work, must involve a great deal of study?—A great deal.

13,580. A man who is cumbered with all kinds of administrative detail cannot do that properly?—No.

13,581. May I take it then that you would be in favour of his being relieved, as far as it can be done consistently with the general welfare of the institution, of the detail of administration?—Yes.

13,582. You have been telling us personally of what you feel about it. I may say it commends itself very much to us. I wonder if your colleagues have any views on the same lines?—Perhaps Dr. Masterman has. (Dr. Masterman): I am a medical superintendent of a very large Poor Law hospital of 890 beds, and of course all the financial side is entirely out of my hands. All that side of it passes through the steward, who is nominally under me, but I have nothing to do with that side at all, and it would be quite impossible in my work to have to take that responsibility and at the same time attend to the medical needs of the patients.

13,583. Connected with your institutions, have you a farm or anything of that sort?—No.

13,584. That is a difficulty, of course?—Yes, and I do feel that I quite agree it is impossible for the medical superintendent not to have responsibility for both sides, the administrative side and the professional side, and it is quite as important that he should keep in touch with the professional side as with the administrative side.

13,585. More so, if I may say so?—Yes. In my work I personally discharge every patient, and I have to be responsible ultimately for all of them.

13,586. In your experience do you find that, notwithstanding the large number of cases under your charge, you have reasonable time for keeping abreast with the progress of your science?—Yes. Of course in my own particular case I am specially concerned with the surgical side, and I specialise in that. I think in the case of work like mine the medical superintendent must always specialise on a particular department, while keeping a general control over everything.

13,587. Of course your patients are not exclusively mental patients?—They are not mental patients. I had some hesitation about speaking at all, but I thought it might give some indication as to how it is possible to take the business side entirely out of the hands of the medical superintendent.

13,588. The problem has chiefly arisen, as it has been brought before us, in the case of these very large asylums which are a community of themselves. The head of that place is the mayor of the community, and he has to look after the whole administration of the place, which I should have thought would have been very distracting to him when he wanted to study the interesting cases under his charge and keep himself abreast with his profession?—There again, all the engineering and building side is deputed to a special official. I have no responsibility for that; it would be impossible for me to do that.

13,589. Earl Russell: But some superintendents do not depute it; they spend a great deal of their time over it?—Exactly. I am only saying that something on the lines of our work would be better.

13,590. Chairman: Suppose you are going to get a new operating theatre; surely you would be entitled to see the plans and say: "That is a bad aspect for that room; the light is not good," or the arrangement would be unsatisfactory; because that is where you are going to work?—Of course, I should have a voice in anything done in the building, but I should not be responsible for the detail. My advice would be sought, but nothing would be done without my putting forward my views.

13,591. Earl Russell: You mean you would not measure up the room, and so on?—Exactly.

13,592. Mr. Snell: Would you wish to have a veto on such a thing as the building of a verandah for open-air treatment, because that is really part of the doctor's work?—It depends upon what you mean by "veto."

13,593. Do you want to be consulted?—Certainly, in anything that could have a bearing on the patients' treatment, and that really covers everything connected with the structure of the place, too.

13,594. Chairman: I think we may leave that topic. Now one other matter which we did not discuss last time is the question of after-care, to which you allude in paragraph 48 of your memorandum on page 9. "It is urged that the principle of permitting after-care homes and convalescent homes at the seaside or elsewhere in connection with county and county borough mental hospitals should be recognised." That is only one chapter of the after-care problem but an important one.—(Dr. Langdon-Down): Yes.

13,595. Now on the question of after-care two views have been put before us; one is that it would be desirable to have associations, probably of a voluntary character, who would assist the discharged patient in getting back into ordinary life, assist him in finding occupation and generally smooth the transition from the stage of the patient to the stage of the citizen once more. The other view that has been put before us is that many patients having left the institution desire to close that episode in their lives for ever and would resent people, however well intentioned, busying themselves about their affairs and treating them as if they were still persons requiring supervision. What do you think of the balancing of those two classes of consideration from the patient's point of view?—If I might perhaps approach it indirectly, the sort of idea that was put before us in our discussions was that if there were more intimate touch on the medical side between the asylum period and the after period—and I am ready to admit in some cases it is already done,—but if it were more habitual that the asylum people should enter into the relation with the doctor of the patient at home, tell him fully about what had happened so that the advice on these matters should be more widely given by the private doctor afterwards, you would tend to solve these questions, because each individual case must be considered on its own merits. I think that is the way I should put it.

13,596. Of course in ordinary private practice what happens is this, that after you emerge from the nursing home and once more come into the hands of your own private doctor, he generally does get indications from the consultant in whose hands you have been as to what should be done, diet and care and manner of life that should be lived for a time and so on, and the thing works very well. But we are dealing with a section of the population whose life is not quite so highly organised as that; it is the poorer class population. When a patient leaves the institution, he has technically recovered but the moment of recovery is not a mathematical moment. He has ceased to be certifiable we must assume, but he is still a person who has had an experience in his life and who may have a certain shyness and difficulty in returning to normal existence, and encouragement and help might be of great value to some people?—Yes.

13,597. Earl Russell: In a country area you could only communicate with his panel doctor by letter?—Yes.

13,598. And that would not perhaps give him all the details you wish?—No, but there should be regular communication. That is an important beginning.

13,599. Chairman: I suppose we may take it that the great majority of patients discharged are patients who are on some panel?—I imagine so; I cannot speak with authority. Might I ask Dr. Murrell? (Dr. Murrell): I think, Sir, we have rather felt that the patient suffered from the lack of continuity, because when a patient goes into one of these institutions the doctor is, as a rule, although not always, asked to send in a report so that the medical superintendent of the institution does get a report of his patient, not in every case, but in a great many; whereas at present it is not the custom when he discharges that patient for him to communicate with the private doctor in these panel and other cases. One objection that was raised was that we might find it somewhat difficult to find out even who the doctor had been, so great had been the lack of continuity; and the proposal made by us was that as some member of the patient's family is usually mentioned in the certificate, the name of the private doctor could be obtained through that channel as a rule; but it is very important, because the patient going out is under a doctor who does not know anything of his illness at all.

13,600. Of course the history of the case is so important?—Yes, and he does not get it.

13,601. Earl Russell: Of course this is only the medical aspect of after-care, but there is also the rather important financial aspect.—(Dr. Langdon-Down): We understand that so far as it goes, the After-care Association is doing excellent work.

Chairman: It is a voluntary association, of course, and therefore has to do what it can with such funds as are at its disposal. It was rather suggested to us that some public money might be given for that purpose.

13,602. Earl Russell: Asylums have no means of making provision except by a rather colourable month's trial.—I might say that we rather contemplated that if there were new intermediate types of institutions, it should be step by step in and step by step out.

13,603. Chairman: That is a very valuable suggestion. I must say this idea has impressed us very much indeed, that the transition from being an inmate of an institution to the resumption of ordinary life must be an exceedingly difficult period in the individual's history, as important in the individual's history as anything else in his treatment; because a person taken from shelter and care and re-exposed once more to the stress of life may, and I suppose in experience often does, break down just for the want of some care, advice and assistance at that stage. I can imagine the panic that must overtake some minds in that state. At present no provision at all is made for that except by voluntary agency?—Practically not; and you see in that paragraph to which you drew our attention at the beginning of this discussion, we suggest that there should be now some public provision possible at all events.

13,604. Earl Russell: With regard to the very question of the month's trial, we are now urged that the patient should be discharged forthwith the moment he has recovered. Very often you are giving him his month's trial when legally you might discharge him. He has to be nominally still under certificate in order to get the money; you are presented with that difficult alternative?—Yes.

13,605. Chairman: Dr. Murrell's suggestion of keeping in touch with the doctor is only a phase of it, because no doubt it is desirable that the doctor who participated in the admission stage should also be associated with the discharge stage as an adviser and help; but that is only a phase of it; the philanthropy would require to extend a good deal further than that, because the best intentioned panel doctor in the world could only give some advice, but could not pursue the thing much further?—No, that is true; but it would help if we can get the idea that insanity is not too separate an episode in the patient's medical life, that it is part of his medical history and should be taken account of.

13,606. You see a certain conflict between the two ideas; you have on the one side the clinical idea, the doctor who is not the least interested in the law, but in his patient, and is quite unable to say at one moment he is certifiable and the next moment he is not. Then you have the public point of view which always expects the scientific man to be much more precise than he can possibly be, and would have the period of certifiability delimited fore and aft by precise boundaries, outside of which anything done to the patient in the way of detention is illegal. The doctor's retort is that you cannot deal with our business quite like that. There is an intermediate zone that has got to be provided for. It seems to me we are touching here the provision for that zone which intervenes between the ailment and complete recovery, and it is the patient's protection in that zone for which no provision is made at the moment in law.

13,607. Mr. Micklem: When a patient of some panel doctor goes into a hospital, does he not automatically go off the panel, and would he have a doctor when he came out?—(Dr. Bone): He does not go off the panel until the usual period.

13,608. That would be at the end of the half-year?—As a matter of fact it runs into nearly two years; certainly more than one year. I believe the longest period is a year and nine months in any circumstances. When he returns he would, if he started work, be immediately placed on the panel.

13,609. Chairman: But not necessarily the same panel doctor?—That would depend upon the patient's choice.

Dr. E. W. G. MASTERMAN, Dr. CHRISTINE MURRELL, and Sir JENNER VERRALL.

13,610. Mr. Micklem: Is it a fact that during the period of his detention in the asylum payment would still be made to his old panel doctor?—He would remain on the doctor's panel until his arrears had accumulated to such an extent that he was taken off the panel. He would cease to be an employed person, but would still remain on the doctor's panel.

13,611. Chairman: You have a vested right?—The doctors do not get individual payment from the patient.

13,612. Mr. Micklem: They are paid according to the number of patients that appear on their panel?—Yes.

13,613. Chairman: In the memorandum, Dr Langdon-Down, you really only deal with one aspect of this matter, and that is these after-care homes and convalescent homes at the seaside or elsewhere. Of course, if such were provided in association with mental hospitals they would afford an excellent means of bridging the transition?—(Dr. Langdon-Down): Yes.

13,614. Would you contemplate that in these after-care homes the patients would be patients who had been discharged—I mean, would you use them as places where the probationary period still under certification would be spent, or do you contemplate they should be places where cases should go after discharge?—I should include that certainly.

13,615. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Do you think the Association would be inclined to support the idea that there should be some kind of social service connected with mental hospitals, a kind of outdoor visiting service, partly by nurses, but partly by visitors?—A sort of friendly flow of visitors.

13,616. Yes, but connected with, and almost part of the staff of the hospital, to follow the cases up; so that if they saw a person beginning to fail they would be able to give a hint to the doctor or send the case off to some clinic?—I certainly see no objection to that. The Association has not specifically considered it.

13,617. It would be an extension of the after-care?—I think it would.

Earl Russell: Of course it would be possible to give legal authority to asylum committees or boards of guardians to continue the payment, where the doctor recommended it, for a month or two months after discharge from certificate.

13,618. Chairman: Yes; it is the abruptness of the transition that strikes one as being a danger?—Of course it would have to be arranged subject to the approval of the patient, if the patient were in a condition to give an approval.

13,619. We are assuming now a recovered patient; he is rational again, but although rational he is debilitated and he might welcome or he might resent this interference?—Yes, assistance during convalescence; we think it should exist for many cases.

13,620. Earl Russell: If people want to avail themselves of it, it seems rather an important branch of public service?—Yes, I think so.

13,621. And also there should be some system whereby their welfare generally, their reinstatement to social life is assisted?—Yes. (Dr. Murrell): Would you very kindly safeguard the consent of the patient in that case, Sir?

13,622. Chairman: It would need to be, because many patients would resent exceedingly busy-bodies interfering with them, while others, of course, would welcome very much the assistance?—Yes, as long as they had the right to say they did not want a visitor, if they did not.

13,623. Just as at present the district visitor may have the door slammed in his face, so in this case?—It is quite possible they would not even want to slam the door in their faces; they might want them never to have called.

13,624. Earl Russell: They might not want the association of the asylum brought home?—Yes.

13,625. Chairman: That could be safeguarded possibly in this way, that when the patient is about to be discharged the visiting committee could say, "Do you feel quite fit for taking your place in the world again, or would you like to be put in touch with the After Care Association?" If the patient said, "I welcome that assistance, I have no proper home to go to, and if I could get some help of that sort it would be very good," he would be put in touch with the Association. On the other hand, if a patient said, "I want to shake the dust of this place off my feet, and I want not to think about this at all," such a more robust patient would be just left alone?—Quite. Of course, the medical value would be enormous as long as that aspect were safeguarded.

13,626. Now, there is only one other topic upon which I would like to ask you a question or two. It arises partly on what we heard yesterday. In connection with the treatment of uncertified patients, which is so important an aspect of the problem, we were discussing yesterday the possibility of assimilating the treatment of mental disease in its early stages to the present system of treatment of tuberculosis or venereal diseases by clinics. At present, I think these particular ailments are dealt with in special premises, and, in the case of tuberculosis, it is not merely out-patients but also in-patients who are dealt with?—(Dr. Langdon-Down): I believe so.

13,627. An establishment really dealing with that particular malady, which, of course, as we know, is grant aided?—Yes.

13,628. Do you think that similar clinics might be established for mental disorder—the same type of institution—a mental clinic?—Yes; we think that among the provisions which would be desirable that is one.

13,629. The idea being this, that the patients who were to be under observation for a time might be housed there, and that the place might operate as a clearing house?—Yes.

13,630. The ultimate destination of the patient being the asylum or freedom, as the case might be; but that some institution of that sort, where patients could be received initially, their cases considered and their destination settled, would be of value; and equally that it would be a place where out-patients could come for consultation?—Yes.

13,631. One is trying to think out what kind of institution would best meet your proposals. The theory is quite simple, but how to work it out is difficult. Is the clinic your ideal?—I think that where there are teaching hospitals, or in university cities, it is very desirable that all this class of work should be closely linked with the teaching hospital or the university, as the case may be. Partly, it would afford much better opportunity for research; it would afford opportunities for educational work for the young practitioner, and it would tend to avoid the dissociation of psychiatry from medicine in general. The objection to the purely psychiatric clinic is the severance of psychiatry from ordinary medicine, which is bound to be in the asylum, but should not be accentuated further than is necessary. At the same time, I recognise that there are places where there is no such thing as a teaching hospital and no university in the town where, for many purposes, a clearing house, a clinic, an out-patient clinic with in-patient accommodation, if possible, would be a great advantage. For one thing, it would be a great convenience to be able to send from the Courts dubious cases, young people who are charged with offences, to have their mental condition sized up by expert people.

13,632. The whole conception is most attractive, but I was thinking of the practical working of it out. Is this institution to deal with these incipient cases both as out-patients and as in-patients? It must, I think, take one of three possible forms. It must be a department of the existing asylum, or it must be a branch of the general hospital, which is the case you have been putting just now, or it must be a separate institution such as has been set up to deal with tuberculosis or venereal disease. Now I can imagine that the second of those proposals is, medically perhaps, the most attractive, but it would probably encounter much opposition from those who conduct these general hospitals, because it is a more difficult type of case, and the introduction of that class of case might be resented. It has been tried, of course, in some institutions, and there has been considerable trouble about it?—Yes; and yet I think the trend of medical opinion is towards having psychiatric departments now associated with, or in control of, or actually in the building of the general hospital.

13,633. That is not in supersession of the asylum properly so-called, because you would not contemplate that cases would be kept there indefinitely?—No.

13,634. Mr. Micklem: Nor would you contemplate that such cases should go there under the temporary orders that you suggest?—One at once enters upon very difficult questions then. Sir Jenner Verrall put the same question to me just before you did.

13,635. Chairman: I cannot see how you could conduct such a branch of a general hospital where you are going to have mental cases unless you have some powers of restraint.—No. I quite agree.

13,636. And that involves again licensing and visitation and the whole apparatus once more?—Yes.

13,637. That would be resented to a considerable extent, I imagine, by the managers of general hospitals?—Yes.

13,638. Earl Russell: And indeed, it turns it into a small lunatic hospital at once when you get all that?—I heard Professor Winkler describe the institution at Utrecht when he was in London in 1924. In Utrecht they have established in association with the university, a very elaborate neuro-psychiatric clinic; they have a department for neurology; a department for neurosis, psycho-neuroses, and quiet alienated cases; and another department for restless and, I suppose, noisy and difficult insane patients. It is in association with the university, as I explained, and I understand that the admission of these patients is entirely without certificate, they come voluntarily.

13,639. Chairman: And yet they are detained?—And yet they are detained.

13,640. Earl Russell: On the same principle as you would detain a person in a delirium, you mean?—Yes. Then there are cases in the ordinary other wards of the hospital. A surgical case, for instance, that comes in, with damage to the head and is unconscious, or damage of any kind and is unconscious, is primarily put with the necessary dressings into this neurological department; cases of alcoholic delirium and so on are dealt with in it; they have students, and laboratories, and libraries, and all the apparatus for treatment.

13,641. In what respect does that branch of the hospital at Utrecht differ from a general hospital?—For one thing it regards the nervous system as a whole; it is all part of one system, so that they deal with ordinary neurological cases in one department; that alone differentiates it very much.

13,642. I should have thought that that would be the ideal of the asylum also, to deal with the patient's being as a whole scientifically?—But in no asylum would you have a case of pure paralysis without any mental affection—

13,643. I see what you mean. Do you know how they reconcile the carrying on of this institution in Utrecht with the legal aspect. We do not know what their system of law is?—I am afraid that the things that are done in Utrecht might not perhaps meet with your approval or with the approval of the public here; but that it is done without abuse in a civilised country is worthy of consideration, I think.

13,644. Mr. Micklem: Do you know at all if it is a popular institution there?—It has been going on for 20 years now, and Professor Winkler spoke in the highest terms of appreciation of the work that has been done and of the popularity of it, too; and also his own private patients took advantage of it.

13,645. Chairman: Did he deliver a lecture on the subject or make any communication to any of the learned societies?—Yes, he delivered a lecture before the Medico-Psychological Association, and it is in the April number of 1924, of the Journal of Mental Science.

13,646. I would like to read an account of that. I think the practical working out of this suggestion is one we will have to attend to, and one wants to get down to the business side of it?—I should like to say one other word. I was questioned after my last appearance before you as to the accuracy of one of my remarks, that there were no institutions in England at present for the treatment of mental ailments short of mental unsoundness; and I should like to correct that, because it was a hasty generalisation that went too far. There is, for instance, a hospital in the neighbourhood of Brighton at Hove, the Lady Chichester Hospital, which has been dealing with neurosis, and neuro-psychosis, short of insanity, with great success.

13,647. We are going to have evidence from that institution?—Yes. I do not want it to be supposed that I do not recognise the fact. Maudsley itself is another example, and other hospitals are initiating wards and clinics, and in Edinburgh, I understand, the same work is being initiated.

13,648. But the Chichester Hospital and Maudsley are, of course, specialised institutions; they are not in association with general hospitals?—Quite so; and, of course, in the case of some of the hospitals for nervous diseases in London, I understand that the great bulk of their out-patients are mild psycho-neurosis; at all events, a very large proportion of those who come as out-patients to a hospital for nervous diseases in London will be mild psycho-neurosis; the other cases are pure neurological cases, without any psychosis attached, but they get both. (Dr. Masterman): I would like just to remind you that the Maudsley Hospital is in very close association with King's College Hospital; it is an ideal association with King's College Hospital; it seems to me that that is an extraordinarily good type of thing to develop.

13,649. Earl Russell: You might almost say it is associated with a general hospital?—It is thoroughly associated with, but is not under the control of, the general hospital. The physicians and surgeons of King's College Hospital are in touch with cases at Maudsley, and I think that is a model of the method on which the thing should be done.

13,650. Chairman: Of course, once you give it a separate name and a separate local habitation, it tends to become an asylum in the popular acceptance of the term; whereas, if it is "Ward No. 30" of a general hospital, the hospital is the "Royal Infirmary," or whatever it may be, it has not got the special associations of the mental institution?—I think it has got a perfectly distinct standing among the poor from any asylum.

13,651. That is very interesting.—(Dr. Langdon-Down): Of course, if you contemplate the reception of restless and noisy patients, obviously the ordinary general hospital could not receive them into the wards as at present arranged. Some special arrangements would be necessary, probably separately from the institution.

13,652. And some special financial arrangement?—And some special financial arrangement, yes.

13,653. Earl Russell: In that case, of course, it could not act as a clearing house unless it was prepared to take all cases as they were brought in from the streets?—No; but of course even now I find that the general hospitals do get insane cases brought in from time to time, and they are put in isolation or under supervision for the night, and dealt with on the following day as may be found necessary.

Dr. E. W. G. MASTERMAN, Dr. CHRISTINE MURRELL, and Sir JENNER VERRALL.

13,654. Have they anything in the nature of padded rooms, if wanted?—Yes, at the London Hospital I know there are padded rooms.

13,655. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Are you familiar with Phipps' Clinic at Baltimore, isolated from the hospital, but in very close conjunction with it, which works very well?—No, I am not. Of course, at the Maudsley Hospital they are prepared to receive restless, noisy patients in a certain department in conjunction with the mild psycho-neurosis in other departments.

13,656. Chairman: Then of the three ways in which provision might be made, namely, a branch of a public asylum, a branch or associated institution of a general hospital, or a separate clinic, you favour the intermediate idea, if possible?—Yes.

13,657. That it should be associated with a general hospital?—Yes.

13,658. But should not be a place of permanent detention, but a place only for giving attention to out-patients and treatment of mental cases which are under observation, with a view to their ultimate destination?—Yes. I should like to say that in these matters you are going perhaps rather further than our Committee went, and if I am expressing adherence it must be regarded as a personal view.

13,659. It is so important to think out these things practically.—I think I am carrying my members with me.

13,660. Well, so far as I am concerned, I think I have taken up all the topics left over from the last day. If there is anything you or any of your colleagues would like to add by way of supplement to your evidence we shall be most happy to have any suggestions you wish to make.—Thank you. I should like to make one addition. You will remember that you discussed with us the question of the justice and the certificates, and Lord Russell, I remember, said that a good many of the certificates which were signed under Section 16 are apt to be rather thin.

13,661. Yes, that was the expression.—It so happened that in looking up Section 16 I noticed that it is said (differently from in other places, I think) that the justice "shall examine the alleged lunatic." Now in the presence of the doctor he is called in, and he is told off to examine the lunatic. I think that is likely to lead to a misapprehension.

13,662. Earl Russell: I do not think it need be in the presence of the doctor?—It need not, but at all events he has to examine the lunatic. The doctor knows the justice is told off to examine the lunatic. I think that that tends to make the doctor feel that his responsibility is perhaps less than it would otherwise be; I think it tends to diminish the feeling of responsibility of the doctor, and I think it is asking the justice to do something which we really do not regard as his duty, the examination of the patient, if by examination is meant a medical diagnosis.

13,663. Chairman: If the word were "interview" it would be different?—Yes. We feel that the attitude of the Act is different there from what it is in other places, and it is different from our views of the matter.

13,664. Earl Russell: It is more the word you object to than the fact of his seeing the patient?—Yes.

13,665. Chairman: You want the justice to see the patient in every case; that is part of your recommendation?—Yes.

13,666. Earl Russell: The practice under Section 16 is not what is laid down in the section?—I understand that it often is a simultaneous examination.

13,667. Sometimes it is. Obviously the section contemplates, I think, that the people should be in touch?—(Dr. Bone): So far as my personal experience goes, it is always a simultaneous interview—doctor and justice.

13,668. It is very far from being universal?—I believe so.

13,669. It is only the word "examine" you object to?—(Dr. Langdon-Down): Yes, that is it.

13,670. Chairman: The programme of certification in these different cases and under these different sections varies?—Yes.

13,671. That is exceedingly confusing, and one would like, if possible, to devise a programme which would be precise for all cases, and which both the practitioner and the justice would have no difficulty in following. These differences are most undesirable, if they can be eliminated, and we shall consider, of course, the whole question of the programme of certification. I suppose we have your assent to this that, if possible, the thing to be aimed at is a simplification of the programme, particularly in the direction of making it uniform, or, as far as practicable, uniform in all cases, so as to avoid the technical aspect as much as possible?—Yes.

Mr. Micklem: It is not easy to see what other word you could substitute for "examine."

13,672. Chairman: Would "interview" not be satisfactory?—I think so. We are proposing that there shall be two doctors in any case.

Earl Russell: What is the word in the case of the private patient?—That is in an earlier section, "whether it is necessary for him personally to see and examine the alleged lunatic."

13,673. Chairman: The word "examine" is used in the case of the private patient as Lord Russell pointed out; the phrase there is "to see and examine," so that the word you object to is there also?—We object to it there, too, as overstating the type of duty.

13,674. Mr. Micklem: Is it not the duty of the justice to make up his own mind if he can independently of the medical certificate, that is to say, form an opinion with the certificate before him? You see under Section 16 the medical practitioner might be called in after the justice had seen the patient. Is it not the duty of the justice to make up his mind on all the evidence that he can get, first and most important, the certificate of the doctor, but second, his own examination of the patient if the patient is capable of being examined?—It is difficult to define the slight differences between us, but our idea is that the justice should be weighing the value of the evidence.

13,675. Yes, but is it not evidence if you have a witness before you, the patient before you, and you see him and you talk to him, and you find out from him as far as you can what his condition is. Is not that evidence?—You want to hear what evidence he gives. It is rather different from trying to ascertain his subjective state of mind.

Earl Russell: You see what the words are a few lines down: "If upon such examination or other proof the justice is satisfied that the alleged lunatic is a lunatic"; so apparently he is expected to satisfy himself both by the examination and by the proof that he is a lunatic.

13,676. Mr. Micklem: You do not wish to confine the evidence to the medical certificates?—No, certainly not; I regard it as evidence to hear anything that the patient may have to say.

13,677. Chairman: It is rather a bad bit of drafting in the eighth section where, if the patient has not been seen, a right to see a justice is given. All that is required there is to ascertain whether the patient has been personally seen by such judicial authority. He may have been seen but not examined. It is a drafting hiatus there?—Yes.

13,678. Mr. Micklem: But the whole point of the justice seeing the patient is to examine him if he is in a condition to be examined?—It depends upon what you mean by examining him, whether it is to be a judicial examination or a medical examination.

Earl Russell: You talk about examining a person as to his means; you do not do it by searching his pockets.

13,679. Chairman: Examination and cross-examination are, of course, the words used with regard to any enquiry?—Dr. Hawthorne would like, if he might, to say a few words on the question of the doctor as a witness. (Dr. Hawthorne): It is rather a limited remark that I wish to make, but it is with regard to what Dr. Langdon-Down has said regarding the suggestion put forward by the Association that the medical witness, in so far as he writes a certificate, should be treated as a witness, and should enjoy the immunities of the witness. If I remember rightly one of the members of the Commission on the last occasion suggested that an exact parallel existed between the lunacy certificate and, say, a case of a certificate of diphtheria, or small-pox; and that as the medical certifier could not avoid the responsibility, a full legal responsibility for the one, so he could not expect to do so for the other. What I wish to say to the Commission is that there are two respects, I think, in which these certificates differ the one from the other. In reference, we will say, to diphtheria or any other certifiable disease the doctor offers himself to the community as a person who is ready and willing and competent to deal with it. It may be said he does exactly the same in respect to lunacy, but I submit there is a difference. The doctor undertakes to certify a patient as a lunatic with reluctance. I think if you took the opinion of 99 per cent. of the medical profession, you would find that they would be only too glad if some means could be devised to relieve them from this responsibility; but unless they undertake it, of course, we should have personal and domestic catastrophes, and we should run the risk of having demented people running about our streets. The total amount which an individual doctor does in this direction is very small. A man may conduct a practice for 20 or 30 years and do very little of it. As far as the remuneration is concerned it is a very very slight matter to him, and the responsibility and unpleasantness are very great. Therefore I submit he is acting with reference to these lunacy certificates as a public servant, whereas in certifying other diseases he is pursuing the proper practice of his profession for the sake of a reasonable and suitable remuneration. Then the second difference between the two classes of certificates I may say is this: in the certificate of a certifiable disease the doctor expresses an opinion only; he does not state the facts upon which he founds the opinion; whereas in the lunacy certificate, though there is an opinion expressed, the facts upon which that opinion rest in the judgment of the doctor are there, and they are not only there but they are put to a judicial authority who has the right to challenge them, to investigate them, to act upon them, or to decline to act upon them; so that the certificate bears a different quality when it takes its final shape than does a certificate of a certifiable disease. Therefore, with great respect, I submit, when the Commission comes to express an opinion upon the point raised by the Association, it should be borne in mind that the analogy of what one may call the ordinary disease certificate to the lunacy certificate is not completely a sound one. That is the point I wish to make.

13,680. I have gathered that the Association advocate the view that the immunity of the certifying doctor in respect of the contents of his certificate should be as high as the immunity of a witness testifying in a court of law?—That is so.

13,681. And that the Association would not be content with the somewhat lesser protection suggested, namely, that any person who seeks to impugn a doctor's conduct in the matter of his certificate should have upon him the burden of proving that the doctor had acted negligently and in mala fides. You would not regard that protection as sufficient?—That protection exists at present.

13,682. Yes, but not, if I may say so, in a very satisfactory shape from the medical man's point of view, because the onus seems to be rather the other way, and the burden is put upon him of vindicating himself. It is curiously expressed in the Act, and

I would not like to give a legal opinion upon the matter, but it does not seem to be expressed in a satisfactory way from the profession's point of view just now. In the ordinary case if you want to challenge any person who professes an art, he holds himself out to the public as competent to perform the things in which he is skilled; that means he will give his honest work. If you can show that he has acted carelessly, or acted in bad faith, then he is exposed to an action like anybody else is. He must give honest work, and he must give work in good faith. I do see a difficulty in conceding to the medical profession in this one aspect of their work an absolute immunity. An absolute immunity goes a very long way, because a witness may say things in the witness box maliciously and yet is protected. Would you wish a doctor protected from statements made maliciously in his certificate? Suppose, taking advantage of his position, in giving his certificate he made a malicious attack upon somebody for some collateral reasons; it is a very high immunity you are asking.

13,683. Earl Russell: And a witness, after all, is not protected if he does not tell the truth?—We do not ask for any protection for false statements.

13,684. Chairman: No, but the kind of protection you are asking would entirely protect you from this, for example: suppose somebody were able to establish that a doctor gave a certificate when he was drunk, that he knew nothing about the case whatever, and wrote the thing down in a state of alcoholic excitement. Now, if legislative protection were given such as you desire, that doctor would be absolutely safe. I do not think the profession would want to protect a person who had acted in that way?—I think it is very difficult indeed to think of a medical practitioner being so intoxicated as to make these extremely wild statements, and yet be capable of constructing a certificate which would commend itself to the judgment of a judicial authority.

Earl Russell: But the certificate does not commend itself; it does not in the least follow.

13,685. Mr. Micklem: Suppose a case of gross negligence, a doctor signing the certificate but grossly negligent to ascertain the facts; you would not wish him to be protected there, would you?—I do not, of course, wish any man to be protected for wrongdoing, but we have got to consider the whole question, how it is affecting, for example, the minds of doctors at the present day, the responsibility which they feel, and which many of them are determined not to accept.

13,686. Would it not very largely be got over under your suggestion that there should be always two certificates?—Yes, I think it would.

13,687. It looks as though at the present time the onus of proving good faith and reasonable care is on the doctor. Suppose you were to shift the onus on to the complaining party; would not that assist you?—If I may say so, this point had to be very carefully considered, not only by my Committee, but by the representative meeting of the Association, and it happened to be my fate to state to the representative meeting what was the legal position. Now that statement was made in the presence of the solicitor to the Association, and he afterwards endorsed it as a correct statement of the law as it stood to-day, and the statement was to this effect: that if an action is commenced by a patient who has been certified against the doctor who has certified him, it is open to the doctor to go to the court and ask for that action to be suppressed. Then the onus is upon the doctor to show not only that he has acted in good faith, but that he has not done anything which could lead any person to suggest he has not acted in good faith. That is the responsibility placed upon the doctor. Therefore if there is the slightest technical flaw or especially a meticulous judge, if I may say so, he might very well say, "I do not say you have not acted in good faith, but there is something here which might lead a person to say you have not acted in good faith, and therefore the case must go forward." When the case goes forward, the person who impugns the responsibility has got to establish the proposition. The onus therefore at the trial as to whether the doctor had acted in good faith or not, is to-day upon the patient, or the plaintiff; but the onus is upon the doctor when he asks that the trial be suppressed or cut short.

13,688. Chairman: That may well be so. Of course the procedure in England or Wales differs from what it is in Scotland. The position in Scotland is perhaps more favourable, because a patient wishing to bring an action against a doctor would have to set out in consequential detail the charges which he made of negligence or want of good faith. The doctor would be entitled to have a legal discussion upon the record as it then stood, in order that these allegations might be examined on the basis whether, if they are proper, they would establish negligence? It is the old English demurrer, and consequently you do not have a trial at once. But here, I understand, the case would be sent to trial, and these legal questions would be discussed later. It is really a retention of the demurrer idea in the particular case of the doctor; but it is asking a great deal that we should put the certifying doctor in the position of a witness giving oral testimony in court so as to protect him absolutely, even although the plaintiff were able to prove that this particular doctor had been induced to make reckless statements about the patient by a fee from a relative anxious to have him put away. It seems to be a pretty strong thing to say that the protection should go that length, however recklessly and in however bad faith such statements were made?—It occurred to me that statements meriting the adjective you apply to them would come under the category of being erroneous statements. We do not ask the doctor to be free from any responsibility for statements of that order.

13,689. They would be perjured statements?—Yes.

13,690. However, it is a difficult problem, and we are obliged for your assistance in the matter.—(Dr. Murrell): Of course, this subject was very much discussed at our Committee, and it seems that directly we discuss it here again we get back to the idea of the doctor doing the certificate. It is the judicial authority who really certifies the patient. The judicial authority is obviously immune. He has worked on the expert advice of a medical man, and all we want is not at all to have the doctor in any way protected if he was acting in bad faith, but we do want this protection if he was acting to the best of his ability as an expert witness. But we felt this, that the doctor and the judicial authority are really jointly responsible for that certification.

13,691. Of course, even the judicial authority, I think, might be liable in damages?—Yes, but it is not the usual thing, is it? It is generally the doctor who comes into court, and it is not only whether the action is successful against him or not. Therefore, doctors feel that if they are really trying to say what is honest, they should be protected in that sense, as long as they are doing their best. If we have suggested to you something which would give too great a cover to the doctor when he was not acting to the best of his ability, then of course we would submit that some other method must be considered.

13,692. So long as he is doing his best, he will be protected, but, unfortunately, only protected in the long run after he has got through the worry of proceedings.—Yes; that is the difficulty.

13,693. On the other hand, if a person comes forward and says, "This man does not do his best," and offers to prove it to a court of justice, are you to close the mouth of that person altogether, and in consequence is the action to be dismissed?—But one's answer to that would be another question: If he were acting as an expert witness in court you would protect him in that way? If he were a handwriting expert, would he not be immune?

13,694. He would be absolutely immune for anything he said in the witness box.—This doctor who is giving this certificate appears as an expert.

13,695. Earl Russell: You would have the advantage when he gives evidence in court of his being cross-examined, whereas this certificate is final.—Would it be possible for the doctor to appear before the judicial authority and answer any questions that were required?

13,696. But you have not the means for cross-examination; that is the difficulty.—(Dr. Langdon-Down): We feel very strongly that if the judicial authority exercises all the powers given to him and considers the certificates carefully, there would not be any great risk in granting the immunity we suggest.

Chairman: I need scarcely say that we are exceedingly anxious that nothing in the existing state of the law should deter the medical profession from performing the very important duties laid upon them under the Act, and it is very undesirable that any profession should feel they are performing their work under the possible menace of actions, which may be quite unfounded but to repel which may involve an expenditure of a sum of money which may almost spell ruin to the practitioner, in addition to the publicity of the attack.

Earl Russell: And ruin his reputation?

13,697. Chairman: Yes.—I feel sure we can leave the matter in the hands of the Commission. We have put our case and it has been most sympathetically received.

Chairman: It is working it out into legislation that is so difficult to my mind, because we are anxious to give every encouragement to the profession to carry on their work without any such menace hanging over them. At the same time, one must preserve the right of action where action ought to be taken, because, after all, if a person comes into the court and says, "I have suffered a real wrong," there is nothing worse in a system of law than that that person should be driven from the seat of judgment and told "Right or wrong, you have no remedy in our law." That one wrong should remain unredressed because of legislation is, to my mind, always a very regrettable blot on our legal escutcheon?—(Sir Jenner Verrall): You were saying that damages might lie against the judicial authority making the order, but, as a matter of fact, that hardly ever occurs. The person really aimed at is the doctor, and does not it follow that the fact that it might occur has thrown an undue share of responsibility on the doctor? Might it not be possible to increase the capacity for inquiry of the judicial authority, so that, although it might not be equal to the criticism of a cross-examination in court, there might be a considerable protection. If the judicial authority was capable and felt the responsibility and necessity of going into the case and considering whether the doctor's certificate was genuine, he having to give the facts on sufficient grounds, would not that be sufficient protection?

13,698. It would go so far, but it would not go the whole length. We would still be dealing with an ex parte investigation, and unless you were to convert the whole thing into a court of law, which one would deprecate, it is difficult to attract to this particular function of the medical profession all the immunity given to a witness in an open court of law. You must take the risks of people misbehaving themselves, because the freedom is so important in the cause of justice. I have no doubt that witnesses abuse their immunity often in court, they do sometimes, one sees that, but it is better that they should abuse their immunity in certain cases than that the cause of justice should be impeded by people being frightened to give evidence. It is not quite the same in your capacity?—Except for this, that although we may be driven to putting before you our unfortunate experience of attacks made in connection with the matter, in the long run what we are honestly desirous of doing is to take away from our profession any excuse for refusing to do in the general interest what they are bound to do, and we are bound to state that there is a risk of that unless some increased protection is given beyond what the Act gives us at present.

13,699. Earl Russell: You cannot ask us to go so far as to protect an admitted wrongdoer?—Quite.

13,700. Chairman: And then as to the alleged wrongdoer who comes into court, is the allegation to be precluded from being proved?—That is a matter for the Commission. Are not those the extreme minority of cases? We think they are.

13,701. Of course they are? (Dr. Murrell): As Sir Jenner Verrall suggested, would it not be possible to increase the responsibility of the judicial authority? After all, two people are responsible for the certification in a sense. The feeling on the part of the medical profession is that they have to bear the brunt of the risk. If you cannot make their risk much less, cannot you associate the judicial authority more in that risk?

Mr. Micklem: Do two wrongs instead of one.

Chairman: You want two people in the dock instead of only one? If I may say so, it is not at all an easy problem from the legal point of view. The policy of it one sees perfectly. One wants to preserve the profession in comfort in discharging a very important part of their duty, and one can see that the work under this menace must often be very alarming.

13,702. Earl Russell: I can only tell you that I put this point to a very distinguished lawyer and said that the doctors obviously desired and wanted it for their protection, and he threw up his hands in horror, and said that it was contrary to the whole principle of English law.—(Sir Jenner Verrall): He would.

Earl Russell: Still our principles are founded on practice.

Chairman: And it is even the Roman law too. The whole doctrine of law is this, that a person who professes an art is responsible to the public for the proper exercise of that art, and to ask immunity in one department of your activity is a large order; but we understand where your minds are, and we will do our best.

13,703. Mr. Micklem: I think it would be an enormous protection to the doctors if there were two certificates?—(Dr. Hawthorne): The fact of two certificates would make it very unlikely indeed that any of the things put by the Chairman would happen.

13,704. Miss Madeleine Symons: I am afraid, Dr. Langdon-Down, it is troubling you to go back to another subject, but I was very much interested in what you said about the possibilities of using these clinics for young people in connection with cases from the court. I wonder whether you share the view which I have heard expressed, that there are a good many children who do not come under the definition of the Mental Deficiency Act who would benefit by advice and treatment, and who, if they got it at clinics of this kind, might not become part of the asylum population?—(Dr. Langdon-Down): Yes, I do agree with that. I think it is very important that a clear understanding of the children's minds should be obtained in these difficult and doubtful cases, whether possibly the whole trend of the children's upbringing is partly in fault and might be remedied.

13,705. And are there at present not many opportunities for them to go there?—There are not, no.

13,706. Earl Russell: I just want to ask you a general question as to any possible extension of the powers of the Board of Control. The only actual power they have now, I think, is a power to make regulations about returns, and the right to visit, but there are cases where it is desirable that backward asylums should be brought up a little. It is obvious you could not give a central authority power to compel a local authority to go in for capital expenditure, to build a new wing, or anything of the sort, but you might give them power to make regulations for certain things, for letter boxes, or the training of nurses, or as to the administration or non-administration of drugs, perhaps. Do you think it desirable, generally, that the Board of Control should have any more power, or that they should remain entirely an advisory body as now? Which do you think on the whole would be for the benefit of asylum administration?—It is very difficult to say. I am not personally very anxious to see the central authority interfering with local and individual action except as an advisory and supervising body; but I must only speak for myself in that matter.

13,707. You must remember that, whereas some districts are progressive, there are other districts which are retrograde, and where things are not brought up to date in spite of repeated reports; but you still think it better to rely upon public opinion rather than on the actual legal power?—I think so, yes.

13,708. Mr. Snell: I would have liked to have continued the question of the private institutions, but time is getting on, and I will not, except to ask one question. I think you said that the public is divided on the matter, between those who have relatives who want treatment and those who have not; but is it not just possible that there are relatives who are interested in putting into a home and keeping there patients long after they have been restored to health?—I expect that is so.

13,709. You admit the possibility?—I admit the possibility. I only say there are numerous safeguards, and they are rightly there.

13,710. I thought your statement rather omitted to take note of that. There is just a question on the after care matter. Have you in mind any conditions under which public help could be extended to an ex-patient as a help towards his being reestablished as a self reliant citizen?—I think the first steps have already been indicated in our discussion this morning. I have no ready-made further suggestions.

13,711. What is the extent of the danger, in your opinion, of a relapse in the case of a patient who is without help, with a home possibly bankrupt, and having to face a hard world? Is there not some real strain put upon him which a thoroughly strong balanced mind can hardly bear?—Undoubtedly. The reason the patient broke down in the first instance is because his resisting power was unequal to the conditions with which he was faced of some kind or other.

13,712. Does not it seem a waste of all the money that has been spent upon him and of the medical care he has received when he is thrust back, without any provision being made for him, into the conditions which broke his health down?—We certainly hope the transition will be softened by the suggestions we have made.

13,713. Have you no figures as to the proportions of the relapses due to that?—No, but I would say that probably a patient in ordinary life gets worried about his affairs and gets an exaggerated and false impression of them. He goes away for a year, perhaps; he comes back and the things which worried him before will not at first be worries in the same sense.

13,714. He may not have any affairs after a year?—No.

13,715. Mrs. Mathew: I was rather alarmed at the statement that the provincial licensed houses are not directly under the Board of Control. Why is that?—Oh, they are under the Board of Control, but the visitation is different in their cases. The visitation is more largely local visitation.

Mrs. Mathew: They are not directly visited, I think.

13,716. Chairman: They are visited by the Commissioners, but not in the same way?—Not so frequently. They have a local visiting authority.

Earl Russell: Is it not rather a local visitor appointed by the local justices?

13,717. Mrs. Mathew: I think that makes it rather less direct. A local visitor is not exactly the principle, is it?—It is different certainly; I do not know whether it is more or less efficient.

13,718. Earl Russell: The local visitor has to be a medical man, has he not, the justices' visitor has to be a medical man?—I believe so.

13,719. Chairman: The justices visit themselves, by an appointed member, and along with a medical practitioner?—Yes. I am sorry I am not sufficiently familiar with this particular aspect of the matter.

Chairman: It is all laid down in the Act. Then that concludes our meeting this morning, and we are much obliged to you for coming to us again and assisting us further.

EVIDENCE TAKEN IN PRIVATE.

Mrs. M. called, and examined.

13,720. Chairman: We are very much obliged to you for coming and seeing us. We have been discussing how we might best take your evidence. I think the most convenient course would be if you would just tell us in your own language the experiences you have had, and bring out any points you would like us to hear about. We are very interested indeed to know how the actual life of these institutions goes on from day to day and the experience of people who have been there; and as you were in B. for some time, it will help us very much if you tell us in your own way of your experiences there and any matter which you would like us to have in mind, when we are considering possible reforms that may have to be made. If I remember right you were in B.?—Yes.

13,721. For just under a year, from the 1st November, 1919, to the 18th October, 1920?—Yes. Might I speak about R. Infirmary first?

13,722. Perhaps we ought to get one or two little details about yourself.—I would sooner you questioned me on it; I might wander a bit.

13,723. We want to introduce you, as it were. You were born on the 9th September, 1889, so you are now 35?—I shall be 36 in September.

13,724. And you are by profession a teacher?—Yes.

13,725. You were on the permanent staff of the L. County Council for five years and you hold all the necessary certificates?—Yes.

13,726. Then in 1916 you married Mr. M., who is at present in the Royal Navy?—Yes.

13,727. And you had one child born on the 16th September, 1918?—Yes.

13,728. Do you remember the date when you went to R. Infirmary?—The 26th October, 1919.

13,729. That is a Poor Law institution?—Yes; I was there for six days. It was a very good place, the mental ward; I was very kindly treated. The food was very good and the nurses were very good. I have heard a lot of evidence about infirmaries and what happens in the infirmary ward, but there is one point that has never been brought out: that is, the mixing up of patients. You are left in the infirmary ward, the mental ward, just with a daily worker. She is paid weekly. She comes in in the morning and goes home at a certain time in the evening; a very ignorant girl the one at R. was, and she had charge of us all day long. The head nurse of the infirmary would just look in now and then, to see that everything was going on all right; but there was no one there who really watched you to see what your characteristics were. Now I am not disputing that I was quite in a fit state to go into an asylum, and if there had been voluntary places I would willingly have gone to a voluntary mental hospital, but I knew of no such place, though I was going about London trying to find someone who understood me. While I was in the mental ward another patient was brought in, and I got the credit of that woman's actions.

Mrs. M.

13,730. So I notice.—I was rightfully certified, and wrongfully, because I was actually put away on that woman's actions. The day I went into the mental ward they took away my wedding ring; that was on the 26th October.

13,731. What did they do that for?—I do not know, but that is the custom, because I got a solicitor to write to the R. Infirmary and ask when my wedding ring was taken away, and they said it was taken away on that day, according to custom. That was a great grievance with women in lunatic asylums, that they were not allowed to wear their wedding rings.

13,732. What was the idea, do you know—is it in case they might lose them?—In case you swallow them or in case a nurse was to rob you of them.

13,733. If your wedding ring was taken from you, was it kept and given back to you when you left?—Yes, it was sent with my clothing to my father.

13,734. As you have said very frankly, at this time you were suffering mentally?—Yes.

13,735. And you felt that you would have liked to go to some place where you could get rest and shelter?—Protection.

13,736. A very good word—protection until you could recover. You felt you were ill for the time being?—Yes.

13,737. And you felt the want of some place to which you could go and get such care and protection, which you would have quite willingly undergone voluntarily, without any certification?—I would. I went to two doctors in fact, one in I. and one in London. One gave me a white bottle and the other gave me a black bottle, but it did not have any effect.

13,738. Do you think that your illness really arose after the birth of your child?—Yes.

13,739. Up to that time you had had no symptoms?—I had never had a mental illness of any description.

13,740. But had you a difficult time when your child was born?—No; but I had breast abscesses afterwards.

13,741. And was it at that time that this feeling of unappiness came over you?—It was a racing of the brain; my brain was going very quickly.

13,742. You could not control it?—No. Instead of just doing one job at a time, I would start about five jobs and then get myself in a muddle.

13,743. You felt, therefore, in your own mind that there was something wrong, and that you must get some protection for the time being?—Yes.

13,744. There is also some record in your case that you wanted to do away with yourself?—Yes, continually.

13,745. Did you feel that you could not get on in the world, and that you were out of gear with the world?—When I started all these different jobs, I used to go out to get away from them, and I found I could only spend my day going out walking, and then I could not walk enough. I used to go on trams, the trams did not go quick enough. I went on trains, they did not go fast enough. I went on in such a worked-up state that I would stand in the middle of the road with my brain going round.

13,746. How long was it after your baby was born that you felt like this?—I had breast abscesses, six weeks; they were diagnosed after the baby was born.

13,747. Sir David Drummond: Your nervous trouble began six weeks afterwards?—No, the abscesses started then, and then I was ill three months with the abscesses. I was at my father's house, and then I went back to my own house at L., where I lived with my husband when he was at home; and as soon as I walked into the house I felt as though the walls were coming in on me, as though I was walking into a cave. I think that was the beginning of it.

13,748. Chairman: Was it about six weeks after your baby was born that the abscesses appeared?—Yes.

13,749. After your baby was born did you still feel all right?—I was quite normal mentally; I was being well looked after with the abscesses.

13,750. When would you say the breakdown mentally took place?—It came on gradually. I went back to my own home about the 6th January, and when I walked into the house I felt as though the whole of the room was coming down on my head.

13,751. Earl Russell: And that was the first time you felt odd?—Yes; I ran out of the house at once. As I walked into it, I ran out.

13,752. Chairman: It came on quite gradually. Your child had been born on the 16th September, 1918, but it was not until January that you really began to feel so badly upset, and meantime you had had these abscesses as well?—Yes.

13,753. Mrs. Mathew: Did you go back to work?—No, I gave up work on my marriage. I am not teaching now.

13,754. You have given that up also?—Yes, I gave it up.

13,755. Chairman: Now, having wished to get some place where you could go voluntarily, you found the only provision for such cases was to go to R.?—No, I did not find that out at all. I went to doctors and I was told there was a hospital in London for nervous diseases; but I did not feel it was a nervous disease. Then I went to the L. Hospital; I saw a very young doctor, and I did not have any confidence in him. Then I came to the conclusion that I was incurable; and I was living in my own house with a servant and the baby, and the baby was being left entirely to the nurse.

13,756. Was your husband at home at this time?—He was at sea. I had a feeling that the child was being neglected and if I was out of the way somebody would look after it, and I felt my husband's future would be ruined by having a wife like myself who could do nothing, so I decided I ought to die; but at the same time I did not want to die; I kept trying to kill myself, but I was stopped every time somehow or other, fortunately.

13,757. Earl Russell: Stopped by yourself?—I went to a railway to throw myself on the line, and there were a lot of little school boys waiting for their train and I could not do it in front of them. I made about five attempts. Nobody knew I was doing it, but I was anxious to get out of it, to give my husband and child a chance. Then in the end I put my head in a gas oven but it did not have any effect on me. Then I went home to father and I said "If you do not put me away, there will be a tragedy."

13,758. Your father was Mr. G. M.?—Yes.

13,759. Have you any other relatives?—I have a number of married brothers and sisters.

13,760. Do they live in London?—Yes.

13,761. When you were in this trouble did you see any of them?—Yes, I saw a lot of them; they all did their best for me.

13,762. You have brought us up to date with your story very clearly, if I may say so. How did you actually come to go to R.? You had been to one of the London Hospitals, and you were not satisfied with the advice you got there?—My father had been very worried about me, and when I told him about it, I said: "You must put me away or else there will be a tragedy," they were my words—he was a relieving officer and he knew what to do.

13,763. Then it was suggested that you should go to R.?—I knew he would act on my statement; he took me down to I. and sent for the local relieving officer.

13,764. So that really it was with your father's sanction that these steps were taken?—Yes.

13,765. Now R. was the place to which you were taken—I would rather like to know about this in detail. When you went there what was the first thing that happened to you. Who received you there?—The doctor was waiting for me.

13,766. Did he have a talk with you?—Yes. He was rather an old man and rather gruff, and he merely mumbled out a few questions, "Is your husband away at sea?" "Have you been worrying about him?" "Has the war upset you?"—things like that.

13,767. And how did you get on with him?—Quite nicely; I just answered everything he asked me.

13,768. What was done next?—I was given a bath and put to bed.

13,769. In what sort of place were you put to bed?—It was a very rough room, a very old room, and there was a bed in each corner.

13,770. How many patients would there be altogether?—There were four patients, with myself, one in each corner; there were four beds in the room.

13,771. And they were all occupied?—Yes. They were very old women; the one opposite me was quite blind and she used to ask the nurse what the time was; when the nurse said ten, she would say, "Is it 10 at night or 10 in the morning?" In the other corner there was the oldest inhabitant in R. She used to talk loudly all the time. In this corner (describing) there was a lady named Mrs. J. I will have something to say about her later on. They found out she had a broken shoulder bone when she was there.

13,772. When you saw the doctor, did he prepare a certificate about your condition at the time?—I do not know what he did. He simply asked me questions, and he wrote down answers, but I could not say what he wrote.

13,773. I have the certificate in front of me just now, and it corresponds very much, if I may say so, with what you have been saying yourself. Have you ever seen it?—Yes, I have seen it.

13,774. It is one of the documents you are entitled to get after you leave the asylum. The date of it is the 26th October, 1919, and it is signed by the doctor whom you have just mentioned. He says he observed himself that you were very depressed, and he adds: "and says; she is tired of it all; her husband is at sea; and she has no comfort in her married life and that yesterday she tried to kill herself by putting her head into the gas oven and turning on the taps." That is all exactly as you have told us yourself. Then it goes on to say that your father "states she is always talking of suicide, is delusional and says she has killed her child and nurse, attempted suicide by putting her head in gas oven." The only new thing there is that your father said that you were suffering from delusions, and thought you had killed your child.—That is not true. I do not like to mention this sort of thing, but there is a person in the family who when there is a little smoke sees a lot of fire; she had known for a long time that I had been ill, and she had made the most of it.

13,775. There are people who do that, you know, but had you said to anybody that you had killed your child?—I would like to explain it in my own way. She had been putting anonymous letters under the door, and my husband used to get up early to get these letters so that I should not see them. When I knew I was sort of past all hope, I felt I could never really live in the outside world again. I thought she had been talking, and I would give her something to talk about, so I went round to the house and said "I have murdered Maggie and the baby, and," I said, "they look very beautiful;" and the first thing I saw on the certificate was that statement, so what I imagined would happen had happened.

13,776. Apart from this matter of the wedding ring you have told us about, or even this statement you have mentioned about murdering your child and the nurse, you appreciate that the condition of your mind at the time obviously made it necessary that you should be protected against yourself for the time being?—Absolutely, I recognised it.

13,777. As far as the incident of the ring is concerned, what you want to point out is this, that there was attributed to you an incident which really related to somebody else?—Yes, and I want to prevent anybody else having such incidents attributed to them. I was not wrongfully put away.

13,778. The incident of the ring was this, was it not, that this other patient had thrown her marriage ring into the fire?—Yes.

13,779. And then the story of throwing the ring into the fire was in some way attributed to you?—Yes.

13,780. And told, I take it, to the justice of the peace who signed the order in your case?—Yes.

13,781. What you want to point out is that an incident that may have happened in the case of one patient may, through a mistake, be attributed to another patient?—Yes.

13,782. It was not that you were not yourself in a proper state to be put under care, but rather you think there is a risk of an incident relating to one person being applied to another, which might of course be very unfortunate?—Yes.

13,783. Now we have got to the R. room, and the other patients there. Did you find the other patients disturbing?—Not till the 28th October when this Mrs. C. came in.

13,784. She is the lady of the marriage ring?—Yes.

13,785. As far as the three other patients were concerned, they did not disturb you?—They did not worry me at all.

13,786. You did not find it distressing to be with them?—It was rather interesting. The woman on the right side was a very badly discoloured woman; she was very, very ill, and she muttered a lot, and she rather frightened my visitors; I had some relatives come to see me, and they were terrified.

13,787. I should have thought if you were in that worried and distressed state which you have described, you might find it rather unhappy to be with other persons who muttered and talked, and so on?—Not then; I felt safe. I had been on my own for a very long time and very worried, and now I felt I was safe.

13,788. You had got shelter?—I had got shelter.

13,789. Who was looking after you,—merely this inexperienced girl, do you mean?—In R. there was merely this girl, a rather strong girl; she used to scrub the floors and look after the fires and serve out our dinners.

13,790. But was she placed in charge of this room?—Not really. She was in fact, but the one who was supposed to be in charge was the head nurse in the infirmary.

13,791. Did you see her?—She used to look in to see if we were all right.

13,792. Take the nurse who was actually in charge—was she a kind girl?—She was a kind girl; she was a rough class of girl, but she was quite all right; she never interfered with us.

13,793. Did she bring you your meals nicely, and look after your washing, and things of that sort?—Yes.

13,794. If you are in bed you have to have a bed wash and so on—were all these things done quite nicely?—Quite nicely; I have nothing to complain of at all 13,795. What about the doctor coming to see you?—Dr. F. saw me at the start.

Mrs. M.

13,796. While you were in this room did any doctor come to see you?—No, the justice of the peace came. The justice of the peace was a very nice old gentleman; he came into the room and sat down beside me; had a nice little talk with me; asked me how I got in there, and he got up and he refused to sign the certificate. He simply went out of the room saying, "No, no" and shaking his head.

13,797. He did not think you were in a state to be certified?—No.

13,798. What happened next?—I think the people there were rather puzzled what to do about it, and I really think if I had got up and demanded my clothes I could have got out; but I felt quite safe where I was and I did not bother.

13,799. I suppose in your talk with him you had told him of all your experiences and so on?—No. He did not take that attitude at all. I should hardly think he had seen the certificate. He simply talked to me about my life; he was placed exactly as my father was placed.

13,800. Did he know you had wanted to commit suicide?—He did not ask me anything at all about it, but I told him I got into a state of depression and worry.

13,802. Chairman: You did not tell him you had tried to commit suicide, did you?—This is the way he talked to me. He said "Tell me all about it; how have you got yourself into this state?" I was the youngest of a large family; my mother was dead, and my father asked me not to marry until he died. The war was on, and I was afraid my sweetheart would get killed, so we got married, and my husband wanted a home of his own, he did not want to live with my father.

13,803. So you just talked about family relations?—Yes, and he sympathised with me, because he could see the position I was placed in. I looked after my husband while he was home on leave, and then I went home and looked after my father, so I was serving two masters.

13,804. Apparently, after his talk with you, he was not prepared to write any order in your case?—No.

13,805. But he ultimately did, you know.—Yes, I know he did, about four or five days afterwards, on the 1st November. He saw me on the 28th October.

13,806. And he did not see you again, did he?—No; but before his second visit, Dr. F. came again, and I want to tell you something about this, and I am afraid you will not believe it. I have told you he was rather an old man. When he came and he found that Mr. P. had not signed the certificate, he wagged his pen about, and then he said "What shall I do?" The Relieving Officer was there, so the Relieving Officer said "Sign it," so Dr. F. signed the certificate, and I thought within myself, that is a nice way to sign up a certificate.

13,807. It was the doctor who said "What shall I do?"—Yes. Before Dr. F. had come, the Relieving Officer had come into the room with the wedding ring, and he said "Why did you throw your wedding ring in the fire?" I said "I did not throw it in the fire," and the attendant came forward and she said "No, it was not you; that is the one that has gone to B."

13,809. I should not have thought, if I may say so, that a doctor would have much difficulty in signing a certificate on the facts (apart altogether from the ring) that you had been trying to commit suicide, and so on, and your state of mind as you have described it yourself, which you agree made you suitable for detention for the time being?—Well, what I say is this, that you have got to be convicted of some crime before you can get into a lunatic asylum and have treatment.

13,810. Surely not; it is not a crime to be ill?—But you have to be convicted of wanting to take your life, let us say.

13,811. You are right to that extent, that it has got to be very clearly established that you are in a state which ought to lead to your protection; but you must not use the language about being convicted of a crime, because there is no more crime in being ill in your mind than there is in being ill in your body?—Supposing I went and knocked at a lunatic asylum door and said "I want to be taken in, I am mad"; they would not have taken me in.

13,812. They cannot, you see. That is one of the very things we are considering; whether, in your type of case, it would not be right that you should be able to go there and say "I want to come here"?—That is one of my points.

13,813. It is a very good point. For the moment, with regard to Dr. F. signing a certificate about your state as he did, you agree it was quite proper it should be signed, and I do not quite understand why he had any difficulty about it?—Only this: Why not have a straightforward business? Why have so many complications? Getting the blame of somebody else's wedding ring, and listening to a doctor taking advice from a relieving officer as to whether he should sign or not. Why could I not have said "Yes, I am mad, take me."

13,814. Mr. Snell: It was not your wedding ring that was lost?—No, it was not. We have had a letter from R. and they say that the day the wedding ring was handed over to the Relieving Officer was the same day that Mrs. C. was admitted.

13,815. Chairman: That is quite clear—I mean you need not elaborate it, it is quite obvious what must have occurred. But what does seem to me important is that before the doctor signed his certificate, and before the justice of the peace made his order, the attendant who knew what had really happened had come forward and said "This is a mistake"?—Yes.

13,816. Therefore that was not made the ground on which you were certified?—No, but things like that stick in your mind, and you see the injustice of it.

13,817. You rather point out that there is a risk of wrong things being attributed to wrong people than that any wrong was attributed to you?—Yes.

13,818. Earl Russell: The doctor did not put it in his certificate?—No.

13,819. Chairman: Then the doctor signed and the justice of the peace signed; then, as you know, that authorises a person to be kept under detention?—Yes.

13,820. Did you see the justice of the peace a second time?—Yes.

13,821. What sort of meeting had you with him this time?—He came into the room and shook his head at me, and he said "I have heard some very bad tales about you." He looked very sad and severe; he thought I had been "kidding" him I think before, so I tried to say something, and he picked up the pen and he signed the certificate and off I went.

13,822. The place to which you went was B., was it not?—Yes.

13,823. How long had you been altogether in R.?—Six days.

13,824. So far as the actual treatment in R. infirmary is concerned, I understand you have really nothing much to say against it?—A very good place.

13,825. It is interesting to hear that. How were you taken to B.?—In a taxi.

13,826. Who went with you in the taxi?—The Relieving Officer and the nurse.

13,827. Did you take your own belongings with you—what belongings of yours had you taken with you to R.?—All my own clothing, of course. I took nothing to B.; I went to R. with my father and the Relieving Officer.

Mrs. M.

13,828. Did you take a bag with your things?—No.

13,829. Just what you stood up in?—No. They took me to B. in the workhouse clothing. They removed all my clothing and sent it back to my father.

13,830. In R. you were in bed at first. You must have got up?—They kept me in bed all the time.

13,831. But when you got up to go away?—I cannot remember whether they dressed me, or whether they put me in a dressing-gown. I think I must have been in a dressing gown, because they put a lot of blankets round me.

13,832. When you got to B., do you remember what you were dressed in then?—A dressing-gown—a green dressing-gown.

13,833. When you got to B. where did you go—who received you there?—A woman in black clothing and a frilly hat.

13,834. That sounds like a matron?—The head attendant.

13,835. She received you, did she?—Yes.

13,836. And what happened next?—They took me into an empty dormitory, and I had to get on the bed and they stripped me; then the doctor, Dr. D. S. examined me.

13,837. That is a lady doctor?—Yes.

13,838. Was it a thorough examination?—Yes.

13,839. All the usual things that one goes through in these circumstances?—Yes.

13,840. Earl Russell: This is a physical examination, not a mental one?—A physical one.

13,841. Chairman: Simply to look at the main organs of the body, and generally overhaul?—Yes.

13,842. Was that the first time you met Dr. D. S.?—Yes, the first time.

13,843. And after the general examination what happens next?—You are given a bath, and then put to bed in the middle dormitory. That is a large dormitory with about 12 beds in it and a number of patients sitting about in the dormitory.

13,844. How did that place strike you when you came in?—It was not so bad when I got in, because I got in about 3 o'clock in the afternoon; but when they started putting the patients to bed at night it was very, very terrifying. I was put in a bed right opposite the open door, and there was a patient who was very noisy, and the nurse was putting her to bed, and she was stamping down the ward, and screaming out, "Nurse, nurse, I cannot do it," but of course very loudly; and you could smell draughts. There was a general screaming and moaning and shrieking and noise, slamming of doors, and at last it died down; but by the time it had died down I was in a very excitable state, my brain was simply racing. I did not know what to do with myself to control myself, my brain was on fire, and I was full of energy, and I simply could not stop in bed, so while the nurse was out of the room I got on the bed and got two pillows and did a lot of dumb-bell exercises to get rid of some of the energy. I think I must have frightened some of the patients.

13,845. That is quite an important point. You had just come into this place, and you were in an abnormal state of mind, your brain was racing, and so on, and you found the association with those other cases distressing?—Yes, very exciting.

13,846. And alarming?—Yes.

13,847. How many of the other patients in this ward were of that type? Were there several of that type—violent patients?—Those in bed in the dormitory were mostly lying quietly in bed.

13,848. Did the disturbance come from those that were being put to bed?—Yes.

13,849. Was it putting them to bed that caused the row?—They move them from the side rooms into a padded cell, and to get them from one place to another causes trouble. When they slam the padded cell doors, they are very heavy, and there is a terrible clang as the door shuts.

13,850. Did the rooms open off the ward?—A dormitory opens on to the ward.

13,851. There is a day ward, I suppose?—No, in B. the ward is like a long street.

13,852. A corridor?—A long corridor, yes. In this ward there is a big sitting room just as you get into the corridor on the right hand side; opposite that there is a night dormitory, go straight on, and you pass little side rooms; further on still there is the door of this large dormitory; further on still are the padded cells.

13,853. How many of them were there?—There were three padded cells and about six side rooms; they all had bad cases in them.

13,854. When you were sleeping could you hear anybody who was shouting in any of the side rooms?—You could hear every sound that was in the ward.

13,855. Would you hear specially noises from the side rooms?—Yes, you could hear the noise from the side rooms, and you could hear the patients shouting when they were being given draughts.

13,856. And you found that very disturbing?—Very frightening.

13,857. Would you rather have been taken to some ward where there were no cases except quiet cases?—I would rather have been taken to a part where there were no people in uniform; the sight of these people in uniform frightened me very much, too. When you are in this fiery state the least little thing upsets you, and the white frilly bonnets of the nurses, the blue uniform and the white aprons, and these women walking about in dark dresses, the head attendants, give you a very terrifying feeling.

13,858. You think it was all so official?—Yes.

13,859. Earl Russell: More terrifying than seeing nurses in a hospital ward?—When you go into a hospital ward you are not in that state of mind, are you?

Earl Russell: True.

13,860. Chairman: That is rather a different question. In every institution, whether it is a school or an asylum or a hospital of any kind, a certain amount of officialism, I am afraid, is inevitable, is it not?—Yes.

13,861. And you must have, I suppose, for nurses some kind of costume?—Yes.

13,862. But it gave you the feeling of being in an institution?—Yes.

13,863. Some people resent that very much more than others; it is a matter of temperament to some extent, but you felt as if you had got into a place where you were in charge of officials?—Yes; I did not know what they were going to do to me.

13,864. So far as your own relations with these officials were concerned, the nurses and the various people in uniform, were they kind to you?—Quite kind; they did not interfere with me at all.

13,865. But you expect a little more than non-interference from nurses; you expect that they will help you or show you some of the kindness which most of us have experienced at the hands of nurses who take an interest in you in any way?—The only way to get on well with the nurses is to avoid them.

13,866. That is a very strong statement?—Not to be noticed by them, keep out of their way.

13,867. For instance, in the morning, did the nurse not ask you how you had slept?—Oh dear, no, they would not dream of such a thing.

13,868. Or if any medicine had been given you, did they not ask you how it had acted, or anything of that sort?—They did not mind in the least how it acted as long as you got it. If they had medicine to give, their one idea was to get it down your throat.

13,869. That is quite a serious matter, because you suggest that the attitude of the nurses was not sympathetic.—They found their amusement among themselves and they looked upon the patients as nuisances. I heard a charge nurse of the ward herself say that B. would not be so bad if it was not for the patients.

Mrs. M.

13,870. Then you did not get from the nurses that kind of attention which in an ordinary hospital patients get from the nurses?—Oh dear no; they were far too young, far too inexperienced and untrained.

13,871. So your point is not that they were actively unkind to you, but rather that they did not take an interest in you?—They were not the type of women to deal effectively with mental people.

13,872. You are telling us so admirably about the whole thing, if I may say so, that one may ask you this general question: there are people of different classes, naturally, in these wards?—Yes.

13,873. I can understand that a lady like yourself, well educated, and so on, naturally looks at life a little differently from other people who have not had those advantages. Some people may miss the attention more than you were missing, other people would miss that less. It is very difficult to get an attendant who is able to appreciate the minds of all the different kinds of patients and sympathise with them in the way best suited to each case, is it not?—Well, I do not think that I am of the class that you mention. I was born and brought up in what I call the slums of London, and I have taught in the slums of London, and I know the type of poor class very well, and I have always got on very well with them; so I do not think I was a sort of aristocratic person demanding special attention.

13,874. I am not suggesting that, but it is quite obvious from our interview with you, if I may say so, that you are a woman of education and therefore of sensibilities which one does not find always in every person. I mean people vary so much. Do you think that you perhaps suffered more just because of your greater sensibility?—No, I had not been used to more. I was motherless, and at my father's home he had housekeepers, and these women were just ordinary women.

13,875. Then you evidently got the feeling when you went in there that you were not being cared for?—I was not in the hands of people who knew anything about mental treatment.

13,876. And you were just, if I may put it so, resident in the place?—Yes, and keeping out of danger as much as possible.

13,877. Mr. Jowitt: Did it strike you that there were too few nurses—that they really had not got time to go round?—There were about seven nurses in that receiving ward, but they were all very young, and most of them had only been there about three months, except, of course, the head nurses. They were all jolly girls, having games among themselves.

13,878. Not troubling much about the patients—that was your impression really?—Quite.

13,879. Chairman: Now apart from the attitude of the nurses, are there any other things that you noticed in this ward which were unpleasant?—Yes.

13,880. I wish you would tell us; please be quite frank about everything. You may say anything you wish. Just tell us anything which struck you as unpleasant in your surroundings?—The very first thing they gave me on the Sunday morning was a dose of salts. I never need such things so I threw it under the bed, but I did not do it when the nurse was looking and they did not know I had done it. Beside my bed there was a commode and it was used by all these bed patients and by the people sitting in the dormitory and that was very unpleasant, the smell was very unpleasant.

13,881. Earl Russell: Why was that? Was there not lavatory accommodation adjoining this ward?—A very long way from that dormitory. In order to get to the lavatories the patients would have to be walked through the ward, and they never did it, they simply let them use this commode.

13,882. Chairman: During the day?—All day long. What I felt was they could have made a proper lavatory with a pull chain.

13,883. It was a very unpleasant bed?—It was right by the side of my bed.

13,884. Sir David Drummond: Was it emptied frequently?—They never emptied it until it was quite full, brimming over, and then it was always a patient who had to empty it, not a nurse. To see it go out was enough, and I thought it was very bad to see it go through the ward with all the patients there.

13,885. Chairman: Did the patients in this ward never go to the ordinary lavatory?—No, they were always forced to use the commode.

13,886. Earl Russell: Was the commode frequently full, or half-full, when the doctor visited the ward?—The doctor only visited the ward after breakfast and late in the evening.

13,887. He never came at uncertain times?—No, never; he always came just at the regular times.

13,888. And when he came he found this empty?—I could not say. I only know it was so appalling a smell that I had to put my head under the clothes.

13,889. Chairman: That seems a most unpleasant thing, if I may so. Was there anything else that struck you as defective in the arrangements?—I thought it was very unpleasant for a patient to have to lie in bed and see nurses kneeling on other women, and forcing china cups in between their teeth and pouring stuff down their throats; it was very frightening.

13,890. Were there many patients being forcibly given medicine?—There was one in each corner; I do not remember any others; but the woman on my right, they used to feed with milk; they simply used to kneel on her and pour it down her throat.

13,891. Of course, forcible feeding under any circumstances is a very unpleasant thing?—Yes, but they might have put a screen round the bed while they were doing it.

13,892. You did not like to see that going on?—No.

13,893. That distressed you also?—Yes.

13,894. You said that the nurses knelt on the patients. What do you mean by that?—One nurse stood at the side, and the other got on the bed over the patient.

13,895. That is a little different from actually kneeling on the patient?—Of course, you could not tell exactly where they were.

13,896. The nurse got on to the bed?—But she was across the patient.

13,897. And what you objected to was seeing these patients forcibly fed in your presence?—Yes.

13,898. About this dose of salts which you got: do you know who had prescribed it for you?—I do not know at all.

13,899. Did the nurse say you were to take it?—The nurse brought it to me and said "Drink this," and then she went away.

13,900. Mr. Jowitt: Do they prescribe these aperient medicines without knowing how frequently the bowels have been acting?—I only know they give you a dose of medicine once a week, every Monday morning, without any inquiry at all, every patient.

13,901. Mr. Snell: Was this on a Monday morning?—No, this was a Sunday morning, the first morning I was there.

13,902. Chairman: Ordinary Epsom salts?—It was a white mixture.

13,903. How did you know it was an aperient?—I just tasted it and I thought it was salts.

13,904. And you were not having any?—I was afraid to take it. I do not habitually use such things.

13,905. If you did not know what it was, it might have been some medicine to quieten your brain. You did not ask the nurse what it was?—No; they just hand you a thing and off they go. She said "Drink this," and went away.

13,906. Mr. Snell: Were you in an excited state then?—Not to anyone seeing me. Nobody would have known.

13,907. But there may have been a sedative of some kind in this?—I had not given any trouble at all. When I came into the ward on the Saturday afternoon they sat me down beside a radiator until there was a bed vacant; then they put me to bed, and I had not given any trouble at all.

13,908. Chairman: But, as Mr. Snell says, it might quite well have been that this medicine that was being given to you might have been a sedative to help to quieten your brain; but you did not know what it was at all?—I had no idea, but I used to have it offered me regularly once a week afterwards.

13,909. Earl Russell: And did you take it afterwards?—I never took it.

13,910. And you were never detected?—I used to put it in my mouth, and then go down to the lavatory and let it go down the sink, or else I would throw it away.

13,911. Chairman: But where was the lavatory that you used to go to?—The lavatory and the bathroom were quite close together.

13,912. I thought that all the patients used this commode, and did not go to a lavatory?—The commode was for all those dormitory patients, the 12 in bed, and there were many who were sitting in the ward.

13,913. The lavatory was used by the other patients who were up?—Yes.

13,914. Did you go to this other lavatory sometimes?—Not while I was in bed in the dormitory.

13,915. I understand. Was there anything else apart from this commode and the medicine that distressed you?—While I was sitting in the dormitory on my arrival there was a woman named H.; she was in bed and had got most lovely hair falling all over her shoulders; and she was quite lost; and she was calling out for her husband and her child, and the nurses said "Just hark at that beast H.; let us put her in the pads," and they took her out of bed and put her in the padded cell, and put me in that bed. It was very distressing to have this poor woman calling out for her husband and her child, and then to hear her being dragged out and put away somewhere.

13,916. Was she disturbing all the other patients?—Of course she was, but the patients in the beds had only just been admitted, and they were bad, but they were not actively resenting it; they had all got their own little troubles.

13,917. Mr. Snell: You suggest that she was removed to this padded room without a doctor's order?—Yes, "Let us put this beast H. in the pads." You do not hear those terms in a general hospital, do you?

13,918. Chairman: No, I should hope not. Was this patient, Mrs. H., violent at the time?—No, she was merely sitting up in bed calling out, calling out the names of her husband and child, as though she was puzzled; as though she did not know where they were.

13,919. It would have been quite a good thing to have taken her away to some place by herself (I do not say the way they did it was right) rather than let her disturb the other patients?—I hardly think it was right to put me in a dormitory where I was seeing so much.

13,920. I understand that, but if you are to separate the patients, you must take the ones that are noisy and violent and put them away from the others, must you not?—Yes.

13,921. And this patient was distressing you by her presence?—No, because she was so beautiful, and she was calling out in such a very nice manner; she was not upsetting me; it was not like a maniacal one.

13,922. At the same time, it distressed you emotionally?—It was distressing the nurses more than the patients.

13,923. Is there anything else about the arrangements of the place that struck you as calling for attention?—No, nothing else.

13,924. One point we understand you wished to refer to, and that was the removal of any patients who had died. Was there anything unpleasant about that?—Of course, I did not notice that till I was up.

13,925. That did not occur at this time?—No. I was in bed on the Sunday. I think I had better tell you one thing: I was admitted there on the Saturday; on the Sunday afternoon I was taken to the doctor's dormitory or ward, I think it was a little room, to be examined by the medical superintendent. I want to say something that I am afraid might sound rude.

13,926. Please do not mince matters in the least. —This medical superintendent at the time he examined me was far more mentally ill than I was myself; a fortnight afterwards he had a stroke, and he was away for many months; he only returned in order to finish up his work and resign; and he died a year afterwards. I really think that the medical superintendents and the mental experts of the asylums ought to be examined now and then, just to see in what state they are.

13,927. Now the doctor who examined you was the medical superintendent?—Yes.

13,928. What sort of examination did he make? This is a mental examination to find out what your state of mind is?—I can only say this: he was in a very old brown overcoat; he kept his bowler hat on; he had a little short cigarette in his mouth, and he kept walking in and out of the room muttering "Telephone, telephone." What he said to me I do not know, and I kept thinking who on earth can this man be? He asked me a few questions when he could contain himself and sit down; and then he got up again and muttered "Telephone." Then I was sent back to the dormitory. I quite expect you to think it is my delusion; but the fact that he did have a stroke and that he died, I think, confirms my statement. I may say that they gave me another examination later on, as I think they felt that the first examination was not good enough.

13,929. Who conducted the second examination?—Dr. S.

13,930. I have got in front of me what the medical superintendent wrote that day—that was the 6th November, the day that you were examined by him?—I am afraid that is not quite correct. It was the 2nd November; it was the day after I was admitted.

13,931. Earl Russell: On a Sunday?—On a Sunday; but I was seen later on by Dr. S.

13,932. Chairman: The original order was made in your case on the 1st of November, and all I have in front of me is the official statement that is made by the medical superintendent of an examination made of you. The date may not perhaps be so very important, but this is what he says about you. He had seen you and examined you, and you showed marked emotional apathy. He also said that you said: "By marrying her husband has deprived her of living a useful life and placed her in a position in which she is unable to use her talent. Is quite content to stop here all her life if we will keep her employed. Admits frequently threatening suicide, but says it was merely an expression of her weariness of her life and that she did not intend to commit the act. She is in fair health and condition." That looks, you know, like a fairly accurate representation of the state of matters, does it not?—I can only say that I am not responsible for what they write down.

13,933. No; but is it not very much what you would have said if you had wanted to describe your own state then?—One of my complaints is that they lead you on to make statements; they take statements away from the context, they put them down on the paper, and you do not know what they have said. They simply sit in front of you writing; they never read it over and say, "I have said this about you. Is it correct?" I think it is unfair.

13,934. But you must remember that all patients are not like you. There are a great many who are quite incapable of taking any interest in their affairs. Your mental ailment was of a different kind, and it had not deprived you of your intelligence. There are a great many patients to whom it would be quite idle to read over any statement?—Quite.

Mrs. M.

13,935. The difficulty is to know how far the particular patient you are dealing with is able to appreciate what you are saying?—Yes; but under no circumstances do they ever tell you what they are writing down about you—not even when you are well.

13,936. But one can imagine in some cases it might be unfortunate to tell a patient what the doctor had observed; it might be very upsetting?—Yes, but then it is so upsetting to be put into a lunatic asylum that why worry about little extra upsets?

13,937. Earl Russell: But you must remember that our own doctors when we are perfectly sane do not dream of telling us what they write in their case books about us?—No.

13,938. Chairman: It is a difficult thing, you know. You said that to be in any asylum is so bad that nothing can make it much worse?—No, you are ruined, are you not?

13,939. That is just the thing we want to try and prevent if we can. I do not know that we ought to tell every patient all that the doctor has said about them. However, you have told us your own experience. Then you remained in this ward for some time, I suppose, in bed?—No; I got up on the Monday. Dr. D. S. allowed me to get up on the Monday. That proves I am wrong. It was Dr. D. S. who examined me on the Sunday. She allowed me to get up on the Monday and go to the needle room; that is where all the best patients are; they do needlework.

13,940. Earl Russell: Still sleeping in this observation ward?—I was still in the middle dormitory.

13,941. Chairman: Were your nights or your sleep disturbed, when you slept there?—Very disturbed; you simply could not sleep, but at the same time it was very interesting.

13,942. Did you find when you were so upset that it was very distressing to be in a place of that kind with all the noise around you?—If I may speak, taking my whole stay in the asylum, I could speak generally. After I had been about four nights in that middle dormitory, I was removed to the end dormitory, where I was still under observation. There were eight of us in that room, and in that room the noise was simply terrible. I never had a night's sleep; there were patients in there making all sorts of noises, all sorts of swearing, moaning, groaning, having fits, having heart attacks. I used to be disturbed three times in a night sometimes.

13,943. Earl Russell: That was supposed to be an improved place?—Yes, it was in an improved place. One woman in the bed opposite to me had the most terrible epileptic fit that it was possible for anybody to have. Another time I was awakened up in the middle of the night and in another bed there was another patient saying "Oh dear, oh dear" in a strangled sort of voice, and I got out of bed and had a look at her. She looked so queer that I went and called the night nurse; the woman in bed was having a very bad heart attack. Another night another woman had another sort of fit. Then another night I was in bed fast asleep and I heard the night nurse call me by name, and I went out into the ward and she was struggling with a patient. She told me she had been struggling with this patient for an hour, and she hoped some of the relieving nurses would have come along and helped her, and she felt her strength gradually going. I helped her to get the patient back in bed. There was an old woman who slept in the bed beside me who was always singing to herself, singing hymns, but she could never lie down; she would sing and go off and fall sideways. I always had to watch in case she went on the floor. You never could get a night's rest in that dormitory at all.

13,944. Chairman: Was there a nurse attending to that dormitory at night?—No. There was a night nurse who sat opposite the middle dormitory by the fire, and she used to come round with a bull's eye lantern, I suppose, every hour. Then she would have someone come in and keep her company in the middle of the night, and then the head night attendant used to come through the ward.

13,945. And does that disturbance at night apply to all the time you were there?—I was in that observation ward for 17½ weeks; I was in that dormitory for a considerable time; the last 4½ months I was in the asylum I helped them every night regularly; the night nurses used to give me a cup of tea every morning for helping them.

13,946. Earl Russell: Still in this bad dormitory?—In the bad dormitory for the last 4½ months I was there.

13,947. Was that because they had no better place to move you to, or why?—I think as my story goes on you will hear the reason why I was there.

13,948. Chairman: Now I think you might tell us about this incident of removing dead patients, which seems to have impressed you?—There was a large window. Every now and then you would hear a very terrifying whistle blown. When the nurse heard that whistle she had to go outside into the courtyard, walk down a little path and open a wooden door, and then some man, a male attendant, with male patients, would come through with a stretcher and the nurse would let them into the corridor; then the whistle would blow again, and that was the attendants going off with the corpse. The male patients would carry the stretcher on their shoulders. The corpse would be simply lightly covered over; sometimes there would be two on it, and you could see them wobbling; that was taking the bodies to the mortuary. This whistle made you all look; you simply went to the window and looked out. I used at first to bury my head in my hand, but I got quite used to it.

13,949. Did it happen often?—Almost every day. There were about 2,000 patients in that asylum, and I was there all through the winter.

13,950. Mrs. Mathew: How many nurses were there in the ward?—In that ward there were seven nurses.

13,951. Chairman: Of course, they would not all be on duty at the same time?—I think so; it was the receiving ward, and there were about 60 patients.

13,952. Now there is another matter you might tell us a little about. What about the bathing arrangements?—Of course they were very bad. We had to line up in a queue directly after dinner and have our bath, and the bath room would be crowded with people either drying themselves or waiting to get in and have their turn in the bath.

13,953. Was there a bath every day?—No, once a week.

13,954. All on the same day?—All in that ward. The old women, and the bed cases, were all bathed before breakfast, and the walking patients were bathed after two o'clock.

13,955. Were none of the bed patients bathed in the beds?—I never saw them.

13,956. Was the only all-over wash once a week?—Once a week, yes.

13,957. Earl Russell: How many would there be in this queue all together?—Directly dinner was over the charge nurse would call out: "Ladies for the bath," and we would all have to line up.

13,958. How many would that come to?—I suppose there would be 40.

13,959. Mr. Jowitt: Is that a hip bath or a long bath?—A long bath; but I have heard there have been an extra number of baths added since.

13,960. Chairman: Was that at the other end of the ward?—You had to go straight on past the dormitory, past the padded cells, and then you turned into a little sort of room.

13,961. Was there any accommodation for undressing and dressing again?—None at all; you simply dropped your clothes in the ward—that is, the corridor.

13,962. Earl Russell: What did you go to the bath in?—Nothing.

Mrs. M.

13,963. Not even a towel?—They allowed five towels for the whole of the 40. The first five would get a towel and be able to put it round them, and the rest would have to go on as they were. Some of the patients used to get an old nightdress and put it round them.

13,964. Do you mean you were all stark naked in the file?—A lot would undo their clothing and wait until the last moment, drop it off and then make a run for it.

13,965. Chairman: Was any order preserved? With two baths and 40 or 50 people waiting for them, I should think it is rather a difficult thing to manage.—And a very tiny bathroom, too; it was a big crush.

13,966. Sir David Drummond: Did they use the same water?—No, they always emptied it and gave each patient fresh water. There were two nurses in charge.

13,967. Earl Russell: Did the women object to going about in this way?—The women did not think about it.

13,968. Why—because they did not mind?—You had to do what you were told, and if you made a fuss then you had a paraldehyde draught—you were not so well.

13,969. You had to sink your modesty at the risk of a black draught?—Yes.

13,970. Mr. Snell: Is your memory right, do you think, about the same towels being used for patients who had infectious diseases?—I have had a talk with the charge nurse of that ward and she agrees with me on the matter.

13,971. That is to say, you feel your memory is quite right on that point?—I feel that when I say there was no clothing, we all wore the same clothing and all that sort of thing—

13,972. I am talking about towels?—I think I am quite correct, because I discussed it with the charge nurse, and she agreed.

13,973. Earl Russell: Apart from dirt, you said there were only five towels, and by the time they had been used over and over again I suppose they would be wet?—They call them bath sheets; it is just the size of an ordinary bath towel; it was not made of fluffy material; it was more like sheeting. I always tried to be one of the first five so that I had a dry towel. If you were not one of the first five you had a very wet towel to dry yourself with; in fact, you could not get dry.

13,974. Chairman: Just to turn aside from that for a moment, what clothes had you at this time?—No clothing except what the asylum provided.

13,975. What sort of clothing was that?—The clothing was very good; it was very warm, but you could not wear it without looking a lunatic. For instance, on the first Sunday I was allowed to go to church I had thick heavy boots, pale blue stockings, a very thick stuff dress, a shawl such as you see in the side streets of London, and a straw hat; and they sent me back because I had got no ribbon round my hat; they would not let me go to church.

13,976. You suggest that it makes you look rather a figure of fun?—Yes.

13,977. Mrs. Mathew: How about your hair?—You were never allowed hairpins, so it made it very difficult. You had to do your hair up in two plaits and fix it across your head; plait one plait into the other.

13,978. Was that the rule?—Yes; no hairpins were allowed at all.

13,979. What about hair brushes?—I never saw such a thing. I did see one, but then you would not dream of using one brush that was used by 40 other patients.

13,980. So you used none at all?—No. I had a comb of my own.

13,981. Sir Ernest Hiley: Did you never have a hair brush all the time you were there?—Never, all the time I was there.

13,982. Mr. Micklem: Were you what is called a private patient?—My husband paid whatever they asked him. He has told me that he was charged a guinea each time the doctor looked at me, and he had to pay £5 for the taxi that took me to B., but I am still a pauper lunatic.

13,983. Was he paying so much a week?—So much a month.

13,984. Earl Russell: He had to pay for your being taken to the asylum?—He had to pay £5 for the taxi that took me to the asylum.

13,985. Mr. Micklem: And then he had to pay every month so much?—Yes. It started at a reasonable figure, and then went up.

13,986. Chairman: Had you a toothbrush?—Not till I asked for one.

13,987. Did you get one then?—I got one then, yes.

13,988. On the question of clothes, the clothes evidently were not a uniform—very far from being a uniform?—Why?

13,989. Because they were mixed garments of all kinds. I mean there was not one regular uniform for all the patients?—No.

13,990. They were miscellaneous clothes?—Yes.

13,991. Did you just take your chance of what you got?—When you went to bed at night you had to take your clothes off, fold them up in a heap, and leave them outside the dormitory door. Your underclothing went to wash once a week, and you were simply dealt out underclothing.

13,992. Earl Russell: Outside your dormitory door; you mean you never left them near your bed?—No.

13,993. You undressed at your bed, took the whole lot out, and put them at the door?—You laid them in a pile at the bottom of the bed, and the nurse took them out for you in some cases; if not, you took them out yourself.

13,994. Chairman: Are you quite sure you got your own clothes back in the morning?—Yes, otherwise the patients would have made a big fuss.

13,995. The description of the costume you have given us strikes me as very odd. Why should they provide pale blue stockings?—Yes, that is just it.

13,996. Did you ever ask for any of the small comforts to which no doubt you are accustomed—I mean tooth-powder or anything for the toilet?—No, I never asked for anything. You were glad if you were allowed to live, let alone anything of that sort.

13,997. Did you feel that you must not ask for things, and so on?—Oh, yes.

13,998. That was the impression you got from the atmosphere of the place?—I got the impression that the quieter you kept, the better.

13,999. Earl Russell: What about pocket handkerchiefs?—I never saw any.

14,000. What did you do if you wanted to blow your nose?—For one thing, they never got colds there; I never had a cold the whole time I was there.

14,001. Even if you had not a cold, you sometimes have to blow your nose. You say there were no pocket handkerchiefs?—I never heard of a handkerchief; I do not ever remember such a thing.

14,002. Sir Ernest Hiley: The whole twelve months you were there you never had a handkerchief?—I cannot remember one. You never had a pocket unless you made one yourself and tied it on; there were no pockets in your dress.

14,003. Chairman: Had you no little personal treasures that you kept to yourself?—No, they never allowed you to keep anything. If you had any parcels or any food it had to be put in the storeroom, and then it was often taken by other people. There were only two little shelves where patients could put their belongings, and the charge nurse used to go and clear those out and burn all the things; and the patients used to grumble about it very terribly.

14,004. Supposing you had had something sent to you by your husband; suppose he had sent you a cake or some fruit, had you no place where you could keep it?—Nowhere at all.

14,005. You would have had to give it to the nurse?—Yes.

21 March, 1925.]

Mrs. M.

14,006. If you did, would she keep it for you and see that you got it?—She would put it on the shelf, and the nurses' pet would help herself to it.

14,007. Who was the "nurses' pet"?—She was a patient, and she was a very strong girl; she used to help the nurses. She was not very much liked by the nurse in charge, but the other nurses used, to like her very much, because she was so strong and powerful and could help them; she was only a young girl about 16, and a very fat girl; she used to have all the powers of a nurse. If she saw a patient with anything she wanted, she would simply swoop down on the patient and snatch it away. I have often gone past the store-room door and have seen her helping herself there. Whenever I had a parcel I used to share it out at once so that she could not get it.

14,008. Would not it have been an advantage if you had had some little place beside your bed where you could keep things?—There ought to be some lockers, I think, in the ward, and each patient allowed a locker with a little key, where she could keep her own little treasures.

14,009. Earl Russell: We have heard of an asylum where they have cupboards with glass doors in the wards.—That would only be in a very good ward, because glass attracts some people and they break it.

14,010. Chairman: And even then I suppose if some patients had a key they might try to swallow it?—They might; but you would not give a locker to a patient like that.

14,011. A great deal depends upon the state of the patients. I was in an institution some time ago where they told me that some of the patients were so trusted that the staff did not even open their parcels. That all depends upon their experience of the patient. In your case, for example, would it have been a comfort to you if you had had some place in which you could have kept your personal things?—Yes, such as letters; all my husband's letters were flung in the fire one day; I very much resented that.

14,012. Earl Russell: And you must remember that there are other patients who might steal things from patients who had lockers?—Yes.

14,013. Sir David Drummond: You were not compelled to wash in the bath, were you?—You had to step into the bath, and the nurse soaped your head and rubbed your head, and then she poured the bath water over your head, and then you got out.

14,014. Earl Russell: Did you not take a piece of soap in your hands?—She did not give much time for that; she just washed your head.

14,015. Mr. Snell: It was a case of walking in and walking out?—Yes.

14,016. Chairman: When you came out, if you were lucky you got a dry towel; if not, a wet one; and you say those towels were used by all the patients?—Yes.

14,017. Mr. Jowitt: What was the morning wash like?—That was very bad, too; there were about four little wash bowls. There was certainly hot and cold water, and you just sluiced your face.

14,018. That was in the same place where the bath was?—Yes.

14,019. Chairman: Did you get soap then?—No.

14,020. Mr. Jowitt: Did you have your clothes on as a rule when you went there?—You just washed your face and hands, and you could not do that very thoroughly, because there were so many patients waiting to be washed.

14,021. Earl Russell: You could not even wash your neck, if you had your clothes on?—No; you had all your clothes on.

14,022. Chairman: Were some of the patients who were sharing these bathing arrangements with you suffering from disease?—Yes.

14,023. Could you see that yourself?—Yes; a woman named M. and another named W.

14,024. Were they suffering from unpleasant diseases?—They were.

14,025. Could you see it?—I did not see those two, because in that ward I was always one of the last to be bathed. I only saw a patient with it when I was in the infirmary ward, and I was taken out of bed to be bathed, and the patient who had that disease was in the bath and was shrivelling with being exposed; then I saw all the black spots on her body with red inflammation round them.

14,026. With regard to the towels that were used, can you tell us whether the towel that was used to dry that patient was used for other patients?—I could not tell you anything about it.

14,027. Earl Russell: Did they allow you sanitary towels when required?—No, never.

14,028. Chairman: Did you have to take a bath at these times just as at other times?—Yes. I may say that I believe there were some sanitary towels in the ward, but they were never given out to the patients, and I really never knew about them till I was just going home.

14,029. Did you ever ask for them?—I was told they were not there when I first got there; you could not have them at all; the point being, I suppose, that some patients would have strangled themselves with them. Every night before you went to bed they used to take away your hair tape, garters, and false teeth, and then the nurse used to call out for glass eyes and wooden legs; that was her humour. They used to take those things away because, I suppose, at some time somebody had done something.

14,030. It is a difficulty really, because some of the patients would require very strict supervision; others could be trusted more?—Yes.

14,031. Earl Russell: False teeth are very dangerous things, even to sane people?—Yes.

14,032. Chairman: I should really infer, from what you have been telling us, that there should be more classification amongst the patients, and those who, like yourself and others in the same condition, could have been trusted up to a point should have had more consideration. The strict measures you have spoken of may be very necessary in some cases?—Yes.

14,033. What you are saying rather indicates that there should be more individual consideration of the case, more study of the case, and classification of the case?—Yes.

14,034. And that the privileges and rights and so on should be graded to meet the different cases?—Yes.

14,035. Mr. Micklem: When you were in this observation ward during all these weeks, were you examined at all by a doctor?—I was seen by Dr. D. S. on the Sunday. Then according to that, I must have been seen the following Sunday by the medical superintendent. My husband was away at sea when I was put away, and he got leave and he came home. He went and saw the relieving officer, but the relieving officer told him it was no good going to B., as they would not allow him to see me, but I think he communicated with B., and as a result Dr. S. was put to examine me. But this is what I rather object to—I had been working in the needle room all the morning; someone put their hand on my shoulder and beckoned me into a room where there was a tall man in grey. They do not tell you who it is or what is wanted. They simply begin talking to you, and then you are sent out, and you do not know any more, why it is or what has happened. This doctor asked me questions really about my husband.

14,036. Was that the only time you were examined?—I did not see anyone else.

14,037. Did not the doctors visit the observation ward every day?—Yes, morning and evening.

14,038. On those occasions when they came in the morning and evening would not you speak to them, or would not they speak to you?—No; they would simply walk along with the head nurse, talking to her.

14,039. You do not mean that they just came into the ward and passed through it, do you?—That is all they did. If they happened to pass a patient quite near they would say "Good morning" to her, but if you were out of the way they did not run after you.

14,040. Chairman: Did the doctors not take any special notice of a patient unless the nurse drew attention to her?—They only took special notice of bed cases.

14,041. I suppose if the nurse had said, "This patient had a seizure in the night" the doctor would pay attention to that case; he relied on the nurse?—Yes.

14,042. And such a case would, I suppose, be attended to by the doctor?—Yes, I suppose so.

14,043. But if nothing happened, and just the ordinary routine was going on, he merely said "Good morning"?—Simply "Good morning"; but he did not take the trouble to find out if he was saying "Good morning" to everybody.

14,044. Earl Russell: Were there many bed sores among the women patients?—No, they are very well looked after.

14,045. Chairman: Did you say you were examined by a Dr. S.?—Yes.

14,046. How long was that after you were there?—I should say about three weeks after.

14,047. We find a good many notes about your case?—Yes, by Dr. D. S. at first.

14,048. These notes must have been made after seeing you, so that Dr. D. S. must from time to time have had a talk with you?—That is right. I think you are seen by her in a room each month until the third month.

14,049. There are quite a number of notes about your case at short intervals during this time, obviously from observation of you?—Yes.

14,050. Now you had quite a lot of visits, I notice?—Yes.

14,051. Have you any complaint to make about the visits, the admission of your relatives or friends?—Yes; my father used to be kept waiting.

14,052. I see you really had a tremendous lot of visits. You had 73 visits paid to you by your friends and relatives, and 13 people came to you at different times?—Yes. I have got a brother; he is my youngest brother; he is married; he was very much upset when I was put into B., and he fought very hard for me to get me out all the time I was in there. If he had been allowed to do it at first, he would have been my worst enemy; but eventually he really saved me from lifelong imprisonment in B.

14,053. But the fact that you had so many visits as 73 in less than a year suggests to me that your friends and relatives could come and see you pretty freely?—This brother of mine organised the visits; he knew all my own friends and relatives, and he used to write to them and say, "Now will you go on such and such a Sunday?" He booked them all up, so I was never left a week without a visitor; and he arranged that every one of them wrote to me on a certain day of the week, so that on every day of the week I had letters.

14,054. So that you were kept very well in touch with the outside world?—By this brother, yes.

14,055. I do not think you can really complain that you were being shut out from the world so far as your friends and relatives were concerned?—This is the point; when those people had visited me, and I wrote thanking them for their visit, or if I wrote to my friends at all, the letters were interfered with; they were either totally suppressed or else they were sent to my father. My father had just retired; he was at H., so the letters used to be sent from B. to my father's London address, they would be forwarded to H., and then sent on. That caused great delay. Then my father wrote and complained about it. He said he did not want the letters sent to him. I have Dr. D. S.'s reply to that. Then she used to send the letters to my husband, half to my husband and half to my father.

One letter I wrote in B. to Wapping went to Constantinople, then it went to London, then it went to H., and then at last reached my friend in Wapping.

14,056. What sort of letters were you writing at this time?—After I had been in the asylum for 17½ weeks my brain had quite righted itself. I knew I had control of my brain and was quite all right. I felt if only I could go away to the seaside for a couple of months I would be completely recovered. So when I made a request to Dr. D. S. and said, "I now feel quite better, and would like to go home," she merely looked at me. I waited a little while, and did not hear anything. So I wrote a letter and asked why I was being detained. I again said I felt quite well, and should like to go home. No notice was taken of that letter. I did not know what to do to occupy myself, but I had thought a lot about the asylum. I wrote a letter to my brother, and I said that that week there had been ten fresh cases brought in, and nine of them were returned cases. I said, "There are patients in this asylum who have been here 10, 20, 30 or 40 years. Does not it seem a pity to keep them so long in one place? Would it not be better to send them to another asylum after five years? Perhaps the change would be beneficial." I wrote that letter thinking it was a letter of helpful criticism, and that Dr. D. S. would send for me and ask me for my views on the subject. Instead of that, I was sent to a refractory ward. I told my brother when he came and saw me. He complained to Dr. D. S. The next morning she came to the refractory ward and said, "How dare you tell your brother you have been placed in a refractory ward? It is the best ward in the building. It has plaster walls." I said, "What about the plaster walls? We are not allowed to make a cup of tea in this ward; we are not allowed to go out of the ward. We have got the worst courtyard; and look at the patients around me." She simply said, "You are a liar," and walked on.

14,057. Did you not get on very well with Dr. D. S.?—Up to that moment I had got on quite well with her, but it was the letter of criticism: instead of taking it in a generous spirit and wanting to know about it, she took it in the wrong way.

14,058. Was that the first time you had been sent to the refractory ward?—The first time. I had been in the receiving ward.

14,059. Had you complained to your father, brother, or husband of the treatment you had been getting in any way?—Not up to then.

14,060. Do you remember when this was?—About the end of February, 1920.

14,061. That is rather interesting, because we have here a letter from your father to Dr. D. S. written at that time. You do not mind my referring to it?—Certainly not.

14,062. He says, "Letter for Lieutenant M."—that is your husband—"received with thanks. You were very good to stop its transmission, because I am sure he would have been very much upset at its contents." What does that mean?—I can tell you what that means. I knew I had recovered. When I was put into B. Asylum I felt it was the end of my life as it had been run. We had married, and had been very, very happy. Then this trouble had come, and when I got into the asylum my husband would never have dreamt of taking any word of mine. He would always have gone to the doctors to have asked the doctors their opinion of me. He believes in constituted authority. He would not have dreamt of questioning me about the place. If I had said anything, he would have looked upon it as a delusion. I got very angry with him, because I knew I was better, and I had asked him to take me out. I do not know whether he had been to see me, but I had asked him to take me out, and he said, "You are quite all right. You are going on all right." I could never get an answer, and I got rather angry. I thought that when I came out he would have his own opinions of me; he would never believe that I was sane. I wrote to the Admiralty—I would not do such a thing now—and I said I was going to separate from my husband, and I wanted them to make him make me an allowance.

14,063. Your father was probably very wise not to send that on?—Quite; I am very glad he did not.

14,064. Earl Russell: Were you on good terms with your husband before you went in?—Quite.

14,065. And are you since you came out?—Absolutely.

14,066. Chairman: It is only fair to say this. In this letter to Dr. D. S. your father goes on, “Mrs. M. speaks very highly of your care.” Had you been telling your father that Dr. D. S. had shown care and devotion to your needs?—I had had no complaint whatever to make about Dr. D. S. up to then.

14,067. Your father is writing to Dr. D. S., and it rather suggests that you had been saying to your father, when he had been visiting you, that Dr. D. S. had been giving you great care and devotion?—Yes, but you will see another letter farther on.

14,068. At this stage this was true, was it?—I think he would write that sort of thing to anybody. For instance, when I was a school teacher he would go up and see the headmistress and say, “She is very fond of you.”

14,069. He was a bit of a diplomatist, perhaps, was he?—Yes.

14,070. But you know your brother also writes?—Which brother?

14,071. A.?—Yes.

14,072. Is he the brother who organised the visits?—Yes.

14,073. This brother writes also to Dr. D. S.: “Dear Madam, My sister, Mrs. M., speaks so highly of you that I feel I must write and thank you for all the kindness you have shown to her whilst under your care; it takes a great load off me to know that you take such an interest in her, and I do hope that the time will soon come when you will recommend her discharge.” There is your brother writing to Dr. D. S. saying that you have been speaking highly of the kindness shown to you?—I think that was diplomacy as well.

Mr. Snell: Were these letters before this incident?

14,074. Chairman: I think they were. This was in February. (To the witness): One must of course hold the balance, as you can understand, in this investigation?—Yes.

14,075. It looks to me rather, both from your father's and brother's letters at this time, that you had been actually complimenting Dr. D. S. on her care for you?—Yes.

14,076. That letter is rather different from what you have been suggesting, namely, that you had been neglected—I mean neglected by the doctor?—You ought to have my father and brother here and ask them exactly what I have said.

14,077. That is a fair observation, if I may say so. This is all we have in front of us?—I say that she behaved like one lady to another up to that time.

14,078. But you want more than that. Did she behave as a doctor to a patient—which is another relationship altogether?—Or as a mental expert to an insane person?

14,079. If you please?—I can only say she walked through the ward, and she was civil. She had got these Girl Guides, which I thought was a very good movement, and she had me to drill the Girl Guides; she let me be one of them, really. She asked me to give them a lecture on the Union Jack, so that they could get some little badge which they get—the “Tenderfoot,” it is called. I had helped her with these Girl Guides a lot; I had nothing whatever to complain about. If I had been allowed to go home when I asked, I should have no more to complain about than any woman who goes into a general hospital, and who, although she may have a minor illness herself, has to see a lot of very dreadful cases.

14,080. That is very fairly put. Now let us pick up the story in February. You had written these criticisms, and you say that Dr. D. S. did not like her place being criticised?—No; she had been there so long.

14,081. Was there no other reason at all why you were sent to this refractory ward?—I had put criticisms into a lot of letters, about the bathing and so on, and I generally put these criticisms into the form of a poem.

14,082. Mrs. Mathew: Do you remember when you were sent to this refractory ward—at what date?—No; I can only say it was about the 24th February; I should think.

14,083. Mr. Micklem: I suppose your brother did not keep the letter? You have not got the letter that you wrote then, have you?—It never got out of the asylum then.

14,084. Chairman: There are quite a number of people, you know, who think that poets ought to be punished?—Yes.

14,085. Mr. Micklem: How do you know that the letter did not get out of the asylum?—Because my brother kept every letter from me, and he has not got that one.

14,086. Chairman: You do not happen to have any letter that you wrote at this time, do you?—I have crowds of letters that I wrote when I was in the asylum; my brother kept them all, and when I got out of the asylum I asked him for them.

14,087. Have you any here?—Yes, I have a lot here.

14,088. Have you any written about this time—in February?—I will see if I can find them.

14,089. Mr. Jowitt: These were sent by you to your brother?—Yes, these got out, but they went a round-about way; they were often three weeks before they reached my father.

14,090. Mrs. Mathew: Did they open your letters to your father?—Yes, and those to my husband as well. You had to write your letter, put it in an envelope, leave the envelope open, and then the charge nurse came and sat amongst you and then she simply undid all the letters and read them all through. Any letters with criticisms in them she put on one side, and gave to the doctor, and the doctor interviewed you about them.

14,091. Earl Russell: She read them there and then, did she?—Then and there in front of all the patients.

14,092. Did she ever make complaints to you about what had been said in the letters?—No; only one letter in which I criticised the bathing; I saw her taking it round to all the other nurses and showing it to them, and I heard one nurse say to her, “So you have sealed it up?” and she said, “Yes, I have sealed it up and sent it.” Here are some of the letters I wrote at the time—(handing in the same).

14,093. Chairman: I am rather interested in this. You wrote your letters, they were read by the nurses, and then those which contained any criticism or complaint were put on one side and handed to the doctor?—You had to appear before the doctor the next morning, and she criticised it.

14,094. That is rather important, because it shows that if any patient is making a complaint it is brought to the notice of the doctor, and that is desirable, of course?—Is it? Not for the patient! The head attendant said to me, “What good do you think you are doing by making all these complaints? Every one you make puts you back months.”

14,095. That of course depends upon whether the complaints are truthful or not. I could imagine a person making all kinds of complaints which had no foundation at all, which would be an indication that that person's mind was distraught?—The food was very, very bad; there was no delusion about the food. The soup consisted of warm water. There was bully beef on Monday, and the suet pudding they gave you was so hard you could not get your teeth in it. Their meat was boiled in water; you rarely ever got a cut from the joint, and then it was so cold and so hard you could neither cut it nor bite it. On one occasion I sewed my Sunday dinner to a piece of paper, put the potato peelings in an envelope, and sent it home.

14,096. Earl Russell: Did it get home?—I was interviewed by the doctor.

14,097. Sir David Drummond: Was your general health good all the time you were there?—My physical health was quite good.

14,098. You never suffered from colds?—No.

14,099. You never had sore throats?—They said I did on one occasion.

14,100. Do you mean you had not?—I do not know exactly what was supposed to be the matter with me at the time, but we will come to that later.

14,101. Chairman: You seem to have increased in weight?—Yes. I was very much run down when I got into the asylum.

14,102. You made a considerable gain during this time?—What about the parcels and the visitors?

14,103. They may have helped. You said that you had written a letter criticising the methods and saying that patients should be removed to other institutions from time to time?—Yes, I think those were the main things.

14,104. What was the nature of the ward you were moved into—the refractory ward?—The women patients were human tigresses; that is all you could call them. They were very strong women physically. They were kind-hearted, very generous, but at the same time they were wild; they had been shut up for many years, nearly all of them. It was really an unusual thing for anybody to be sent to M.8 ward. They were not insane. I can say now that nine out of every ten of those women ought to have been in their own homes, but they were women whose own friends and relatives had neglected them, and that had made them very, very vicious. They were women who had got spirit, and they would not be crushed. There was one nurse in charge of them, and she got on with them very well, but if she was away and there was some other nurse on, that nurse had a very bad time of it, because she told them to do the work and they refused to do it. They were also very insulting to Dr. D. S. I am afraid she rather enjoyed their insults, because she had power to detain them there.

14,105. Earl Russell: When you speak of human tigresses, they are not the sort of people one would wish to let loose upon the world at large?—You cannot keep adult human beings in confinement. You cannot take adult animals and put them in any zoo and expect them to thrive. They will knock themselves against the bars. You cannot take human beings and shut them up like that. They are put to bed every night at seven.

14,106. When you say they are tigresses, it is due to their indignation at being shut up?—Yes. Every privilege that it was possible to give a patient was stopped. You were never allowed to make a cup of tea in that ward, and that is a great privilege when you live on asylum tea.

14,107. Mrs. Mathew: You got your tea in parcels, I suppose?—Yes.

14,108. Chairman: You would require to get a teapot and cup for yourself?—I never had my own teapot, but somebody used to lend me one; some people had teapots and no tea.

14,109. Mr. Mickle: When you had these visitors seeing you, where did they see you?—On the whole, down in the visiting hall, and I was usually searched before I was allowed to go down there.

14,110. Were you taken down by one of the nurses?—Yes.

14,111. Would you see your visitors quietly and privately?—Quite all right—except when we come to later on.

14,112. Chairman: By this time, in February, you felt you had regained your control and you wanted to get back to the world again?—I did.

14,113-14. You were seeing, about this time, relatives of yours—seeing your brother and your father and your friends, and so on. Did you tell them that you were now feeling much better?—Yes, I told them all; but that is the trouble. Once I was a lunatic they would never believe me, except my one brother, but the more I complained to my father the more he thought I was suffering from delusions. He had been taking people himself to county asylums for many years, and to private asylums, as a relieving officer. He would believe anything of a private asylum, but he thought county asylums were the best places on earth. He had simply taken patients to the entrance hall of the asylum, and thought he knew all that went on in the wards; and I really think he felt his dignity insulted when I complained about the things that went on in the ward. He said, "Do not you think I know about these places?"

14,115. You think he had the official mind, if I may so put it?—He had the official mind.

14,116. Your brother took a different view about it?—He believed me.

14,117. And your friends and relatives, seeing you, would have a chance of judging of your state, and I suppose you had quite sensible talks with them?—Yes.

14,118. Did they then proceed to make any effort to get you restored to them?—I do not know what efforts my father, my husband, and my eldest brother made at all, because they did not confide in me, but I know my brother A. continually wrote; he simply made himself a nuisance to them.

14,119. Earl Russell: You say they did not confide in you. You have been out some time now. Have you not asked your husband about what efforts he did make?—My husband has asked me to let it be a sealed book; he will not let me speak about it.

14,120. Chairman: Your brother A. was doing his best to get you out?—Yes.

14,121. In consequence of the letters he wrote, were you not interviewed by the medical superintendent or anybody?—He was away ill.

14,122. Then the doctor in charge?—Dr. S., never. He used to come through the wards on a Sunday morning while the medical superintendent was ill, but he was a very fine-looking, tall man, and you would not have gone up and spoken to him. He simply walked through.

14,123. But in your case you were obviously recovering, and your relatives—your brother, was drawing the attention of the authorities of this place to the fact that you were a case that ought to be considered for discharge. Do you mean to say that no step was taken by any person in that institution to have you examined, in view of that representation that had been made?—I feel that any effort my brother A. made was of no avail, because my father was the petitioner.

14,124. Your father really had taken you there?—Yes.

14,125. And there were cross-purposes in the family: one saying "She ought to be there" and the other saying "She ought not to be there"?—Quite.

14,126. The two views cancelled each other in the minds of the doctors, I suppose?—Yes.

14,127. But in point of fact you were not specially examined in consequence of your brother's representations?—No.

14,128. Now were you taken to this refractory ward entirely in consequence of your writing a letter of complaint? Can you not think of anything else that brought it about?—I know of nothing else that could have caused it, but it happened the very day the doctor got the letter.

14,129. How long were you there?—I was only there about 2½ weeks.

14,130. What did you do while you were there; did any incidents happen?—No. There was nothing whatever to do, but the ward was in a very dirty state because these women refused to do work. They said if they could work there they could work in their own homes. I am rather fond of housework. I cleaned up the bath taps and polished the floors. I was so afraid of the women I was amongst, that I was glad to do something so that I did not have to look at them.

Mrs. M.

14,131. Where did you sleep?—There was a dormitory there, and there was absolutely no light in it; it was February, and it was pitch dark when we went to bed. We had to undress in the corridor and put our clothes in a pile on a chair, and then walk quite naked into the bedroom, get our nightdresses, and then get into bed; it was pitch dark, and very, very cold. There were seven other women in that ward. There was one woman swearing terribly; there was a woman talking to herself; and after we were locked in, with no nurse, a woman kept getting out of bed and I could hear her in the darkness pushing her bed across the floor. That was very terrifying. My hair went white that night. I have a white patch on my hair. When my brother came to see me, he said "Whatever is the matter with your hair"?"

14,132. Do you mean to say the place was locked up at night with these violent patients in it and no nurse in charge?—No nurse in charge. They came round during the night—two of them. They shut the door, and it bolted on the outside. I always wondered what would happen if a fire occurred.

14,133. Or if one of the patients had started assaulting another, what would have happened?—I leave it to your imagination. There was one woman taken ill in the middle of the night, she had to use the chamber, and the stench was simply awful, and of course it was never removed till the morning.

14,134. Do the nurses not come round at intervals?—They would not interfere with a thing like that. They have to get over their ground; they could not stop to do anything of that sort.

14,135. Earl Russell: Was there no bell for ringing for a nurse if one were wanted?—I do not know of any, and I did not know of any at the time.

14,136. Chairman: Perhaps you may be a little wrong in your dates, because the record we have shows that you were removed to this refractory ward on the 25th March?—That is a later one; there is another refractory ward. I do not think Dr. D. S. recognised this ward as a refractory ward.

14,137. You have described it as that?—But it was a refractory ward, all the same. She always declared it was not a refractory ward.

14,138. It is only fair just to tell you this from the other point of view. On the 23rd March there is an entry about you that you were noisy, singing, calling out, and very defiant?—That is later on, Sir.

14,139. Later than February?—Yes, later than that.

14,140. On the 23rd March you were very defiant, and announced you were going to break every rule possible. Do you remember that?—We are in the M.8 ward now. That is the refractory ward that Dr. D. S. says is not a refractory ward. I was there 2½ weeks. I continued writing letters of criticism because I felt that her attitude towards me was a very unjust one, and the fact that she resented the criticisms did not mean that the criticisms were wrong; it meant she was wrong. I continued writing these letters. After 2½ weeks I was removed to the infirmary ward, and was put in a side room of it at the end of the infirmary ward. I do not know why I was put in there, but I thought at the time they imagined I was going to have some infectious complaint, because the nurse was told that no patient was to go near me, I was not to speak to any patient, I was not to be allowed to write, and was only to have a book to read, so I thought I was going to be ill.

14,141. How long were you in this infirmary ward?—I was in that ward, I suppose, for another two weeks.

14,142. We have got into March by this time?—Yes.

14,143. What happened in March? Because it seems that in March your conduct was violent?—In connection with that infirmary ward I am going to tell you something that is rather startling. A woman in October of 1919 had been lying asleep on the floor of the padded cell. She had been given a draught. This is the woman I said I was going to tell you about who was in the corner bed when I was in R. Infirmary. She was taken to the infirmary ward, she was given a draught, and she fell asleep, and while she was lying asleep on the floor of the padded cell, rats came in and ate her face. The report of the inquest is in the "E. Chronicle" for February 6th. She did not die till three months afterwards. While I was in my little side room in the infirmary ward I heard rats creeping around the wainscoting. My eldest brother had been to see me, and had brought me a lot of food, which I suppose had attracted them. I told the nurse I could hear rats. Later on, when she put the bull's-eye lantern on, of course one could not hear them, but when it was dark I heard them. I felt I did not want to stop there and have my face eaten; so I picked up my mattress, went out of the side room, put it across the corridor, and went to sleep there. The nurse in charge came along and ordered me back into the room. I said I was comfortable where I was; the doctor was sent for, and I was taken back to the receiving ward. I have had to compress all that in my précis. Dr. D. S. was very annoyed with me, and with another thing as well. She had ordered me not to write—

14,144. Did you explain to the doctor that you were taking your bed out into the corridor because you were annoyed by the rats?—Of course I told her; I told the nurse; everybody knew why I did it.

14,145. Were the rats not annoying the other patients, as well as you?—They were very bad patients; they were dying patients in the infirmary; nobody was ever put into the infirmary ward unless they were on the point of death.

14,146. I should not imagine it was desirable for people on the point of death to hear rats, either?—They would not be likely to complain.

14,147. Did you go back into the ward?—No; they took me to the receiving ward and put me in a side room. The asylum was very full up. There was a patient there named C. She was a clergyman's sister and a doctor's cousin, and very much fancied herself. She thought she always had this side room because her people paid so much money for her. They took her out of that side room to put me in it. I still thought I was going to have an infectious complaint. The nurse was told that no patients were to go near me or to speak to me. This patient came into the room the next day, and she found me in her bed, and ordered me out of it. I said: "I do not want your bed; you can have it," so she got into bed with me with her clothes and boots on. She was a maniacal woman; sometimes she was very nice and sometimes she was the other way. The charge nurse came in and was much annoyed, got hold of her, flung her out of it, made her yell, said something to me, and then went away again. I do not know what the cause of it was, but I heard I was going to be sent to M.5. That is the worst ward in the building. I was sent to M.5 on the 23rd March.

14,148. What was the difference between it and the other ward?—That was the ward where there were ever so many padded cells, and the patients were the worst patients in the county. They were terrible; they shrieked, they swore, and they moaned. Just before I got there, the nurse told me two of the patients had gone into the scullery and had completely cleared the dresser of every bit of china. The food I had to eat out of a pewter cup and a pewter plate.

14,149. Do you think it may be true that before you were taken to this M.5. ward you had been noisy and singing and calling out?—Quite true, and I will tell you why. I knew M.5 was the ward that was only spoken about in whispers. You heard the most terrible tales of what went on in M.5. Do you think

I wanted to go to a ward like that? When I knew I was going to be sent to such a place I thought: "I will do something to be worthy of it." I thought: "If I am going to be hanged, I might as well be hanged for a sheep as a lamb." So I thought of all these songs that had been coming into my head and sang them at the top of my voice.

14,150. Do you remember whether you wrote a letter in blood to your husband at that time?—Yes, I did. While I was in the infirmary ward they refused to allow me to write. They took away all my note paper, pencils, and everything else. So just to show them that if a person really sets her mind to do a thing she can do it, I wrote a letter in blood with the end of my tooth brush.

14,151. Now tell us what happened in the refractory ward?—I was placed in the inside room again. First of all, when I got to the refractory ward there was a little short nurse. I was taken down there with my hair hanging down my back, and I was in a dressing gown. She clutched hold of it and swung it off. As she swung it off she said: "This is the finishing off school. You come in here on your feet, and you go out on a stretcher." She said: "You are going to sit on the form all the afternoon." She dressed me up, although I had been in bed without any clothes for a considerable time. She took me down to the dormitory, and I cannot imagine anywhere out of hell a worse place. She sat me down on a chair right in front of an open door. I said: "Do you know I have been in bed for a fortnight?" She said: "Them's my orders." Just behind me there was this woman C., who had been in R. She kept getting up, catching hold of her chair, and slamming it down. I thought it was coming on my head. We were both sitting near a radiator, which had a padlock and a chain on it. She got hold of that and rattled it. Over in the other corner there was the most awful creature I have ever seen in my life. She was a living skeleton. All the bed-clothes had come off her, and you could see every bone in her body. The charge nurse said: "Go and fetch her medicine." They covered her up, and the nurses poured the draught down her throat. Then a little nurse covered the poor creature completely over with a quilt and all the bed-clothes, and held them down. She twisted it into a knot and held it down, and I could see the poor thing struggling under the clothes, and gradually she went down and down, and I suppose she went off into a deep sleep. There were patients calling out, shouting, and moaning. There I stopped.

14,152. Had it not occurred to you that if you were feeling more controlled at this time, and wanted to get out, it was a very bad way to go about it, to shout and sing and say you would break all the rules?—I never said such a thing. I never made a threat all the time I was in there.

14,153. Mr. Snell: But you did break the rules?—I acted. I did not threaten.

14,154. Chairman: But do not you think it was a very unwise way to go about things?—But I was in for it, was I not? I was going to M.5.

14,155. I do not know that it was the wisest thing to do?—It was not wise, but I was absolutely at their mercy.

14,156. Mr. Micklem: I want to ask you one question about M.8. Have you not forgotten? Was not M.8. a little improvement upon the original observation ward?—After you got used to it, it was an improvement, because they were all patients of one kind. When you were in the receiving ward you had the very bad padded cell cases, while in M.8. there was not a single padded cell case. They were women who had downed tools and refused to work; women who had complained about anything were all in there. Later on I was put in F.4, which was supposed to be the best ward in the building, but in that ward they were women whose temperaments I did not like at all. I did get on very well with the M.8. people, and I would have preferred to have stayed with them for ever.

14,157. Many of the M.8. people you thought were not insane at all?—I am certain of it. I have got one of them in my own home at the present moment.

14,158. Sir David Drummond: I should like to know if you had any experience of dentists visiting this institution?—Dr. S. was the dentist. Dr. S. took out teeth.

14,159. Chairman: There was no regular dentist?—No.

14,160. Was there any dentist's chair?—No; just an ordinary chair. I had a tooth out.

14,161. No dentists coming from outside?—No.

14,162. What happened to you in the refractory ward, in M.5?—They had been disinfecting this end cell, and when evening came I was taken in there and put into bed. I fitted exactly into a shape that was in the mattress. Some woman had evidently been lying on that mattress for months and months, and had worn a complete grave in it, and I just fitted into it; I was rather afraid a dead body had been in there, and that I was going to be another one.

14,163. What did you do?—Actually the woman had had scabies, and that is why they were disinfecting the cell. There I was for 25 days. I was not allowed to write a single letter. When letters came to me, a nurse brought them to me, waited while I read them, and took them away, and when I had a visitor the nurse sat at the door and listened. They allowed me a book to read, and that was all. I was never taken out, except to be bathed once a week. Then I said to Dr. D. S.: "I do not agree I am so ill that I have to stop in bed. I want other advice." She said, "I am the mental expert for the women." There came a day when I felt "I cannot stay here any longer." 25 days is a long time. I wanted a change. Every night and morning there was the smell of these draughts coming under the door, nearly choking me, and the noise night and morning was simply awful, when they were giving the patients the draughts. I thought to myself: "What shall I do? If I tell my brother, they will take no notice of any letter he sends. I had better act for myself." One day I asked every official who came into the room, the nurse, the head attendant, the charge nurse, Dr. D. S., the matron, the head night attendant and the ordinary night attendant; I said: "I want to see the acting medical superintendent," and the last two—they were two fat, jolly old girls—gave the door a slam and they said: "You will see the medical superintendent!" I knew it was absolutely useless to ask any of the officials, because no official would dare to tell the medical superintendent I wanted to see him. There was no medical superintendent at the time. Dr. S. was acting medical superintendent. There I was, locked in for the night, and it looked as though I was going to be locked in for ever. Then I took the mattress and everything off the bed and turned the bed up on end, and I pushed it into the corner between the door and the window. The window was shuttered. I got on the top of the mattress and flung the loop round the bedstead and hoisted myself up to the top of the bedstead, in my nightdress, and I stood there. There is a little ventilator over the door, and I put my fingers through there. Before I called out for the nurse, I thought: "They are sure to pull me down by my nightdress," so I took the nightdress off and tied it round my neck by the sleeves, so I was covered up. Somebody tried to pull me down by the nightdress. They gave a good old tug, and away it went. I held on to the ventilator and I called out "Nurse, nurse." The night nurse came to the door and she opened the door and said, "Oh my God!" she fell back. She called for some other people, and five of them came in. They stood there and tried to persuade me to come down. They said: "Come down. You shall see the acting medical superintendent." I said, "I have rung that bell all day, and I have asked you to let me see the medical superintendent." I said, "You have not told him, so I am going to stop here till he comes." I think they fetched every nurse in the asylum. They fetched Dr. D. S., Dr. J., and a young man who was there learning; he was the only man there; there was a whole crowd of them begging of me to come down, but I stood up there and I thought I would convert the lot of them. I kept on telling them why I was in the asylum and how long I had been in the asylum. I said, "If I had been taken to prison for attempted suicide I should only have been detained for a month at most."

14,164. Did you say all this while you were holding on to the ventilator?—I was standing on the bed. I had a platform, really, but it was pitch dark.

14,165. Mr. Snell: During the 25 days you were in bed there, were you being treated for any physical illness; were they giving you medicine?—I think I had a tonic; I cannot be sure whether the tonic came then or after.

14,166. Sir Ernest Hiley: Did you never see Dr. S. all that time?—I never saw Dr. S. all the time; only Dr. D. S. night and morning.

14,167. Chairman: How did the scene end?—They fetched the kitchen table, and five of them got on the kitchen table, but their heads were only up to my feet and they could not do anything. Then Dr. D. S. was calling out "Fetch the firemen." But the young doctor got hold of the bed and gave it a good shake, and I nearly fell off the top of the bed. I was flung off the top of the bed and left swinging. Then they were calling out: "Catch her; catch her." I said: "I will surrender to Dr. D. S.; she is my enemy." I was thrown into her arms. I was put in the padded cell. They put a nurse at the door, and every two hours they changed her. The next morning the order came through to put me in the dormitory. The padded cell was right opposite the dormitory, and a nurse had to stand at the door watching me.

14,168. What happened next?—I was in this dormitory, and it was very interesting to be in that dormitory, because there were so many peculiar cases there. There was a woman on my left who never stopped talking; she did not want an audience. One of her remarks was: "Beauty is only skin deep, but my ugliness goes to the bone." I had never heard that before. There was a woman on the other side, and she was making all sorts of extraordinary noises; she could not speak—

14,169. I think we may take it that there were odd cases there. How long were you in that place?—I was in there, I think, about four days. Now I must tell you this. My brother came to see me. The morning that I was put in the dormitory, Dr. S. came to see me.

14,170. You did see the acting medical superintendent at last?—Yes, he came after this scene. He asked me everything, and I was in a very excited condition, because it does not do you any good to go climbing bedsteads. I was very very angry at the treatment I was receiving. I did not think it was fair. You ought to be able to make a request and have that request granted, not to be continually refused. I simply raved at Dr. S.

14,171. After the four days there, where did you go next?—I was visited on the Sunday while I was in that dormitory, but my visitors were never allowed to come into the dormitory; they were taken into a quiet ward. I was got up and dressed, and taken into that ward. My brother and his wife sat on a little sofa, and the nurse squeezed herself in between them; she had a note-book and pencil in her hand. I was put in a chair right opposite facing the three of them.

14,172. Earl Russell: Was it usual for other patients to have a nurse with them when they saw visitors?—No; it was most unusual. She had a note-book and pencil, and she told me she had to report everything I said to the charge nurse.

14,173. Chairman: What happened next?—Right opposite this room was a padded cell, and in that padded cell was a girl—R. P. She had been turned out of her bed so that I could have it. She was in the padded cell, and she used to come to the dormitory door, saying: "They said they wanted the bed for a worse patient than I am. She is not worse than I am"—and she would not go back into the padded cell. The nurse gave her a paraldehyde draught, and she was better for a while. She gave her another, and you could hear the struggling. When night came she began screaming, and she screamed for three days and three nights, and never left off. It was the most awful screaming you ever heard in your life. Dr. S. came to see me every day while I was in the dormitory, and I asked him to listen to the screaming. I said: "Is it part of my cure to lie here and listen to that noise?" He simply took no notice. He said: "You are not so well this morning." Dr. D. S. came in, and I said: "Put the girl in another ward, or put me in the padded cell, and let her have my bed." But they never took any notice at all. After three days and three nights of it I simply could not stand it any longer. I said: "I cannot stand that noise; it is driving me crazy." I said: "Do do something. Get the girl away into another ward, or get me away." No notice was taken. When the night nurse came on duty, she said it was nothing to do with me. So I simply went to the commode; took the top off it; it was broken in two halves; each half was like a hatchet; and I smashed four windows.

14,174. And?—And I was removed and put in a special cell, with a little glass panel; I was put on a mattress on the floor; there were mice holes all round the floor; the room simply stunk of stale cheese and mice; and the shutter was kept shut all day and all night. The frame of the bed was put into the room during the day, but it was removed during the night, and I slept on the floor.

14,175. Earl Russell: On a mattress?—On a mattress.

14,176. Chairman: I think your father came to see you there?—Yes; and he was kept waiting. They put a chair beside the bed for the visitor and a chair at the door for the nurse to sit down. I knew a visitor was coming. I could hear them running the bad ones away; two nurses would take a patient, and then run her off. My father complained that he was kept waiting. Before he was allowed in, they opened the shutter; they tidied me up and made everything look nice; but I think I must have begun to look rather bad, because he took no notice of what I said. I told him to write and complain to Dr. S., and when he got home he did do so.

14,177. I see that something was done immediately after that?—Yes.

14,178. Earl Russell: All this time you never wrote to the Commissioners?—I never knew about the Commissioners. Later on I did hear a rumour that there were Commissioners, and I wrote to Dr. E. and asked for the address of the Commissioners.

14,179. Mr. Micklem: There was no notice up in the ward about the Commissioners?—Not a word; nobody ever knew a word about the Commissioners.

14,180. Chairman: Your father was now convinced that something should be done. He wrote to the acting medical superintendent, and did that bring about immediately a better state of affairs?—Absolutely. Dr. D. S. came into the room, and said something to the nurse, and they brought along a wheel chair and wheeled me all through the corridors to the verandah, and it was very nice indeed.

14,181. Mr. Snell: You were weak at this time, were you?—I daresay I could have walked, but they never gave me an opportunity to do so.

14,182. Earl Russell: What aged woman was Dr. D. S.?—It is difficult to say. She had been there 25 years.

14,183. Chairman: You were taken to the verandah, and that was much nicer?—Lovely.

14,184. Earl Russell: I think you were kept in the infirmary ward?—Dr. S. visited me when I arrived there, and he wrote a very untrue letter, which I have in my possession, to my father. In my opinion he should have told my father the truth about what had happened. Instead of that, he put all the blame on me, and did not blame his colleague, Dr. D. S.

Mrs. M.

14,185. Chairman: Have you got that letter?—Yes. I think it was simply medical etiquette would not allow him to blame his colleague.

14,186. Mr. Mathew: Do I understand that there were no letter boxes in the ward?—No letter box at all. This is the letter (handing in the same).

14,187. Chairman: After that stage, things got better, and you were ultimately discharged?—No. I was sent to a very good ward; but I did not want to stop even in the best ward of a lunatic asylum; so I wrote a letter to the Committee; and Dr. D. S. brought me back the envelope that I had sent the letter in, and said: "What good do you think you are doing yourself by writing these letters?" "Well," I said, "it ought to do me some good," and a long argument followed. I was sent back to the verandah again, and put into bed; I was kept in bed for a fortnight, and by that time my brother had written to Dr. E., and Dr. E. answered the letter, which I have got. Dr. E. sent for me and had a very long interview with me. He asked me questions in front of Dr. D. S., and I named the different nurses. It he had really wanted an honest enquiry into it, he could simply have sent for those nurses and found whether what I was saying was true or not. He never sent for a single nurse. He listened to all I said, and at the end of it he said: "Mrs. M., is that all you have got to complain of?" I said: "Yes." He said: "Let bygones be bygones." Then off he went; that was the end of it. Then after that I was simply at Dr. D. S.'s mercy. I was sent away from the verandah; I was sent back to the observation ward. I never had a moment's peace. I had patients hanging on to me all day long; and I was twice murderously assaulted before breakfast by bad patients. It was enough to drive anybody raving mad to be there.

14,188. I think you were there for about four months?—Yes.

14,189. How did you ultimately get discharged?—I had been continually writing letters to the Committee, but never had an acknowledgment. Then one day Dr. E., who had been newly appointed, came to the ward with two gentlemen; I did not know who they were. I, of course, ran up to them and I spoke to one of them. I said to Dr. E. first of all, "Can I speak to this gentleman?" and he said "Yes." This gentleman happened to be Mr. F. I told him all about my case, and he said he would look into it. I gave him my brother's address, and he said he would find out if my story was true. I waited another six weeks, and then my brother wrote and said: "No gentleman has been to our house." As a result of the letter I wrote to the Chairman of the Committee, I obtained my release; I have it here.

14,190. There are other matters to which you refer in your précis, but I think we have got from you a very detailed account of your stay in this institution. I do not think we should detain you longer, because this afternoon we shall be having more evidence from other people. I think you have given us a pretty full outline of your case, have you not?—Yes.

14,191. Then I think we shall not detain you any longer. We can only thank you for coming and assisting us; it has been interesting to listen to your story.—I should like to say that within the last 8 months I have been doing a lot of work among other patients in other asylums, and I have visited 9 different lunatic asylums, and I have got most interesting cases in each of those asylums. These patients are always asking me to do something for them, and I have told them that, if possible, I will tell you about them. I should like you to give me an opportunity of putting their cases before you.

14,192. I am afraid we cannot go into those individual cases, because our duty is rather a larger one; but we are always quite pleased to read accounts of cases which are illustrative of the general problem. If you have got anything of that sort that you would like to send us afterwards, I will look at anything you send; but we cannot, of course, extend your oral evidence any further.—Thank you.

Mr. P. called and examined.

14,193. Chairman: We have asked you to come here this afternoon, Mr. P., to tell us a little about your experiences, and we may perhaps get a few facts from you generally first of all. I think you are an engineer?—That is so.

14,194. And you are now 56 years of age?—That is right.

14,195. And you were for a number of years with the old South Western Railway, in charge of hydraulic machinery?—That is so.

14,196. And then for a time you were with the S. Borough Council, also in charge of the same type of machinery?—That is so.

14,197. I think for many years you have interested yourself in political matters, and were active in connection with your trade?—Yes.

14,198. We will just take, as a start, the plain facts of the situation. You were, I think, in C. Mental Hospital for 13 years nearly, from the 10th July, 1910, to the 12th April, 1923?—That is correct.

14,199. You were discharged in April, 1923, "Recovered"?—That is right.

14,200. I think the most useful thing that you could do, would be yourself to suggest the points which you would like us to know in your own experiences. Just tell us the things that you experienced during those years which you would like us to hear about?—May I gather from that that you wish simply to deal with my experience in the asylum, or my opinion as to the procedure in connection with lunacy certification?

14,201. One would like first of all to hear about your own experience and we would be very glad to have any hints or suggestions arising out of that experience, the points where you think things want improving. Just tell us, first of all, the experiences and then the lessons that may be drawn from those experiences?—In the first place, if we begin at the commencement, I may say that my own case I suppose is typical of a great many others. I was in a very bad state of mental breakdown, and was not told where I was likely to finish up. Of course, you understand I was paid for by the rates, simply what they call a pauper lunatic; and the relieving officer came with two rough men to the house where I was living, and they did not tell me of course that they had anything to do with my mental state; they simply put up a pretext of getting me away by telling me that there was a breakdown with my plant, and that the borough engineer had sent for me. I did not think there was much likelihood of that taking place, but, at any rate, I said I did not feel disposed to go. They then seized me and dragged me down the stairs. At the time I was disabled through an accident, my shoulder was dislocated, and, as a matter of fact, I was taken away without a coat on, simply in my shirt sleeves.

14,202. Where were you living?—At C.; I was the householder.

14,203. Were you alone?—No, my wife was there.

14,204. And your family also?—I have no family.

21 March, 1925.]

Mr. P.

14,205. You said you had a bad mental breakdown; do you remember any of your symptoms at that time?—I remember everything.

14,206. What was the nature of the mental breakdown?—In the first place, I may tell you, I have rather burnt the candle at both ends; I tried to do too much. I was working during the day time and occupied the whole of my evenings in social and political work. I was assisting Mr. S. for the County Council election. That was in the March and I broke down in April. For years I had thought I could do with very little sleep; I used to do with four or five hours of a night for 15 or 16 years. I was always warned that I should have a breakdown, but I took no notice of it. Finally insomnia set in, and that was the first trouble with me; I could not sleep at all. I began then to worry about anything, work, finance, and everything connected with my whole mind, and from that I got worse and worse, and finally I went to the surveyor whom I was under and told him I should have to give the job up. He persuaded me to take a holiday, in fact, I do not mind saying now candidly that he paid for a trip to B.—he thought it would do me good. As a matter of fact, my experience made me worse; I got no sleep the whole of the time I was there; I came back worse. I tried to recommence work, had this accident, and finished up in St. Thomas's Hospital. I may say that there was some iota of truth in what were put down as delusions. I had the idea that I should never work again, for the reason that my spine was fractured, and this right shoulder dislocated; as a matter of fact, it is dislocated at the present day. If you gave me £1,000 I could not put that hand round on the left side; still I manage to do my work. At that time I had the idea that I should never work again, and I told the medical man that I never should work, I thought. From that I began to worry. I could not sleep; I was restless; and I know I generally upset the home; and I suppose the wife got in touch with the relieving officer, and they took me to the infirmary.

14,207. Looking back on it all now, you might tell me this—do you mean you were a proper person to be taken to an asylum then, or do you not?—Under the existing law, perhaps I was; but not under what I should consider proper conditions. Under the present conditions in all probability there was no other alternative but to take me there. The specialist came down and he expressly wished my wife to send me to a private home, but my financial position would not allow it.

14,208. Would you have been willing to go to a place voluntarily, if it had been possible, for a time?—Undoubtedly I should, because I knew I was a nuisance at home.

14,209. The ordinary public mental hospital cannot take voluntary borders?—No.

14,210. You have told us how it came about that you were removed by the relieving officer—will you just pick up the story at that point?—Yes. On my way, of course, I remember everything that took place, I knew I was not going towards my work, and I made a remark to that effect; then I was told I was going to see another doctor. I was taken to St. J. infirmary. There I spent two days amidst the most horrible surroundings, for the simple reason there was noise and filth of all descriptions, and I may say I had not an hour's sleep the two nights I was there. On the Saturday, without any information or anything, I was taken to a room. I know now,—I did not think at the time it was,—but undoubtedly it was before the Chairman of the Board of Guardians, a justice of the peace, and I was asked two or three questions there, quite preliminary questions, from a brief which he had in front of him. I was not told even then where I was going to, but in the afternoon I was rigged out in an old guy's suit, it was not fit for a scarecrow, and taken straight away in the conveyance. I did not know where I was going; I knew I was going towards C., because

I knew the tramways and so forth; and I finished up in C. Asylum.

14,211. You had seen the doctor—did the doctor discuss the case with you at all?—At the infirmary?

14,212. Yes, the doctor who certified?—One or two simple questions. There I told him the same as I have told you; I made a statement to him, and that was included in the note of my case, that I thought I never should work again. I know I also had what you call delusions, that there would be a great deal of trouble if I did not get back to my job. There, again, if I had been allowed to explain the position, they would have seen there was some ground for even those ideas.

14,213. They may have been exaggerated ideas?—Undoubtedly. My job with the Borough Council was a rather peculiar one. I do not know, but I suppose you are acquainted with the fact that the Board of Trade do not allow steam boilers to be under arches over which trains travel, but for a great number of years that Borough Council has had the opportunity of having steam boilers underneath the arches over which railway lines run.

14,214. I do not know that we should really go into the details of this matter; it is enough that you tell us this, that you had some apprehensions in your mind as to what would happen if you were away from your job?—That wants a little amplification. I do not want it to be thought I was absolutely silly in my ideas, but the point was this, that I had with me an unskilled man, a stoker, and I knew that the man was carrying on my work, and in the event of his being negligent and not keeping water to its proper level in the boiler, there may have been a boiler explosion; I was worrying about that. There is a reasonable thought that, with unskilled labour taking the place of skilled labour, it may possibly cause a lot of trouble. You understand what the position would be if the arch was blown up when a train was passing—what a disaster there would be.

14,215. I quite understand that. What you are really telling us is that the facts on which you were certified had some basis?—Yes.

14,216. The doctor said in his certificate that he saw you were irresponsible and apathetic, "not caring what happens to him. He tells me also that although feeling physically well he has given up work because he has taken a violent dislike to it. Further tells me that this will bring him into serious trouble with his employers, that his absence will cost them millions and bring about a terrible disaster that will affect the whole country. He fails to realise the absurdity of his statements and conduct." That is all we are told about you?—Exactly.

14,217. You say you were anxious and worried about what would happen when you were not at your work?—Exactly.

14,218. Had you also put it in this exaggerated form?—Undoubtedly I did.

14,219. Therefore your view is this, that while you had some occasion for being worried, you were really upset at this time; and under the then existing system there was no alternative but to send you to a mental hospital, and you accepted that position?—Exactly.

14,220. Will you tell us about your experiences at C.? What things struck you in the life there which were unfortunate or distressing, which you would like to see improved?—In the first place, upon arriving there a patient goes into what they call the receiving ward. Take my own particular case, a person suffering from insomnia; you are simply put into the receiving ward with about 40 or 50 cases of all various descriptions; there is no classification from the commencement; whatever your trouble may be, you simply go holus bolus into one common dormitory to sleep at night time. In the first place, you understand the receiving ward and observation ward are never left night or day without attendants. The night dormitory is patrolled by the night attendant; every half-hour he has to go from one end of the dormitory to the other where there is a clock arrangement in which he has specially to clock each time, and he has a lantern with him. You can understand what it must be to a man suffering from loss of sleep, without all the other disturbing influences. This was my first night's experience there. The night attendant, if he is a careful man, a judicious man, will take pains to make his round as quiet as possible; on the other hand, if you have a man who is naturally careless he will blunder round, he does not care whether he knocks against your bed or disturbs you in other ways, and he will flash his light right on the top of you. In addition to that, as I say, there are various cases you are mixed up with, epileptics, noisy cases, quarrelsome cases, people that have all kinds of delusions and shout out in their sleep, and even when they are awake, and so forth; so you realise how much chance there is for someone suffering from insomnia in a place of that description.

Mr. P.

14,221. Did you find it very distressing?—I did indeed.

14,222. I suppose that would be mitigated to a considerable extent if you had a better classification of patients?—Exactly.

14,223. It means more accommodation, of course?—Not necessarily.

14,224. Do you think with the existing accommodation and better classification you could get an improvement?—Quite so, as I have had experience myself.

14,225. Earl Russell: Were you by any chance noisy yourself when you went in?—No.

14,226. Chairman: No one has ever suggested that Mr. P. was noisy?—I was simply going to say that (under what will come out perhaps later on) I had something like 11 years out of the 12½, roughly speaking, in one of these observation wards. I had no opportunity of going to any other ward. Then, at the finish, I went into another ward, what is called an open ward; there I improved wonderfully in the short time I was there, I knew the marked effect of it. There was no night man in the open ward; the door is locked on you, and there is no night watchman, and the light is turned down. In the observation ward the light is never turned down.

14,227. These open wards are the wards, I suppose, where the patients, who it has been found can be trusted, are allowed to sleep under normal conditions?—Not altogether normal conditions—nearly normal.

14,228. Mr. Micklem: Did you say you were 10 years in the observation ward?—I was.

14,229. Mr. Snell: Under observation the whole of the time?—Under observation night and day.

14,230. Chairman: Were you in the same dormitory?—Not exactly the same; I was moved twice, but I was always in the observation ward. My grave objection, of course, really to the present state of affairs is the power that is placed in the hands of junior medical men when it should rest in the hands of the superintendent. In my case I have proof that the doctor made a wrong diagnosis of my case, and for that I had to suffer.

14,231. Sir David Drummond: Were you supposed to be suicidal at all?—I understand by the papers I have seen since my discharge that I was put down as suicidal; but, as a matter of fact, I will ask you whether you think it is possible for me to be so, seeing that all suicidal cases are on what they call the red ticket, that is to say, if they go out for exercise into the court the attendant always goes with them. I was never treated like that, and therefore I do not see how I could be classed as suicidal, with the exception that I said many times, I said so to the first attendant, that I wished I was dead, and that I would much rather be dead than living under the circumstances under which I was living.

14,232. Chairman: I think we must get this accurate. There are two kinds of observation in an asylum: there is, first of all, what one may call the preliminary stage; that lasts for a certain time until the patients are allocated to a particular ward. When you say you were ten years in the observation ward do you not rather mean this, that because of the diagnosis of your case you were kept for ten years under observation—which is rather a different thing?—You may put it that way.

14,233. The observation which you were subjected to for these 10 years was not for the purpose of diagnosing your case. It was observation thought to be necessary because of the character of your ailment?—I waive that point if you like, but the application of the term is exactly the same in all cases.

14,234. Of course, if a case really were a suicidal case, it would have to be kept under observation, though it was there for 20 or 30 years?—Not at all, Sir. In this open ward I knew of an entirely suicidal case who had a definite exhibition of his case round his throat. He was a hairdresser by trade, and although he did not enter the institution until some time after me, when I went into the open ward, I met him in the open ward, he had been there for some years. He was a suicidal case.

14,235. Had he not recovered by that time?—If he was recovered, why was he retained there?

14,236. He may have got over the suicidal stage.—His duty has been for years to cut the medical officers' hair and shave them, and also the patients, and yet he is not out at liberty; so I leave that to the Commission.

14,237. I think, if I may say so, the most important point you have made just now is this, that in a case like yours, a person suffering from worry and breakdown, it is very inadvisable that they should be subjected to noise and distraction in a ward with patients of a different type altogether. You would advocate, would you not, that there should be much more classification, and much more individual attention?—Exactly. That is not only applying to admission but right away through.

14,238. That is classification. What is the next point you would like to draw our attention to?—Certainly in connection with the dormitory life I should like to see a vast alteration in the cleansing arrangements.

14,239. We would like to hear about that. What are your experiences?—In the first place, I may tell you that in the ward I was in the normal figures were about 44 patients; during the war they went up on account of their being limited for space; that was on account of war hospitals being required for war patients, and drafting other patients into existing institutions; so that our numbers went up to 60. In the lavatory there were three basins for washing purposes, for the whole of the 44 or 45 or 60 patients; we had three roller towels. I may say these got very small after the war; before the war they were certainly a little larger than afterwards, but they were cut down. For the war time there used to be two or three hand towels laid out, but afterwards there were three roller towels. I leave it to anyone as to whether or not that is sufficient for a person who has any feeling of cleanliness or decency,—to think he has got to be the 45th patient to wipe on one of those towels, especially as patients get up in the middle of the night and use them for purposes for which they were not meant.

14,240. Did you find that some patients were suffering from diseases?—Yes.

14,241. Were they using the same towels as you were?—There was an order that they should be supplied with separate towels, but this was not adhered to. I know myself of patients having complained of having used the same towels as patients having scabies. There was one watercloset in the dormitory for these 45 patients.

14,242. A single closet?—One single closet. During the night following what they call a medicine day, you can just imagine what the position was like. Not only on the medicine days, but on days when there has been an epidemic of diarrhoea, I have seen those hand-basins simply reeking with filth; every chamber in the place has been brought out, they have been overflowing with filth, and the hand basins have been filled.

Mr. P.

14,243. Earl Russell: Does nobody ever clean these things?—As a matter of fact, they cannot do so; the place where they wash is kept locked during the night time. The night attendant is there; he could, if he liked, have it altered; but he is simply human, and they try to make the job as easy as they can for themselves. But, as I say, in the day room there is more closet accommodation, but very little; there are two instead of one, but there is one always locked up for the use of the attendants. There are two closets for 45 men, and one kept solely for the use of about half a dozen attendants.

14,244. Was the night one always open; could the patients go there when they wished to during the night?—It was not locked; the door was locked in the dormitory.

14,245. What I was thinking of was this, whether the patient who wanted to use the closet at night could do so?—Certainly, if there was not an epidemic on. You can understand the position if a dozen men were rushing at one time.

14,246. In the day time there were two closets in the day ward?—Yes.

14,247. Were they locked?—No.

14,248. Could you go at any time if you wanted?—At C. you could; it is not so in all asylums.

14,249. At C. could any man wanting to use the closet use it at any time he wanted?—Yes.

14,250. Was there sufficient paper provided?—None whatever. There was nominally supposed to be some kept in the scullery. A patient was always there on duty for washing up, and sometimes he would have a stock of paper, and if patients liked to go in there and ask for it, they could get some there. There was paper supplied by the authority, but I am afraid it was commandeered for other purposes.

14,251. By whom?—By people who wanted to write notes, and so forth. The patients are taken up to draw their stores nominally in charge of an attendant; if they get a chance of getting this paper for scribbling purposes they will do it, and as a result the ordinary patients get none. If they had paper it was supplied by the good nature of the scullery man, who was a patient himself.

14,252. Then it is pretty obvious that it would have to be issued to the patients every time they wanted to go to the closet?—Is it not in our public lavatories in and about London?

14,253. Chairman: What about the baths?—In this particular ward that I was in for so long, what was known as C.1 Ward in C., there were two baths, and I was informed by the attendants that the time allowed for bathing 44 patients was 1½ hours. If you come to divide that time up for two baths, it does not allow half an hour for each patient. Nominally we were told 3 minutes was the recognised time for bathing.

14,254. Was the water changed between each patient?—It was supposed to be.

14,255. Do you know whether it was or not?—I know it was not oftentimes. It was in my own case, because I would not get into it otherwise; but many times I have seen four patients go into the same water.

14,256. What about the towels?—There was one towel for each individual.

14,257. So that was better?—That was better in that way.

14,258. Have you any complaint about the decency of the arrangements?—Of course there was no privacy at all, none whatever. If it was a bleak cold day, you were, first of all, turned into the open dormitory and told to strip. All the windows were thrown open for airing the dormitory; you had to undress there, throw your clothes on one of the beds before they were remade, and simply go from there and wait your turn. Of course that is applying to this particular ward. In the other one, what they call the general bathing room, that would be where two wards were bathing at the same time, there might be half a dozen baths there—of course there are more patients, and one or two extra attendants. There is no privacy. As a matter of fact, I felt that very keenly myself. I have seen men who have been very badly ruptured, old men in a shocking state, having to unrobe in front of boys practically; it does not matter what age they are; all ages down to 16 and 17, and there is no privacy whatever.

14,259. Now on that point have you any suggestion to make. Would it not be desirable to have some kind of curtained cubicles or boxes in which the patients could undress privately and get into the bath?—Undoubtedly it would be far better, but there again the question of expense comes up.

14,260. It has been done for women, of course. Do you think men would appreciate the provision of some kind of arrangement such as I have spoken of?—I have not a shadow of doubt some of them would; I do not say everyone would; there is a kind of mixed company in those places.

14,261. It is more important to see that you get a reasonable time for a bath, and get a clean towel for it?—Exactly.

14,262. Mr. Snell: Did you feel the cold very much while waiting for a bath?—Personally I am of a hardy nature, but I am afraid many people did. The dormitory was supposed to be warmed during the night, but then of course the windows were thrown open for airing.

14,263. You have to stand undressed for some minutes waiting your turn?—Exactly.

14,264. Chairman: The next matter which you deal with is the subject of the parole system in asylums—that means giving a certain measure of graded liberty to the patients?—That is so. That was simply a matter that was introduced into C. within my last 18 months' experience there.

14,265. Was it an improvement there?—Undoubtedly, one of the finest improvements ever introduced into these institutions.

14,266. How was it worked?—The only way I can put it is that certain individuals were recommended on account of their good conduct by the charge attendant in the ward, who recommended them to the head attendant, and from that, of course, to the superintendent.

14,267. One may say the degree of liberty given was determined by the conduct of the patient roughly?—Exactly.

14,268. And the better behaved the patient was the greater the freedom given?—No, I would not say that.

14,269. Was not that the idea of it?—No; I mean the one who was exceptionally good, once he got his parole card, was on the same basis as the one who was only moderately good, or had some little favour shown him.

14,270. I have heard of institutions where you get more and more freedom according as your conduct merits it?—At the present moment I know that at W. they are granting paroles down in the village. That we never had in C.

14,271. At any rate, we may take it that the idea has your approval, the idea of giving a greater degree of liberty to cases that can benefit by it?—Exactly. May I say I consider that was one of the great things that brought about my improvement in health. We had something like 200 acres attached to the institution at C., and as a man brought up in the country, I can appreciate a thing of that sort. I could do anything I liked as long as I behaved myself properly.

14,272. And you think that the benefit of greater freedom showed itself in the improvement of your health?—Yes, undoubtedly.

14,273. Now what about the food which you got there?—Pre-war, or after-war?

14,274. The whole time. You were there pre-war, during the war, and post-war?—The position is so peculiar in that respect; it has varied so much.

14,275. Has it improved—that is what we would like to know?—If you ask me candidly why I think the improvement was brought about, it was on the publication of Dr. Lomax's book. I have no hesitation in saying it followed immediately after that, and the improvement was so marked that it was impossible for anyone to draw any other conclusion than that the powers that be were influenced by that book; because it went practically from one issue to another; from being meagre, it went almost to the other extreme.

Mr. P.

14,276. How would you say it was when you left; was it decent food?—It was decent food at that time, but it was going downhill again; the after effects had gone off a little. May I say it got so good at one time that the visiting guardians came round on one occasion—or whether it was the visiting committee I do not know—but I happened to be working in the dormitory just at the time when the tea was on the table, and one of the gentlemen made the remark: "Do these men always have such a good tea as this?" Of course the slices were not the same as you get in Lyons at the present time, wafers; but they were something like three-quarters of an inch thick and 8 or 12 inches long and about 4 inches wide, and there was a scraping of margarine on them. I should say this was after Dr. Lomax's book came out. Pre-war there was nothing but the plain slice; then after this alteration in the diet, we were provided for breakfast with porridge on three mornings a week in addition, and a little portion of meat; for tea there was not only this slice of bread and margarine, but also jam, marmalade, or honey, and cake, if you can describe it as cake. It was not 1s. 6d. a pound, but at the same time it was supposed to be cake.

14,277. You have advocated the introduction of the parole system. In your case, when you got your parole, I think you also got a good deal more interest and recreation in your life—games to play, and so on?—Yes. There was an improvement made in this respect. I know it is a point you have touched upon in this Commission, because I have followed the Commission's reports pretty fully, as regards the recreation at night time. Of course at one time when I went there first, and for many years afterwards, some patients were drafted off to bed at 7 o'clock, and all at 7.30, and you were there till 7 in the morning.

14,278. Do you think that was too soon to go to bed?—Too many hours in bed. After that an alteration was made, and that was a great improvement. There was the open ward kept open, and a number of patients were allowed to stay up for two hours beyond that, till half-past nine, and enjoy games and singing, and so forth.

14,279. It is satisfactory to know this from you, that during your fairly long time there, conditions seem to have been improving—on the upgrade?—Certainly towards the finish, but it took a long time before there was any improvement. I may say I had 10 years without any improvement, and I had perhaps 18 months or a little more with the improvements.

14,280. Mrs. Mathew: Had you any open air treatment?—None whatever.

14,281. Noverandah or anything at the time?—Only for consumptive cases in connection with the hospital; it was more like a cage because it was protected by a large wire blind, but there the patients lived and slept, practically speaking.

14,282. Chairman: Tell us about the work that went on in the institution.—I may say when I remained there for the last two years I did no work—I was simply out in the airing court—except little odd jobs in the dormitory. I did no outdoor work.

14,283. Were you fit for work, do you think?—I do not suppose I was. I was asked to go out, and I told them I did not think I was fit to go out. You must remember my insomnia was practically persistent and lasted for nearly 10 years. After two years I volunteered; I asked one of the head attendants if I might go out, and he jumped at it; he said, "Most decidedly." As a rule you have to wait a week or two, but they put me out as soon as I expressed a wish to go out.

14,284. What sort of work did they put you to?—I could have gone in the engineer's workshop.

14,285. You got the pick of work, did you?—Not exactly, but knowing I was a skilled engineer they would have been glad for me to have gone there; but I was not out for two ounces of tobacco a week when I felt that workmen were working for 2s. an hour outside. I objected on trade union principles. I absolutely refused to go and follow my own trade, and I never did. Carpenters will go in the carpenters' shop; cabinet makers and upholsterers, blacksmiths, tinsmiths—they all go and work in the workshops. I was simply out working on the land, and that I think was another reason why I brought about a cure for myself.

14,286. You think the open air and the work helped you?—We were on exceptionally heavy work, breaking down trees and banks and cultivation, and I think that extra laborious work induced sleep to come. Once the sleep came, my constipation got better; I was suffering from constipation; and the two things together removed the depression.

14,287. Sir David Drummond: During the 10 years you speak of, had you any desire to leave the institution?—No, practically not. I was asked on one occasion by one of the temporary medical men if I thought I could go out and make a fresh start. I had not reached that stage then, and I said I was afraid I had not sufficient confidence in myself.

14,288. Chairman: I think we may say in your case that under the existing law you really do not complain that you have been unlawfully detained because, as you have told us, you think under the existing law, you were probably quite rightly certified. Then you were in there for a long time and began to recover, and after you got a better grip of things you applied to get discharged?—That is not quite correct.

14,289. Give me the real facts?—In the first place, if I may broach on another topic, my one great complaint is that in all the institutions there is a lack of any curative treatment whatever. There is no curative treatment as regards mental trouble, from first to last. From the day I went into the institution to the day I came out there was not one iota of curative treatment offered to me. I cut my finger with a saw; I was immediately kept in and sent into the hospital and had it attended to, but as regards any curative treatment from first to last, not the slightest iota.

14,290. You mean for mental ailments?—For mental ailments.

14,291. What do you think should have been done in your case. Have you any idea?—Yes, very definite ideas.

14,292. What are they?—In the first place, I think, knowing what I was suffering from, there should have been an attempt made to help me to recover my sleep, treatment for insomnia and treatment for constipation. As a matter of fact, I went for years without having assistance in regard to constipation. Then I approached a deputy ex-superintendent, Dr. B., who was there on duty, and I told him I did not want purgatives; I wanted something that would act in a rational way. He put up a compound; there was a little laudanum in it and cascara.

14,293. Sir David Drummond: That is a purgative?—It may be a purgative, but it is not a purgative in the way they give you horse salts. I am quite willing to admit it must be a purgative, but I am speaking about violent purgatives, and cascara acts very mildly indeed; and I believe it is the only thing by which you can reduce the dose and not increase it. In my experience I may say I took some hogsheads of that.

14,294. Chairman: You think that your constipation and insomnia should have been specially dealt with?—Exactly.

14,295. Constipation, you suggest, was not a thing that could be properly dealt with by merely giving you a dose of salts once a week,—I suppose you got that?—That is another objection—whether patients want them or not, they are given salts twice a week.

21 March, 1925.]

Mr. P.

14,296. On the other hand, for your insomnia I cannot imagine anything better than good hard work in the open air, and that is really what you got?—That was on my own. It was not an attempt by the authorities with that intention. All they did it for was to get the work of the farm done, cheaper labour. That is their only alternative, to run the institution on as cheap lines as possible. I put it to the farm bailiff, what would be his position in running the farm in opposition to the house steward if he had no patients' labour. Where he could run a farm with perhaps a dozen men, he would want at least 30, and that reduces the cost of labour; and for that labour you were given a little screw of tobacco each day. You would get just the same amount of subsistence had you done no work whatever. The only inducement for going to work is a screw of tobacco amounting to two ounces a week, and you get a small portion of bread and cheese for your lunch.

14,297. Did it not occur to you that you might wish to give some work in return for your keep?—That is a matter of opinion; I suppose anyone would wish to do it.

14,298. I thought you said that you had been of the mind that you were not fit to go out, and that you must go on living there at the public expense. I should have thought you would have been rather anxious to recoup the expense you were causing?—As I say, I was an invalid for the first two years, but for just on ten years I worked continuously on the ground.

14,299. But you preferred to do work on the ground rather than do work which you were specifically skilled to do?—Certainly. One objected on the question of trade union principles.

14,300. Another thing is the amount of touch you can keep up with the outside world, when you are in an institution of this sort. I understand you do not think much of visiting committees?—I do not.

14,301. Do you remember seeing them come round?—Yes.

14,302. Did they come regularly?—Yes.

14,303. Did you ever have a chance of speaking to any of them?—I had a chance if I had cared to take it, but I did not care to take it for the simple reason that I knew it was a waste of time.

14,304. Were you wanting to get out at this time? When did you first begin to want to leave the place?—Two years before I did.

14,305. Then we may take it that down to 1921 you did not want to go out?—I was not particularly keen on going out.

14,306. You began to feel better and thought you should be out of the place—did you try and see the visiting committee then?—No, I did not. I wrote to the Board of Control.

14,307. Would that not have been a good idea, to buttonhole one of the Committee?—Shall I tell you what happened in my experience on one or two occasions?

14,308. Yes, that is what we want?—The poor law guardians come round occasionally and see they are not paying for dead men. I will now deal with the county council visiting committee. My experience is that if a patient wishes to approach the committee and happens to get in touch with them, the committee immediately turn to the superintendent, the senior doctor and said: "What about this case?" "Oh so-and-so, and so-and-so." "Very well, we will see into your case." But I may tell you what occurred once, when a man who is on the county council, I believe, at the present time, that is Mr. P. (he is a labour man) came round with the head attendant and the doctor; and a patient, who was an ex-policeman, wished particularly to see them, and he got up and made to go over to the committee man; immediately the inspector, or head attendant, pushed him back: Mr. P. immediately says "That man wants to speak to me. You stand on one side." "Now," he said, "what is it you want?" and he told him he was willing to hear what his trouble was, and Mr. P. said "Very well, I will see about your case, but in the meantime your proper plan is to make an application in writing." That is what goes on with these people. Every obstacle is placed in front of you. As regards a private interview, there are no facilities whatever. That is the stereotyped thing: "Oh yes, we will see into your case," and nothing more is ever heard of it. I never knew of a case in my experience when anything came of it.

14,309. The board of guardians' duty, of course, is to see that they are no longer paying for patients who are no longer there?—They do not like paying for the dead ones; but, there again, the whole thing is an absolute farce.

14,310. They at least see they are not paying for dead people?—They do not even know that, for the simple reason that, if they care to do it, they can transfer patients from A. Ward to C. Ward, and then dodge them back to A. Ward.

14,311. Did you ever see one of the Lunacy Commissioners?—Yes.

14,312. Did you ever have a chat with them?—We always knew when they were coming a day before, if not two days.

14,313. The patients knew?—Certainly; I always knew it.

14,314. How did they know it?—Simply through the attendants: "You will not be out to-morrow, the Commissioners are coming." The whole thing is a farce.

14,315. Did you ever want to talk to any of the Commissioners yourself?—No. I saw that frequently done by the Commissioners. The most interest I ever saw taken was where a gentleman who was known at C., one of the recent additions to the Commissioners certainly took a great interest in the thing and wanted to see some of the patients, but nothing ever came of it.

14,316. But there must be many cases where nothing should come of it. We have all, I think, interviewed patients and heard their story, and you find that the patient is obviously very properly there, and nothing more can come of it in that state of matters?—I quite follow that; I quite agree with that. I am of the candid opinion that it is undoubtedly the worst cases that go up and see these individuals.

14,317. That is the great difficulty, how to know which are the cases which ought to be interviewed?—I quite follow that, and I quite agree, but undoubtedly that is my experience, at any rate, that the individuals who are the best qualified for discharge were those who felt it was absolutely hopeless to expect any benefit from these individuals.

14,318. You mentioned just now the Board of Control. You did not ask for an interview with the visiting committee, but you went straight to the Board of Control about it?—No, not exactly; I went through the proper channels, first of all.

14,319. What are the proper channels?—The proper channel, I take it, is you have, first of all, the ward doctor; then you have over him a senior doctor—that is in large institutions of about 3,000 patients; you have a senior doctor who comes under the superintendent. In the first place, I applied to the junior doctor.

14,320. With what result?—I got no result from him, who, unfortunately for me, was the senior doctor. The consequence was, having seen these two, I made a personal application to the superintendent, wrote him a full statement of my case, telling him exactly the whole procedure from the time I commenced till I finished up; and, as was his usual practice, the doctor came on the Sunday dinner time, just walked through the wards, and he passed me at the table, and when he had gone a little way beyond, he turned round and looked over his shoulder and said: "I have received your letter, and I can do nothing for you at present." I simply stood up, and I said: "Thank you, Sir," and with that I found it was no use dilly-dallying with matters again, so I sat down and wrote to the Board of Control just a brief note. I kept a copy of the note I had sent to the superintendent; I quoted one or two Labour Members of Parliament who could speak as to my respectability, and so forth, and gave the reference which is required.

14,321. We have it in front of us. You wrote this letter on the 8th February, 1923, and you forward a copy of your recent letter to the medical superintendent?—I did, copy of testimonials, and a brief note of them. Within a week I was told I was for the superintendent's office.

14,322. You got an answer I am glad to see quicker than sometimes happens with some of us.—I was very pleased with them myself. I wrote and thanked them after I came out.

14,323. They got a report from the superintendent, and after that they pegged away at it for some time.—I do not know whether they did or not; I was never told that.

14,324. I can assure you the Board of Control did not leave the matter alone, because there is a series of communications here with the medical superintendent; and consequently you were ultimately discharged on the 12th April. I do not think it was very wise in the first letter you wrote to the Board of Control to put this in?—I know exactly what is coming.

14,325. I think it was perhaps a little unwise because they might not have taken it as a joke?—It did not seem to do much harm. It is perfectly true, is it not? That explains my position, if I may hand in this letter. (Handing in a letter.)

14,326. This was written after you came out?—After I came out.

14,327. Would you like me to read it out?—I do not mind.

(The letter was read by the Chairman.)

I had no reply to that.

14,328. Now what you were complaining of there was that the Insurance Company had a certificate about you which contained an incorrect diagnosis?—Yes. I think I have proved that up to the hilt; I do not think there is any query about that.

14,329. Sir David Drummond: Whose diagnosis was that?—Dr. M's. He was the senior doctor, and that was the doctor I applied to for discharge.

14,330. Mr. Micklem: Was this one of the asylum doctors?—Yes; I was under him for a number of years. As a matter of fact it was Dr. G. who moved me out of the observation ward.

14,331. Chairman: There is one question I should like to put to you about that certificate. Enquiries have been made of the Insurance Company to find out about this matter, and they have sent on a series of certificates signed by Dr. M. about you dated in 1915 and 1916, and none of them say anything about this unpleasant matter of general paralysis. I have the certificates signed by Dr. M. and they are different from this?—Yes, I can draw my own conclusion.

14,332. What is that?—It may be a serious one to you as a legal gentleman. I made trouble at the Company's Office over that, when it was shown to me, and I imagine it is possible that that other certificate was destroyed after I went and made a bother about it. I applied and the solicitor who took my statement knew nothing about this until 12 months afterwards.

14,333. Mr. Micklem: That is not the original.—I applied for it, but I was told as well that they could find no trace of it.

14,334. Sir Ernest Hiley: Did you see the certificate?—I saw it actually and took it down from memory, practically word for word, as it was. I did not apply for it; not for over a twelvemonth; it was only three months ago that I made any application for it.

14,335. Chairman: I do not see any reason for saying anything about general paralysis. As far as I can see, what the Company wanted to know was whether you were in an asylum and were fit to manage your affairs?—No, excuse me, that was not the point. At one time when my wife did not keep up the payments of the policy she went and enquired about it, and they told her she could have the bonuses commuted and paid for premiums, and they came and obtained my signature for that. I gave my signature for that when it was to their interest for keeping the premiums up. When I wanted to make the policy over to my wife she went and made a complaint and they said: No, it was for my life, and my life alone. The only thing I could do was to make it over to her. When I wanted to make it over to her they would not accept my signature. When I was told this at the office I asked why my signature could be taken when it was to the interest of the company to take it, and when it was to my interest to transfer the policy to my wife my signature could not be taken. The gentleman told me then "You were in such a serious state of health that we could not possibly accept your signature."

14,336. Let me put this to you. It is pretty obvious you have not general paralysis, but, on the other hand, doctors may make a mistake in diagnosis just as an engineer may make a mistake in a calculation, or I may make a mistake in law?—Exactly.

14,337. Are you sure that at this time you did not show symptoms which might quite reasonably have been interpreted to mean that you had general paralysis?—I do not think so. If so, can you explain the reason why they never treated me for the blood test? That was never done for me from first to last, the whole time I was there; I was inoculated for typhoid, but the blood test was never taken from me.

14,338. Now I am afraid our time is a little limited. You have given a most useful survey of various points. Have you anything else you specially desire to mention before us?—In the first place, I think that what is required before certification, especially in a case like my own, is, that there should be an intermediate stage. I mean to say, I was a cost of £600 or £700 to the ratepayers. With six months' treatment in a home of rest—

14,339. You need not go into that; other witnesses have indicated it. What one wants to get from you is what you have encountered yourself?—As regards the brutality of the attendants, that is another point. My one complaint is this, that even yesterday—it is not a question of past years, but even yesterday—the "Daily Chronicle" contained an advertisement for female nurses; and it is practically tantamount to this, that if you want a man to look after your pigs or poultry or your dogs, you want a man with previous experience. When you want anyone to look after your mental patients, no previous experience is required. Only yesterday in the "Chronicle" they are advertising for young girls from 16.

14,340. But they must learn the job at some time?—That is so, but I do not suppose you would care to go into a barber's shop and be shaved by the barber's boy. At any rate, my point is this, that you have there an advertisement for nurses. No previous experience is demanded; but if she can play the piano that is an inducement for which she should be appointed. She is 16 years of age. Do the Commission consider it right to put a girl of 16 in charge of women of all ages up to 80? As regards the men attendants, it is worse still. You do not require mental experience in an attendant. Neither in my opinion is it necessary to have prize fighters, men who have served in the Army, and to advertise the fact if they can play football, or play in the band; that is a very necessary adjunct, but it is not necessary to have any mental training whatever. There are good, bad and indifferent, as we all know. In my own experience I have met some very fine fellows amongst the attendants; on the other hand, I have met men I would not touch with a long stick. men who are absolute brutes. I have seen cases of gross brutality by individuals who have come in in the morning the worse for drink, who have gone into the single rooms, when the patient has been not able perhaps to help himself and has made a mess. They have pulled the poor things right up in front of me, dashed them on the ground, and picked them up again, and kneed them in the stomach. That is the awful part of it; they do not mark the patients so that they can be found out; they have the practice of kneeling them. As I say, it is not only in the morning. I have even seen a night attendant, because a patient was snoring, do the same thing with him; he was a neurotic man himself, never fit for a night attendant, sleeping in the centre of the room, with a patient on each side of him. Those are the things I have seen myself. As I have said in my précis, I have seen another patient who was a deaf and dumb mute, he was not actually so by birth, but he had not spoken for many years. When that man was out in the fields, he was objectionable to the attendant, refractory in some slight way, and the attendant absolutely kneed him to such an extent that it was the nearest approach, in my experience, to speaking I had ever heard; he was more like a dumb animal in pain. That was simply through the brutality of the attendant.

14,341. What happened to that attendant?—As a matter of fact, he served a term of imprisonment for nearly killing two game-keepers after he got his discharge from the hospital. His wife got him discharged from there after he had had about 16 or 18 years' service, but then he went poaching, and he nearly killed two game-keepers there. For that he served a term of imprisonment. That is the type of man you have in your mental hospitals.

14,342. What do you think is the best way to prevent things of that sort?—I think the best way would be to have a better and more suitable class of attendants in the first place.

Mr. E. called and examined.

14,350. Chairman: We would like to have from you a little of your personal experiences in L., and perhaps we may get one or two facts about you first of all. I think you are 57 years old?—Yes.

14,351. And your experience was in L.?—Yes.

14,352. You were there from August 1921 till you were discharged in July 1924 "Relieved"?—Yes.

14,353. So you were there about three years?—Yes.

14,354. Now, as you can understand, we have not a great deal of time to go into all your history, and the most useful thing you could do would be to tell us anything in your experiences of L. which you think was wrong, and which you would like to put right. We want just the things that struck you as important things?—The thing that struck me through the whole of my career there and my detention are the utter lack of honesty of purpose.

14,355. What do you mean by that?—There was no object in detaining a man, no object at all. I asked the superintendent on one occasion—I said to him: "Is there any integrity in this institution?" He said: "Well, I should hope so." That was one thing. Then another thing I was told there was: "As long as you maintain there was nothing at all the matter with you when you came in, so long will you be detained here."

14,356. Do you think you should never have been there at all, or do you think you should have been out sooner?—I am perfectly sure there was never any foundation in the whole course of my life for my being sent to a lunatic asylum. I never had a moment's mental aberration in my life, asleep or awake.

14,357. There was a doctor who examined you, was there not?—Several.

14,358. Do you think they were all wrong in imagining you were mentally afflicted?—No, I am not going to say they were all wrong, but the principle of 14,343. Better supervision?—I do not see how you can supervise when it is a question of two attendants taking out a gang of men into the fields.

14,344. Whatever precautions you take, you cannot make all attendants perfect?—No, but you can improve the position very much.

14,345. Could such a person, assaulted as you have described, not complain effectively to the doctor?—I do not want to be humorous, but in that particular instance it would have been impossible.

14,346. But I was thinking of the other cases?—In the other cases the point is that, as a matter of fact, that night attendant must have been reported at some time or other for his brutality to patients, because after a number of years being the night attendant in charge of the dormitory, he was removed from that position and was put on just as a relieving man, going round relieving other attendants. He was not discharged then, but someone must have reported him.

14,347. Mr. Micklem: Were most of the attendants in your time humane and kind people?—As I have said previously, I have met some very fine individuals indeed, but they are a mixed party altogether. I will say that a very good proportion of them are very decent men indeed; but, unfortunately, there are quite a number who are otherwise.

14,348. Chairman: And in order to remedy that, it seems to me that you want to provide, if possible, a higher standard of attendant, and means of supervision and protection of the patient against brutality?—Exactly. Under present circumstances, unless some provision is made, there is no precaution taken to see that the patient is not ill-used still further, and then it is one constant recrimination between patient and attendant.

14,349. Chairman: We are much obliged to you for attending to-day and for what you have told us.

it was all wrong. There was one doctor there, Dr. S., and after I was detained there four months he recommended me for discharge. He said: "You have committed no crime; I do not see anything the matter with you"; but he said: "You have had a bad cold, you have been laid up. I should stay a little while longer if I were you." He said: "I will put your name forward for discharge." I said: "I do not want to stay one minute longer; I want to get out and take up the threads of my former life." After that, after a lapse of about 18 months, he simply denied that he had said so, and yet Dr. S. was very, very nice to me, a man I had every respect for. I cannot say so much for the others. There was a Dr. P. there; he was the one that received me into the institution. It was simply general routine that I went through, but after I was there about two years, I said in despair to him one day: "Is there any likelihood of my getting out of this institution?" and he turned round and said most seriously: "None whatever; you will simply have to wait for an earthquake." I reported that to the superintendent; I reported it to Mr. P. He was a sort of a general supreme head attendant there. I also wrote to the Board of Control, and I got no answer from them. He simply assured me there was no chance of my ever getting my freedom.

14,359. But you did get some letter from the Board of Control?—Just simply to say that the visiting committee would see me on the next occasion.

14,360. Then I see, after you had written complaining, the Board of Control wrote to the Superintendent of L. about you to find out what there was in the complaint?—I am not aware of it.

14,361. Of course you would not know of that. It is to show that the Board of Control took that amount of interest in your case?—That is the first knowledge I have of it.

Mr. E.

14,362. I find on the 23rd November, 1922, a letter from the Secretary of the Board of Control to the Superintendent of L. saying: "I am directed by the Commissioners of the Board of Control to send you the enclosed letter which they have received from —; and to request you, in returning it, to favour them with your observations on the part marked in blue; the Board will also be glad to know what opportunities he has recently had of seeing members of the visiting committee, and whether anything can be done to satisfy the patient on this point." You see they were looking after you?—Without my knowledge.

14,363. Now is it not the case that at this time you were giving some trouble in the institution?—I can explain that, if you came to details.

14,364. We have of course the certificates about you at the time, and some of the things they say about you are not just very complimentary?—I will be truthful, and I hope I am polite.

14,365. At this time they say your behaviour was hostile and aggressive, and you thought you were the victim of persecution, and you were saying you were what was known at that time as the T. murderer; do you remember that?—That is all to be explained away quite easily. It was like this: I was over in Czecho-Slovakia. I had a little trouble there, and I came back; and the first thing I got to be aware of was what was going on in the papers as to this T. murder. I took no notice whatever of it, but there were one or two coincidences (you know how coincidences will arise), and I made a casual joke about it. I said "I must be T." just casually, but there was nothing more than that in it.

14,366. Have you anything else that occurred during your experience which you would like to bring before us?—I asked the doctor one day when I was in the hospital ward "What are you going to do with me eventually?" He said "I am going to get rid of you," and after a moment's hesitation he went on a little further, and he turned round to me and said "You know what was the matter with you when you came in." I said "Yes, nothing at all; I have never had anything wrong with me; I have never had five minutes' aberration in the whole course of my life, asleep or awake." Of course I expected to get in trouble for saying that, and I apologised to him immediately afterwards. I said "I am sorry I spoke so candidly, but still I am of an open disposition and I cannot help saying candidly what I think."

14,367. How did you get out in the end?—My brother-in-law claimed me out, and he had a great deal of trouble to claim me out because there were such far-fetched reports about me given to him. The very last report given to him about me was that Dr. C. said that I was far too indecent a man to be allowed my liberty. I told Dr. C. I had become aware of what he said to my brother in law, and I said to Dr. C. "It is nothing more or less than a downright slander on your part. Surely, if you have a code of honour at all, it is your duty to your ownself to write and apologise for the slander you have committed to me about my brother-in-law." I said "You know perfectly well I am not indecent; you know perfectly well I am a well conducted man."

14,368. But your brother-in-law ultimately got the medical superintendent to discharge you?—Yes, he did.

14,369. And you were discharged "Relieved?"—Yes. My trouble was really—and this is the first time I have ever had such a thought, sitting before you—I believe the foundation of all my trouble there was my failure to go against my conscience. The head attendant said to me "So long as you maintain that there is nothing the matter with you, so long you will be kept here"; and the very next day I went to the Roman Catholic priest, I was very friendly with him, and I said "Would you, as a priest, allow me to go against my own conscience in order to obtain my liberty?" and he said "No." I said "I only asked you as a matter of form," and I told him what had occurred the day previously.

14,370. Do you suggest that they would not let you out until you admitted you ought to have been in?—That is what the attendant said. The whole thing is that there was no honesty of purpose in the asylum whatever, because I was perfectly sane.

14,371. Then your complaint really is that you should never have been in the asylum at all?—Absolutely so.

14,372. Sir David Drummond: Do you mean that you never had any delusions at any time?—No, none whatever.

14,373. When you thought people were persecuting you, they were really persecuting you?—I never thought people persecuted me, not to use the word "persecution." The word "persecution" is the wrong word to use. I simply recognised one or two facts that had occurred as extraordinary coincidences, not persecution.

14,374. Sir Humphry Rolleston: May I ask what your occupation is now?—For a good many years I was a bookmaker's clerk over in Austria and Bohemia; that is how I came to be sent across to Prague, because I speak Czechish.

14,375. Is that your occupation at the present time?—Not at present, not what you may call an occupation, but I am in the Home down at B.; I am doing work there and getting my food and lodging free until something turns up.

14,376. You are in a home now?—Yes; I am very comfortable there.

14,377. Chairman: The aspect of the thing that interests us most is whether during the course of your experience in the asylum, apart from the fact that you say you should never have been there at all, there were any things of which you had to complain while you were there?—With regard to the treatment?

14,378. Treatment, or the conditions of life, or anything else, which you think you have good cause to complain of?—With regard to the food, nothing at all.

14,379. What about the attendants?—The attendants were all right with me with the exception of one occasion; I jibbed to take the weekly "black jack," because I found it did not agree with me; then I was maltreated.

14,380. That is the weekly medicine?—Yes.

14,381. How were you maltreated?—I was winded; I was got down on the ground, and three or four attendants kneeled on me and administered this weekly medicine, while I had no breath in my body at all. Then they pummelled me a little bit afterwards—a good deal.

14,382. Why did they do that?—Because I strongly objected to taking it.

14,383. And they made you take it?—Yes, they made me take it. Then another thing: sometimes they put a man in bed for one thing for a whole month. When a man is perfectly physically well they keep a man in bed for a whole month in a cell and deprive him of even the Bible to read, and that is a big punishment, to be kept in bed for that length of time.

14,384. Was that done to you ever?—Yes, it was done to me. Would you like me to use plain language?

14,385. Please?—I was lying on the grass in the exercise yard one afternoon, and there was an attendant there named H., who was eventually discharged for maltreating another patient. I was rather stout at the time and he said to me, "Come on mudguts; you are always the last." He called me that name and I resented it and I said to him—he was an ex-constable—"You have no right to call me names like that; you are exceeding your duty. You are no more fit for an asylum attendant than you apparently were for a policeman," and with that he pummelled me. Of course, I got the worst of it, and I was put to bed for a whole month.

14,386. Not because of the pummelling?—No, because of his accusation against me.

14,387. Is there any other incident you would like to tell us about?—There is a multiplicity of them.

14,388. But I mean is there anything serious that you think we should hear about, not just trifles, but anything serious?—The thing is, that what you as gentlemen on the Royal Commission should endeavour to get at is the spirit of the institution underlying the camouflage of it. The camouflage of it is beautiful, everything is all right. An outside gentleman, or even an outside Commission enquiring into this could never possibly get at the spirit of the place. The spirit of the place towards the sane man is almost like this: if you know you are well and say you are well, in consequence you are absolutely incurable.

14,389. How does anybody ever get out?—I do not know; it is a wonder to me. I consider myself very lucky in getting out.

14,390. How is this spirit to be improved? Have you any idea?—First of all, you have visits from the guardians and then you have the visiting committee. When the guardians came down on one occasion, I said "What on earth can I say to you to convince you that I ought not to be here? I assured you the time before that I am simply a compulsory imposter on the rates, and I should not be detained here one minute and should never have been here at all." On another occasion the visiting committee came round and I then explained to them "I am sane." It seems to me the very fact of saying you are sane is almost a guarantee that you are insane, if you can follow what I mean.

14,391. I think we see the purport of your evidence. Unless any of my colleagues would like to ask you further questions, I do not propose to keep you longer. We are much indebted to you for coming to us to-day. —I hope the result of this Royal Commission will put things on an honest basis, because, so far as my limited intelligence goes, I can see a big scope for improvement in the asylums with regard to the detention of sane men there.

14,392. That is your special point I take it?—Well, I think it is a big point, do not you?

14,393. Very big indeed.

EVIDENCE TAKEN IN PRIVATE.

Miss C. called and examined.

14,394. Deputy-Chairman: You have already furnished us with some information. I understand you want to give further oral evidence to the Commission?—I suggested that I should really. I did not expect that I would be called, so I put most of it in writing.

14,395. I understand you have had experience both of a private institution and of a public institution?—Yes.

14,396. You were first, I think, at C., a licensed house?—Yes.

14,397. That was from August to November of 1918?—Yes.

14,398. And then subsequently in December of 1920 you went to the S. Mental Hospital?—Yes.

14,399. And you were there until June of 1921?—Oh, no—that was only five weeks at the most.

23 March, 1925.]

Miss C.

14,400. You were out on trial after that time; you were not discharged?—No. I was living in my flat in London.

14,401. You were only a few weeks in the hospital?—I think it was five weeks, because Dr. S. could not get my people to get me out.

14,402. After you had been there some five weeks you were let out on trial and were living in your own flat?—I lived at B. for a month or so in a home with Mrs. R., and then after that Dr. S. allowed me further freedom which was to go to my flat, which was empty.

14,403. And ultimately you were discharged in June of 1921?—Yes.

14,404. You have formed from your experience some definite conclusion, have you not, as to the advantages of the public institutions over the private institutions?—The conclusion I have formed very definitely is that there should not be such a thing as a private institution; there should be no traffic in the sanity of people; that is absolutely definite.

14,405. But you appreciate, I suppose, that there is a considerable demand by many patients for these private houses?—I cannot see why they should not be put in public institutions, and by paying extra get extra luxuries or extra accommodation.

14,406. But do you mean you would like to see the public institutions so extended that private patients could get what they wanted there on paying for it?—Yes.

14,407. What is your objection to the private institution?—I consider that it is a traffic in the sanity of the public.

14,408. But observe, if it is a public institution the same thing would apply if you could pay what you liked?—No, because they would not be making profit. They would be paying for what they got.

14,409. The institution would be making profit; they could run the poorer part of the institution at the expense of the expensive part?—If they did what I did at S. I paid a little extra there for extra things I had.

14,410. At S. you had a room to yourself?—Yes, and I had extra food. Any extra food I got was paid for; and if by any chance my payment was helping the poorer people, why not?

14,411. Is yours just a theoretical objection to a private house?—No, it is just what I saw at C.

14,412. What did you see at C. which led you to think that it is a disadvantage to allow these licensed houses?—I think the tendency of everybody in the institution is to keep people instead of letting them go.

14,413. You mean where the doctor is making a considerable profit, then it is in his interest?—Naturally; the profit is going to the shareholders, and the more profit they make the better pleased they are with the doctor.

14,414. Did any instances come under your observation of persons being detained longer than they ought to have been there?—Yes. There was one lady whose name I regret I cannot tell you, who was in the room with me the last few months I was there; she had been five years there. As far as I could see she was the most calm and normal person I had ever met. Her story was that she was a rich woman of rather humble origin, who had married an army man above her in position. He had taken her money and she was being kept there while the money was used. Probably she had not the power to defend herself.

14,415. Was any other instance brought to your observation?—There was a lady there, Madame B., who subsequently got herself released.

14,416. You do not think that you yourself were detained at C. too long, do you?—Of course; but everyone does not think so.

14,417. That is a common view, you think?—I escaped because I thought so.

14,418. You were there only a comparatively short time?—I was there from August 23rd to November 13th, 1918. It seemed a lifetime.

14,419. Were you comfortable yourself while you were there?—No, very uncomfortable.

14,420. Had you anything to find fault with?—Yes, lots of things.

14,421. Would you just tell us what they are?—To begin with I was suffering terribly from sleeplessness, and I was put in a room with 12 people who were not in good health, who did various tricks, and I could not sleep at all; and the nurses talked all night, they came in and chatted and laughed all the night in the ward. The night watch went round every two hours and turned a bright lantern on to one; it was the most impossible treatment.

14,422. Were you in that room the whole of the time?—All except about a fortnight. It is called the observation ward, and under the title of observation they simply torture you at nights.

14,423. You were paying a comparatively low remuneration?—Four guineas a week. The food was terrible. Of course it was war time, and perhaps it is not fair for me to criticise the food because in war time it had to be so.

14,424. A good many of the patients would pay larger fees?—Those who had rooms. Madame B.'s husband was paying 7 guineas a week, and she only had a room to herself part of the time.

14,425. You will appreciate that it would be difficult to give a patient only paying four guineas a separate room?—Afterwards I was removed into a room with four people, which was much pleasanter; I need not have been all that time in that room, and the treatment was abominable.

14,426. When you say the treatment was abominable, would you tell us exactly what you mean, because we want to find out, if we can, exactly what goes on?—To begin with as to this room, the doctors should have realised that I probably wanted to sleep—that was what partly upset my nerves; and they should have tried to make me sleep instead of stopping sleep; I got rapidly worse with getting so little sleep.

14,427. Do you mean they should have given you a separate room, or given you some sedative?—No. I think they should have seen that the ward was quieter or put one with suitable people. There were lots of rooms.

14,428. How many people were there in the institution altogether?—I think there might have been up to 600; I cannot tell you. I was in what was called the convalescent ward.

14,429. You were in one of the villas?—The convalescent house; it is the house from which you go out.

14,430. Something detached from the main building?—Yes. We went to the main building every now and again for entertainments.

14,431. Earl Russell: You were in the convalescent ward?—Yes, always.

14,432. And even there you had these noisy patients, had you?—Terrible, there was one who talked all night, and one who had St. Vitus's Dance; she kept jumping up and down.

14,433. Deputy-Chairman: Were those patients, there all the time with you?—Yes, all the time.

14,434. Mrs. Mathew: Miss C., you used the term "observation ward": Were you in the observation ward?—This ward in the convalescent house is what is called the observation ward; there are also rooms where they have three or four people, and these are separate rooms.

14,435. Deputy-Chairman: Apart from this question of insomnia, had you anything else to complain of?—Yes. Of course it was war time. Perhaps I came on at a very bad time. They were not able to have fires in all the rooms. We only had a fire in the living room, and we all had to sit round this fire.

14,436. What rooms had you to be in, apart from the dormitory. A living room?—You are never allowed to sit in your bedroom; you are never allowed to be by yourself. You had the dining room which had a kind of lounge place off it. Then there was a long living room, and in the summer time there was a verandah in the garden.

Miss C.

14,437. Everything was very comfortable for you as far as the surroundings were concerned?—Yes. Perhaps if it had not been war time it would have been better. Of course then they were short of fires. We all had to be herded in one room, where if it was not war time you would be in two rooms.

14,438. To some extent you think the food was rather poor food?—Yes, it was very poor food.

14,439. At that time we were all suffering in the same way?—Of course I do not say anything about the food, because in war time it had to be so. We perhaps got as much as was given then; I think they were attentive to the food.

14,440. After you had been there for some few months you made your escape?—Yes, I got a letter. Would you care to know the circumstances, the way I made my escape?

14,441. You might tell us about that?—Unfortunately they treat lunatics as people who must not be told the truth, which to my mind is the greatest fallacy in the treatment, because Dr. S. acted quite differently. They dig pits for you; you do not know anything about it, you fall into these pits. Dr. E. was always telling me I was just going. Every time I asked him he said: "Perhaps next week, certainly very soon." I believed him implicitly. The nurses always told me so. I had not seen my papers, I had not the faintest idea what I was really there for. I was believing Dr. E., and suddenly I got a letter from my mother in which she said "Poor girl, I am sorry for you, but never mind, H. (that is my brother) will be home in May, and then we will see what can be done for you." This was the 13th November, and that was six months till May. Then I knew quite suddenly, it came to me, that I was being absolutely deceived. Then I distrusted everybody. I went and saw the sister and asked about some of the things she had been saying to me. I said "Were those things false?" and she said, "Of course those things were false, your reason should have told you they were false."

14,442. It may be in some cases inadvisable to let patients know?—No; if you are so insane, as that it does not matter. If one is sane, as I believe I was, it is much better to know the truth. Dr. S. at the S. Mental Hospital acted differently with me, and I was very different under his care.

14,443. Have you any complaint to make of the attendants or nurses while you were in the private home?—Yes, they were quite different from all the other nurses; it was quite a different atmosphere the whole place, even granting they were acting for the best.

14,444. It was different from the public hospital, you mean?—Quite.

14,445. In what respect did the atmosphere differ?—You got the idea while living in C. that you were there for the sake of the institution. You were there for life, and it did not matter whether you got better or not; a hopeless and helpless place.

14,446. Earl Russell: You will bear in mind that a very large number of patients are discharged from C. every year. The records show that, you know?—I am awfully surprised at it, really. The building only holds so many, and they have to make room for somebody else—that is what I should say it was.

14,447. Deputy-Chairman: I think you wish to make some observation about the escape clause?—I was getting rapidly worse under the treatment there; I was terrified of myself there. When I got this letter from my mother I did not know what to do to get away. In a way I am not going to blame Dr. E., because if I were sent there certified he had to accept me at that. He was in a difficult position.

14,448. While you were there had you any visitors?—Yes, and every friend of mine who came to see me was warned about me. I did not have many. One day a lady came and she was allowed to take me out, but she was warned by the doctor how frightfully bad I was. It was very brave of her to take me out.

14,449. But you had visitors come to you?—Yes, I had visitors come to see me.

14,450. Had you any official visitors to see you?—Yes, I had visitors from the Board of Control—two of them.

14,451. Do you remember who you saw?—Yes. Is it necessary to mention names—because I consider they were perfectly useless.

14,452. Earl Russell: You might as well mention them.—One was Mr. Trevor, a very pleasant man, and the other was Miss Dendy, who was no good at all.

14,453. You had conversations with them?—Yes.

14,454. Was there any other official visitor?—When I got in first there was a justice of the peace who saw me, a little man came in one day just after I arrived. We people who go into an asylum do not know anything about the Lunacy Acts.

14,455. You do not quite appreciate who the persons are?—No, nothing is told you, you are absolutely at sea; you do not know who the people are.

14,456. This is the private asylum you are speaking of, is it?—Yes.

14,457. Could you tell us at an early stage what happened before you were taken there, if you remember? I should like to know exactly how you got there?—Long before I was put in that place doctors were called in to see me by L. the solicitor, and I maintain here that he could put anybody in an asylum provided they were not rich enough to protect themselves. Under the present safeguards you have no protection against a man like that, who wishes to put insanity on you.

14,458. The doctors had then seen you and you did not know they had signed your certificate?—No, I was taken from a prison.

14,459. Deputy-Chairman: There were certificates by M.C.?—M.C. was sent to my house by L., and he certified me on the spot, because he had already heard what L. had told him and also my family, and these stories were not true, and they were never investigated. Therefore M. C. accepted what L. had told him, and he certified me. His difficulty was that he could not get the other doctor to do it; my medical attendant refused to do it.

14,460. Then afterwards you went to H.?—Afterwards they took me to prison.

14,461. Then a magistrate was called in?—When I got to C. a magistrate came; I do not know what authority he had.

14,462. You escaped in November of 1918, and then I think you were certified again in December of 1920. Did you go to friends, or did you go home when you escaped?—I went to friends.

14,463. And stayed with them?—I meant really to go down to my sister, my petitioner, and ask her to remove me to B., because I knew I should always get worse at C. When I got to the station I remembered a friend that I thought would lend me some money, and I thought I would go and see her. When I went to see her and her husband, I told them about the escape clause, and that 14 days would free me if I could escape. They were willing to help me, though I could not stay in their house; but they gave me their support.

14,464. Then later on, in November, 1920, you went to the S. Mental Hospital?—Yes, I was taken to that hospital. That was because with the escape clause you are never quite free from surveillance. That had nothing to do with the original thing at all.

14,465. The certificates were very much alike, in both cases?—There was no reason for that. My offence in the second act had nothing whatever to do with the first. They simply used the fact that I had lost my temper to shut me up again. It was nothing whatever to do with the original cause; it was all put on me.

14,466. You found your treatment very much better in the S. Mental Hospital than it had been in C?—Yes, much better.

Miss C.

14,467. You were there, I suppose, first in an observation ward?—Yes. I was only two days in it—two nights.

14,468. Had you the same experience in that ward that you had at C.?—Yes. That was a terrible ward, but everyone has to go through it.

14,469. I suppose there are a large number of patients in that place?—Yes; it is a terrible place.

14,470. Was it an admission ward?—I should think it is the admission ward. Every patient that is certified has to go through that, I should imagine.

14,471. Immediately after that, you were put in another ward, after two days?—Yes; No. 1 ward.

14,472. Was Dr. S. your medical superintendent there?—Yes.

14,473. And you found him exceedingly kind?—A very nice man, a very humane man.

14,474. One of the things that I think you found fault with in the private asylum was that you had no occupation?—No, there was nothing arranged for one. Some people make their occupations.

14,475. I suppose there are opportunities of reading and writing, and taking exercise, and so on?—Oh yes.

14,476. I notice that while you were at C., in one of the reports you were said to be cheerful and occupied most of your time?—I walked round the garden a good lot; you could not get out, so you walked round the garden, ran round it a great deal, too.

14,477. Inside the house how did you occupy yourself?—I talked with the other patients, and got worse, as far as I could see.

14,478. Now you say you were only in the public mental hospital for five weeks?—I think five; it may have been less even than that. I would have been out sooner, but Dr. S. found it difficult. The petitioner did not want to have me out. They were so imbued with what all the other doctors said; they would not take the responsibility.

14,479. The doctor wished you to stay at B.?—Yes; I was there for three weeks, I think.

14,480. And then you went to your own flat?—Yes. I stayed with a friend on the way to the flat.

14,481. Have you anything to find fault with in your treatment at the S. Mental Hospital?—Nothing, of course I had a room to myself; I was very lucky; Dr. S. thought I needed to be quiet, I think. They were very kind to me, indeed. Beyond that, I think the restrictions that you have to have in an asylum want remedying. I think there are lots of things that want remedying.

14,482. Will you just suggest what improvements you think could be made at the S. Mental Hospital?—To begin with, they send the patients off to bed far too early. I did not go so early; they were very kind and allowed me to play bridge, but the other side do go to bed frightfully early, about seven or half-past seven. Of course, the nurses are glad to be rid of them, naturally, but they are awfully long nights. They get up too early, too, far too early. It would be better to have more nurses and give the nurses shifts, as in factories.

14,483. We know that in many of the hospitals that system has been adopted?—Has it?

14,484. I do not know that it has been in this particular one?—I am glad to hear that.

14,485. Earl Russell: Would you consider this point on that: how do the hours at which they get up compare, as regards the average patient, with the hours at which they get up at home in their normal life? Are they not more or less the same?—If you are going to work you have to get up early, but if you are not going to work your days are very long.

14,486. I am only thinking whether they are not really carrying out the normal life of the average class of patient. What should you say to that?—I think perhaps you would, because most of them are drawn from the working class.

14,487. Of course we have often considered these hours, and to us they appear naturally rather odd hours?—Yes; it is the going to bed that seemed too early. I was in the convalescent ward in both places.

14,488. Mr. Snell: Would you say the going to bed early, or the getting up early is so objectionable?—It is going to bed so early.

14,489. Earl Russell: Could you tell us anything about the evening meal at the S. Mental Hospital. Did you get anything after tea or not?—Yes, we had supper.

14,490. About what time—about seven?—We had dinner, and then we had supper.

14,491. You were more fortunate than some places?—It was very plain food, but quite enough.

14,492. Deputy-Chairman: Did that apply to all the patients in the hospital—those who went to bed early?—I think perhaps we had our early dinner at one; then we had tea in the ward; we used to make ourselves tea in the ward; and then we had a sort of evening meal.

14,493. Mr. Snell: What time was it, do you think?—I think it was about seven.

14,494. Then they would go to bed immediately after?—Yes, the wards were cleared immediately after. One can understand the nurses being glad to get free.

14,495. Deputy-Chairman: Of course you were a private patient there?—Yes, I was a private patient there, but I was with all the other patients. The tea was made in the wards; that was where the work was all arranged. One lady would have charge of making tea, that would be her job, and I was polishing the wards; then another had laundry work, and so on. Then in the afternoon we sat all round, and got our cups of tea and a biscuit, or whatever it was.

14,496. For the ordinary patients in the hospital was there a further meal later on?—Yes, we all had a meal, I had fish or eggs, or something, because I was paying extra. There was a case of a girl who was frightfully poor; her brother was paying for her; she was an awfully nice girl, and she did not want her brother to have to pay a penny more than was necessary. She needed food, and Dr. S. gave her extra food because she required it. If we who pay extra are paying for that, all the better. That is why I think the more paying patients you have in public hospitals the better for other people.

14,497. Does that extra meal apply to all the patients?—Yes, we all got that evening meal. I cannot say what hour it was, but we had breakfast, dinner, and this evening meal. We had a cup of tea in the ward. It was generally bread and butter and cheese.

14,498. How did the efficiency of the nurses strike you at the S. Mental Hospital? Were they a good and effective set of nurses?—Yes. They were very businesslike; they attended to their job, and were very well superintended.

14,499. Earl Russell: Were they at all rough in their manner with the patients?—I did not find any like that. I was very lucky; I had a very nice nurse there. Of course, remember, I am only speaking of the convalescent ward; the people were more or less normal. I found them very nice and very efficient girls; they were young.

14,500. Mrs. Mathew: Were they better than the nurses at C. private asylum?—Much; very superior, I thought. Another thing is that in C. if you had a complaint, if you thought there was anything wrong, it is only listened to if the nurse allows it to be listened to, because they always take her word for it. On one occasion at C. I had to make a complaint about the bath; the doctor and his wife came and saw whether it was true or not, they did not accept it as a delusion. They came and saw that what I was saying was true.

14,501. Deputy-Chairman: In C?—No, this was at S. I stayed too short a time in my bath because it was all covered with the soapsuds of the people who had had the bath; it had not been properly rinsed out; I did not like it, so I jumped in and out, and the nurse complained that I had not taken a proper bath. When I gave the reason they appreciated the point, and they came around the next time there was a bath and saw that the bath was properly arranged for each person. Of course the nurse had been just a little careless.

Miss C.

14,502. Did you find that all the bathing and sanitary arrangements in the hospital were good?—Yes, very. Considering the way things were, it was very good. There is an awful lot, of course, to be remedied. You want a great deal more space for asylums.

14,503. Do you mean in the wards, or do you mean space outside?—Outside you want more space.

14,504. At the S. Hospital what grounds were there?—We had a very small paddock; not nearly so large a garden as at C. It was rather tiring walking round and round it.

14,505. Where is the S. Mental Hospital?—At D. 14,506. D. Heath, is that?—No, I do not think it is on the heath. It is frightfully flat and uninteresting.

14,507. And comparatively small grounds?—Yes, the different wards have their different paddocks, and it would be an advantage to have larger gardens, of course.

14,508. Mrs. Mathew: How many were there at the S. Hospital?—I imagine there were not so many as at C. I am not very accurate about figures. Another thing, the general dining room was quite cheerful; you went in there every day; the more convalescent patients from the men's side and the women's side all dined in this big room. We had music sometimes upstairs in the balcony.

14,509. Earl Russell: I gather from the report that you were always what was called a good patient; you were never put in the refractory ward, or anything of that sort; you were one of the good patients?—There was never anything wrong with me at all.

14,510. Deputy-Chairman: Now I think you want to tell the Commission some views that you have about the after care of patients?—Yes, I think it is a great pity that the patient should not be sent to someone she likes and chooses; amongst the friends the patient chooses there would surely be some they could approve of. It is a great pity to send you back to the people who put you in, which is generally what is done. The petitioner takes you out, and of course you are always very annoyed with the people who put you in.

14,511. You are rather in the hands of the petitioner there; you cannot get your discharge without the petitioner's consent?—I think if the doctor thinks it is right you should be discharged, it is not a question for the petitioner to choose where you are to go.

14,512. In some cases one can appreciate that is so, but in most cases one would expect patients to go back to their families?—Why should you go back? If the circumstances have sent you to an asylum, why should you return to them?

14,513. In the ordinary case one must assume the patient has been sent to the asylum by their relatives, because it was in the interest of the patient that he or she should go?—That is an absolute fallacy. You are sent by your relations and people because you are a nuisance to them. Why should you return to them if you are a nuisance to them? It is not for your good at all; it is for their good more often than yourself.

14,514. I suppose the patient coming out must go somewhere. Do you think it should be left to the medical superintendent to find a place for them?—Yes, Dr. S. found me a place. If he is interested in his patients, as a good doctor would be, he will consult with the patient, and find out between them what is going to be the best thing for the patient.

14,515. Now with reference to this after care question, you know we are rather interested in seeing what provision can be made for those who require some further supervision, or who have no place to go to—an After-Care Association?—Yes.

14,516. You are not dealing with them, are you? Your point is that the patient should have an option of going where he or she pleases?—If it is a question of sending you back to your friends, or people who put you in, the petitioner, then the patient should have the choice of whether she will go there or not. If it is a question of sending you back to a home then, of course, that could be arranged by the medical superintendent.

14,517. Are you interested at all in the provision made in some places by the After-care Association?—I do not know of them.

14,518. Earl Russell: There are such things as convalescent homes at the seaside for patients who have been actually discharged and freed from certificate.—Are they free, though?

14,519. Oh, yes, perfectly free.—Not under surveillance?

14,520. I do not know about surveillance, but they are not under restraint.—If they are discharged they should be free.

14,521. Deputy-Chairman: Your point is this—if the patient does not want to go back to her relatives, the doctor should make some further provision for her?—Certainly. It argues itself, that the circumstances that have been responsible for putting you in are not the best to return to.

14,522. Another point you make I think is this, that you would like the certificate to be delayed as long as possible, and, if possible, not made at all?—Oh yes.

14,523. There, I think, you hold the view that almost everybody holds—that certification should be delayed till the last possible moment?—Yes, every means should be taken to avoid putting that on people, because it is very difficult to live apart from it afterwards.

14,524. We have had a great deal of evidence about that from other witnesses, and I do not know that I need really trouble you with that, because I think we should all probably be agreed about it?—Might I say this, that I think when people are said to have delusions there should be a judicial enquiry to find out whether the delusion really is a delusion.

14,525. You make the suggestion that there should be some form of judicial enquiry?—Yes, to ascertain definitely that it is a delusion, before you certify them on the ground of it being a delusion.

14,526. That again has been dealt with by a good number of our witnesses. I take your view, but I do not think that we need pursue it really?—No.

14,527. Lastly, you want to give us some suggestion about the nurses. Your view is that the nurses should undergo special training before they are taken on in these places?—Yes.

14,528. Did you find the nurses of a good class in the hospitals?—A frightfully poor class at C., a terrible class of girls, so illiterate. The nurse who wrote the reports, the night nurse who looked after my ward and wrote the report, had no notion of spelling.

14,529. Earl Russell: Being unable to spell is not very important?—But she had not learned properly to write.

14,530. Deputy-Chairman: Was she an effective nurse?—No, she was the least normal person I met in the institution, I think.

14,531. She was one of those who you thought might possibly be under certificate?—Certainly: I should not be surprised if she was at this moment.

14,532. Mrs. Mathew: How old was she?—She was 25 or 27 perhaps. She was a very kind little girl.

14,533. Deputy-Chairman: Your view rather is, that you should get nurses according to the station of the patient?—Yes, I think so.

14,534. Where you are dealing with educated people, if possible, you should have educated nurses?—Exactly, because things that you seem to do may create misunderstanding if they do not understand you. I could give you an instance. I went out with the sister who was at C., who had been a parlour maid; she was promoted from a parlour maid to a sister pretty quickly. We were having tea at a restaurant one day during the war, and we had no milk. I leaned forward to the next table and asked the gentleman there would he mind if I took some milk from the jug while we were waiting. She thought that was very bad. It was a very ordinary thing, was it not?

Miss C.

14,535. It comes to this, does it not, that the more trained nurses you can get in all these cases so much the better?—Yes, they should be trained, and they should be better educated.

14,536. When you are dealing with ordinary diseases, you would not want a person of the same social status as yourself so much as a really educated nurse, a trained nurse. If you were ill you would not want a lady called in so much as a trained nurse?—Yes.

14,537. And that, I suppose, applies in mental hospitals just the same?—Yes; of course, they have got to be trained in their work.

14,538. Are there any other special points you would like to bring before the Commission?—Yes. I think the question of seeing your certificates is terribly important.

14,539. You do not mean that that should apply in every case, do you?—I do, every case.

14,540. Do you mean all the particulars that have been furnished as well as the certificate?—Absolutely.

14,541. Do not you see that on some patients that might have a very bad effect?—I cannot see it; I cannot see that the truth can ever hurt you.

14,542. Are you not arguing rather from your own case?—No.

14,543. You knew perfectly well the substantial facts that were on your certificates, did you not?—No, I had not the faintest idea. If I had, I should have been out of C. long before I was.

14,544. I have looked through a good many of your letters, and letters from others to you. I should have judged that from reading the letters you appreciated the grounds of your being detained?—No, I have never seen the C. papers yet. I would like very much to see them. When I was in C. they told me I was always to continue in the attitude of mind which I had. That is an absolute fact. That was why, when I got my mother's letter and saw I was not getting better and was going to be there for life, that I went to the sister and asked her did she mean the things she had said. If I had seen my certificate I should have had it in writing; I should not have had to take any of her words.

14,545. You had interviews with the doctors before they made their certificates, and you had an interview with the magistrate?—I had an interview with Dr. C., and the things he told me had nothing to do with the certificates. He has since denied he said those things.

14,546. Dr. C. and Dr. P. S., in making their certificates would be guided by what you told them; they would not write these certificates out of their own heads?—Dr. P. S. refused to certify the first time I saw him, before he had a consultation with the other doctor. They subsequently certified me; and that brings me to a point which I would like to bring before you. I heard here at one of the meetings I attended a suggestion that the doctors should be in consultation. That I absolutely disagree with; they should not consult.

14,547. No consultation in making the certificate?—Not at all.

14,548. Do not you think that two doctors putting their heads together might come to a more just conclusion?—Certainly not, I absolutely disagree with that.

14,549. In my profession we think that two lawyers putting their heads together would probably form a more just opinion than separately?—I cannot answer for your profession, it may be different, but I can answer for the doctor's profession. I think in the case of sanity it is a wrong thing.

14,550. You think the doctor who may have seen the patient first may be the stronger man and may mislead the other?—Yes. Besides the man who is called in by the petitioner is prejudiced against you naturally. I mean, without meaning to be, he is.

14,551. Sir David Drummond: Do you not give a doctor any credit for honesty of purpose?—Certainly.

14,552. Why would you not conclude that the second doctor would give an honest opinion?—Because he might get information which was not accurate. He might be told a delusion was a delusion when it was not. Let him form his own opinion.

14,553. Earl Russell: On the last point you mentioned, when you say the patients ought to see what is on their certificates, let me put to you the case of a woman, say, who has been very badly demented, who has used terrible language, smashed furniture, possibly threatened the life of her child; that woman is removed to the asylum, and gets better and begins to be able to understand what has happened. Do you think it would help her recovery to see these terrible statements on the certificate of the sort of things which she had done?—I think it is right; I am sure it is right.

14,554. Even while she was still under treatment and not yet recovered, she ought to be told all these terrible things she had done which she does not remember and did not mean at the time?—I think nothing pulls you together like seeing it in writing—not what they have pretended to say. Dr. S. told me he always told his patients the truth, and I believe that, and I think that it is very much to his credit, and to his cures.

14,555. You remember, of course, that in cases of ordinary illness, in the case of perfectly sane people, the doctor very seldom tells his patient the whole truth for fear it may retard his recovery?—I am sure he acts from the highest motives generally and I have always thought it was a mistake.

14,556. You can imagine no case and nothing anybody has done being so bad that it would not be a good thing for them to see it in writing?—I think it is wholesome for them.

14,557. Now a question or two about C. I have been very carefully over the whole of the asylum, and I am rather interested in what you say about it, because it does not agree with the impression made upon me. You thought on the whole it was badly run, did you?—It was war time, remember. I thought it was all wrong.

14,558. What was your personal opinion of Dr. E.? Did you think he took an interest in his patients?—I think Dr. E. is a very kind man, but I think his treatment of patients is wrong.

14,559. What was your feeling towards him while you were there; did you feel he was taking an interest in you or not?—I think he was very sorry for me. He was kind; but he never told me any truth at all.

14,560. Is it your impression now that he was doing his best for you at the time or not?—I think he was in a very difficult position, because I was certified and put in on delusions which he really in his heart probably did not believe to be delusions, and he had to keep me there. I know he was very glad when I escaped.

14,561. He may have been. But then in your précis you say: "It seems to me that the doctor who knows you and your story, and wants to help you, is the best judge of where you should go if released for a month's trial." Would you put Dr. E. in that category—a doctor who knows your story and wants to help you?—I think certainly he would do the best for you—outside the institution, certainly.

14,562. Now in C. there is a considerable amount of freedom, is there not, for convalescent patients; I mean you were not locked up in the ward during the day?—No. You were not allowed to go to your bedroom; you had to be where the nurses can keep an eye on you.

Miss C.

14,563. So far as walking goes, and being your own master in the wards, you had a fair amount of freedom?—Yes, that was the convalescent ward.

14,564. You were able to associate with patients—not in the ward—outside?—No, we only met the patients who were in the same house with us.

14,565. You do not meet other patients in the grounds?—Yes; they come across from the other house sometimes, that is true. They used to come across to the garden, yes.

14,566. You really think now that if you had not escaped you would have been detained for ever, do you?—Yes; I am certain I should never have got out, I should have been hopelessly mad.

14,567. And from the last institution you were in you were discharged by the order of your petitioner?—No, certainly not; my petitioner did not let me out at all. Dr. S. let me out.

14,568. Were you discharged "Relieved"?—Relieved. That brings me to a point I was nearly forgetting. I was "relieved," and I lived for six months in my flat doing all my own business, and managing my own accounts. While I was at C. I would like to have done that too. Both Dr. E. and Dr. S. saw no reason whatever to bar me from managing money, because I always had attended to it and yet under the law I should not have done so.

14,569. I know of a lady patient at C. who has her own banking account, and her own cheque book.—Dr. E. said to me "I would be very glad to let you do it, but under the certification you cannot," but he said "when the next Commissioners come round you can perhaps get them to agree. If you can get them to agree to your doing so, I will give you permission."

14,570. Did you have any property or personal property to look after while you were there?—I had a little income of my own. My family did it while I was at C.; but while I was at S. it was never necessary; Dr. S. gave me permission to manage it.

14,571. Deputy-Chairman: On the first occasion there was some order made by the Master in Lunacy when you were at C.?—Yes. It seems a pity that if the doctors think you are only insane on one point, or that you have some delusion of some kind, you should be debarred from those other things in life which would help you.

14,572. Earl Russell: I quite agree. You may be perfectly well able to look after a poultry farm if you have one, even if you are certified on some other ground?—It should be up to the doctor therefore to decide that, he should decide in what way you should manage your life.

14,573. Or at any rate someone might be given an opportunity of deciding. As a matter of fact the doctor is not introduced in money matters much.—If your doctor thinks your mind is sufficient to manage business then you should get permission to do so, should you not?

14,574. Mr. Snell: It is very important that we should get clear in our minds the relative advantage of public institutions and these private institutions. You are making a complaint against the private institutions, and I just want to ask you, do you think it is possible that when you went into C. you were more depressed—may I say more irritable, more ready to notice the objectionable features of the place, than you were when at a subsequent period you went into the S. Mental Hospital?—Yes, I quite agree. I think I was much more ill when I went to C. than when I went to S.

14,575. I have heard that when people go to prison the second time they do not find it quite so horrible as they found it the first time.—That is true. I was much more ill, but I was not ill enough not to know the difference.

14,576. You think that C. was really inferior?—As a place for recovery infinitely.

14,577. When you were at the S. Mental Hospital it was not in the war time. We all had to go short of food during the war.—But it is not those points I dwell on.

14,578. Now with regard to the certificates, I think your point may be right for a person of education, but suppose you show a doctor's certificate to an uninstructed person (you know the horrible words doctors put in certificates) it might frighten the patient to death, a lot of these Latin words and things?—If a patient is so insane that these things have that effect that they cannot understand them, then I do not think it matters whether they see or not, but if they are sufficiently of sound mind to understand what is on the certificate and take it in, it is good for them to know.

14,579. Earl Russell: However sane you were, if you saw on your certificate you were a paranoiac that would convey nothing?—But it could be explained to you.

14,580. Mr. Snell: Then you know the condition of a patient alters from week to week, and even from day to day, and a certificate that was valid for one week might be quite wrong for the next week. There are difficulties in it?—The certificate tells you the reason for your being certified, therefore you know the reason and you can try to cure yourself, as well as the doctor trying to cure you.

14,581. Mrs. Mathew: I just want to know a little about the hours of the nurses at C. Do you think they were too long?—It was war time, of course, but they were very very long hours.

14,582. What hours were they, can you remember?—The night nurse came on about six in the evening, and she was there in the morning. Twelve hours is a long time, is it not?

14,583. Very long.—She was there making the beds after breakfast. Naturally she was getting very worn out.

14,584. Sir Humphry Rolleston: In the first paragraph of your précis you say: "I was told the doctor" (that is Dr. E., is it not?) "received a bonus on each patient detained there instead of a bonus on each cure." That is rather an important statement. Who told you that?—I was told by Madame B. who had been seven years there. She was a great friend of Dr. E. and knew everybody very well. She told me he got a bonus—that is my authority.

14,585. A bonus on each patient?—For extra work. Each patient there means so much more work. He got a percentage or bonus on each patient.

14,586. That is a friend of Dr. E.?—She was a patient, but she had also for a long time been a great friend with them all.

14,587. Then you had a private conversation with the Commissioners, but you did not find them very helpful?—Not in my case.

14,588. How was that? I mean they are there in your interest, are they not?—I think they accept so blindly all that has been said in the certificate and by the doctor that they do not consider your side much; if you feel you are wrongly detained, I cannot see they have any power whatever to help you.

14,589. You say they are definitely harmful in your case. Was that the personality?—It is very difficult for me to tell you, but Mr. Trevor who was very pleasant, and meant to be kind, gave me a terrible upset; the things he said did do me harm. I cannot very well go into it, because it is too troublesome, but he put more insanity on me than any one as far as I know.

14,590. It is disappointing. They are appointed in your interest?—I think they want to be replaced by some other form.

14,591. Sir Ernest Hiley: How many times did you see Mr. Trevor?—I only saw him once.

14,592. Did you see Miss Dendy more than once?—Once.

14,593. Mrs. Mathew: When you were discharged from the S. Hospital, how did that come about?—

23 March, 1925.]

Miss C.

To begin with, Dr. S. wanted me to promise, and I did promise while I was there, that I would not try to escape. He is a public official. C. is a private place; there is no responsibility to the public. After my promise was up he said "If you do not promise it again, I will have to remove you somewhere else." Then he sent for my petitioners to see if they would like to take me out. He wanted me to go, and did not wish to have the responsibility of me, and he then said about C. again "Of course you can escape from there again if you like, it is not a public place; but you cannot escape from here." He said "I would like you to go home." So I consulted the matron, and she said "Do what he arranges for you, because he is trying to arrange the best thing for you" which is my argument you see; and he did arrange the best thing for me.

14,594. Would you think it would be well to leave more power of discharge in the hands of the medical superintendent?—Much sooner than in the hands of the attendants.

14,595. Earl Russell: There is just one other question I should like to ask; you told us that you saw at C. and had conversation with a perfectly sane patient who was being detained there simply because she was a source of profit?—That is what the patient told me.

14,596. I must put it to you, Miss C. Surely you will admit that you were quite unable to judge whether she was sane or not?—I did not say she was being kept there for profit; I said that her husband wished her kept there. He was the petitioner.

14,597. I understood you to say that, in your opinion, she was sane, and was wrongfully detained. —Certainly. I was in the bedroom with her for several weeks.

14,598. Surely you do not say you were competent to form an opinion as to whether she was sane or not?—I think she was sufficiently normal to be at large.

14,599. You had not seen the case books?—No. I had not seen the certificates, no doubt.

14,600. How could you have formed a real opinion on the matter?—I think, if you live in a house with a person for two or three weeks and sleep in the same bedroom, you have a very good idea. She was a much more normal person than the nurse who was nursing us. I think I was quite competent to form an idea as to how she would behave outside.

Deputy-Chairman: Thank you very much, Miss C

(The Witness withdrew.)

Mr. B. called and examined.

14,601. Deputy-Chairman: You have had a very long experience, Mr. B., in a licensed house called L., between 1901 and 1918?—Yes.

14,602. And a very considerable part of that was voluntary?—That is right, yes. I have got a little statement which I am quite ready to read out as soon as the time is convenient.

14,603. Now is that dealing with the facts of your case?—Certainly; it is dealing with my whole experience; but if you wish to ask me any questions do you mind going right ahead?

14,604. It might be a convenient way to hear it?—This is my statement:—"As you observe I have brought along quite a little portmanteau of books and documents."

14,605. We shall not have to trouble you with many documents?—"but after all, I am inclined to say cui bono? I don't want to trot out my little grievances and criticisms, but I would say, broadly speaking, that my experience goes to show that there is, or shall I say was, something radically wrong with the system. That something may be summed up in one phrase, 'lack of personal interest on the part of those vitally responsible and apathy on the part of the public.' I believe it is not properly understood that this department is a distinct vocation instead of a mere subject for merriment." Now this is about L. "Between 1910 and 1920 L. bears a broken record, for in that comparatively brief period there were about a dozen superintendents. Dr. M., who died in 1910, was a good physician, who took his duties and responsibilities very seriously, because when you think of the suicides that take place from time to time, it is a post of, in some respects, extraordinary difficulty." When he died, there was no one to step into his shoes, no one to carry on the tradition.

14,606. May I put one or two questions on that? What sort of house was L.? How many patients were there?—I believe it was licensed for about 70. When I arrived, there were about 45; when I left there were about 25.

14,607. Licensed for 70?—I think so. You can confirm that, of course. I expected that question, and I have been trying to find out, as a matter of fact.

14,608. You were admitted in 1901?—On the 12th September, 1901, at 6 o'clock.

14,609. You were admitted, were you not, on an urgency order?—I am not quite sure; I believe so, but I have not seen it. I have an account of my arrival here; it is only a few lines if you like to hear it.

14,610. Before you were admitted you had applied to become a voluntary boarder at the D. Hospital?—Yes.

14,611. And, of course, they could not admit you until you were certified?—No. I wanted to be under medical supervision for a few weeks; that was my idea absolutely, being in a very run-down condition.

14,612. I was just looking at the order for reception.

14,613. Earl Russell: Do you recollect anything about your examination before reception; what actually took place before the order was made, who saw you, and where they saw you, and what they did?—I have got it all down here, chapter and verse.

14,614. If you could tell us quite shortly that will do?—The worst of it is, I cannot find the exact page. Anyhow it was at P. on the morning of the 12th at 8 o'clock; I had an attic there, very nice quarters over a dairy, and Mrs. H., who is the lady there, came up the stairs to me and said, "Oh, there is a gentleman downstairs who would like to see you," and I got into a bit of flutter. I kept him waiting 10 minutes perhaps. I went down and there I saw the family doctor, Dr. R. He scanned me very carefully, and said, "You have not been very well lately, Mr. B." I said, "Yes, that is quite true; I have been keeping to my room lately, but otherwise there is nothing much the matter with me." I was really recovering. I had had a severe indisposition, retention of urine, and that had gone on for months and months, but that was improving; in fact, the worst of that was over.

14,615. Deputy-Chairman: I do not know that we really need trouble very much with this. You were seen by that doctor and one other doctor?—Yes. Dr. W.

14,616. They made their certificates, and then a justice, Mr. T. B., saw you?—No, he did not.

14,617. No, it would not be necessary that he should see you then. At all events after you were admitted to the house did you see the magistrates?—No, not for some time. Dr. M. came to see me when I was in the big sitting-room after my arrival. I confess that when he first confronted me I was attracted by his urbane manner, but he was very cryptic and silent when I talked to him about my detention. He explained that my relatives, and not he, were responsible for it; of course, that is technically known as the petitioner. After a time not only was I allowed out without an attendant, but I got carte blanche to take patients out, and that mollified me considerably.

14,618. Did he suggest to you that you should see a justice of the peace?—No.

14,619. Did you see one after you were in the house?—The visitors in the usual way.

14,620. Earl Russell: Do you remember being served with a notice saying you were entitled to see a justice of the peace if you wanted to?—No, and in connection with that may I say that a patient complained he had asked for this notice and the attendant refused to give it to him.

14,621. Deputy-Chairman: You are not complaining of the original detention order at all, are you?—Yes, I am.

14,622. Why?—I do not think it right; I was not mad. I was in a very run down condition.

14,623. But you had yourself been applying to go to the hospital for mental treatment?—I have got a note about that. Looking back I do not think that my certification was essential to my recovery, because I was almost on the mend when the doctor arrived on the scene. Nevertheless I derived much benefit from the isolation.

14,624. After you had been at L. a very few months you were allowed out alone?—After seven months I was allowed out, yes.

14,625. Alone?—Yes.

14,626. And after two years you were given absolute parole and a key?—Yes, of course that is in my letter to the Commission.

14,627. Yes, you have set out the facts in this letter.—Yes, as clearly as I can.

14,628. Then you were not discharged from your certificates till 1913, and after that you became a voluntary boarder from time to time. You were admitted from time to time, and went away; then came back and went away again—half a dozen times?—No, there is a little exaggeration about that. I am not complaining in that particular way.

14,629. Let me just remind you.—In 1917. I went out.

14,630. You left on the 3rd August, 1917?—That was really the first holiday I had, in 1917, yes.

14,631. You forget—you were discharged “relieved” in 1913?—Yes.

14,632. Then you went back and left again in June?—I came up to London for a few days, yes.

14,633. And you went back from time to time?—If you do not mind my saying so, those were erratic wanderings. Just at that time I came up to London at my solicitor’s wish. My case was in the hands of the law at that time.

14,634. As a matter of fact you went back to the house in 1914 and 1917 and in 1919?—Yes.

14,635. You were perfectly happy to be there?—Yes, that voluntary business was really from 1903. There was no radical change when my certificates were revoked. I had the same privileges there; I had the run of the house, and all that sort of thing.

14,636. And all the time you were there as far as you were personally concerned you were very comfortable, were you not?—Exceedingly so.

14,637. You have nothing to complain of?—I have—I will tell you. The one fly in the ointment was a bullying attendant, that is what I wrote in my letter. There was not supervision by the medical superintendent. They put things into his charge, and the man was not fit to be an attendant, because he had not the qualities for it; but he was a smart sort of fellow, not a bad fellow, would do well in many things, but as for forbearance and kindness with regard to the patients I had complaints over and over again from them, because I was a sort of go-between between the patients and the doctors for years.

14,638. Were you able to call the doctor’s attention to that case?—Yes, I have got a note here, but there are so many cases. The doctor does not want to be bothered with these things.

14,639. How many attendants were there at the house?—It varied, sometimes half a dozen. Before the war they rather accumulated, when the war came along off they went, a good many of them; very nice young fellows too, many of them.

14,640. Were they all male attendants?—Yes. That is another thing; I think there is not the least doubt that female influence would be a great advantage.

14,641. Of all the attendants that were there during your time was this one you have referred to the only one you have to complain of?—Practically he was.

14,642. Did I understand you to say that Dr. M. died in 1910?—I think that is so.

14,643. And then after that there was a succession of medical superintendents, one after another?—Yes. Dr. N. came along and did a lot of good. In some ways Dr. M. was very conservative. I have got these things written down better than I can talk them. Dr. M. had got into rather a groove, and the house had got into a state when it really required renovation. Dr. N., when he succeeded Dr. M., saw this and got a lot of plumbers and carpenters and they were months in the house cleaning and renewing the place right through; and Dr. N. did a lot of good in one way.

14,644. Earl Russell: What about the sanitary accommodation and the bathing arrangements—were they satisfactory?—Not very satisfactory. I used to clean out the water closet; I have cleaned that out hundreds of times.

14,645. Deputy-Chairman: Was there sufficient sanitary accommodation?—Yes, in the ordinary way.

14,646. Was there any doctor there except the medical superintendent?—No.

14,647. But during the whole period the medical superintendent was the only doctor in charge, was he?—Yes.

14,648. Earl Russell: No assistant doctor?—No. I do not know whether once or twice they had an assistant—no, they did not have. In fact, as regards that I would like to mention that there was an old gentleman who had been there for years and years, and he finally left, and almost his last words were—I have got them here—that it wanted someone between the attendants and the doctor.

14,649. You yourself were very much interested in the patients, were you not?—Certainly.

14,650. And you helped to look after them part of the time?—Yes, that is right.

14,651. And as far as you could see they were well looked after in this place?—I have told you in my précis.

14,652. That there was not adequate supervision of the attendants?—That is what I complain of.

14,653. There was not supervision by the medical superintendent?—That is my contention all along.

14,654. And in consequence was there any cruelty by any of the attendants?—Very rough handling. I cannot say I can put my fingers on one particular act of physical cruelty, but there was rough handling on many occasions.

14,655. Deputy-Chairman: You told us just now that there was only one attendant as far as you knew that you could really find fault with?—I do not know about trying to find fault. I just took these young men as I found them, and I got on very well with them.

14,656. Earl Russell: We want to know how you did find them?—There was one fellow called D., I recall him very well; I remember him chasing a patient, four of them chasing an unfortunate patient (and this patient went to the war afterwards); and they got him by the hair. I happened to be near the door, and intervened very resolutely about it, but of course my position was a very difficult one, because I was neither flesh, fish nor fowl; I was not in any particularly defined position. I was supposed to be a patient, so if I interfered in any way I was always liable to be jumped on.

Mr. B.

14,657. Deputy-Chairman: What were you paying during the time you were there?—I could not say; I have no idea.

14,658. Do not you know what fees were paid?—I have got that down; I do not think it was very much—about £3 a week.

14,659. Were the patients on a different footing, some paying more, and some paying less, or was it a standard fee?—I could not say; I do not know the financial system.

14,660. You were not managing your own financial affairs, of course?—No.

14,661. And some time after you had been there, apparently you were very much surprised at receiving a notice from the Master in Lunacy with reference to your finances?—Yes; I was very much surprised about that.

14,662. Up till that date, that is 1912, how had you been provided for? Who paid the fees?—My mother died, and then my eldest brother took on the responsibility.

14,663. And the Master in Lunacy proposed to make him the committee of your property, did he not?—Yes.

14,664. And he was appointed, I suppose?—Yes.

14,665. Until after there was a public inquisition which found you of sound mind?—Yes; it took a long time.

14,666. But during the interval between 1912 and 1920 when the inquisition was held, you had been going backwards and forwards to this house from time to time?—I would not put it just like that; you do not expect anyone to stay at a place for ever.

14,667. That is putting it very shortly, is it not? You voluntarily went back from time to time?—I only properly and voluntarily went back in 1919. I came to town and could not get settled down. Then I went for a cycle tour and went back early in 1919. I was invited there for a few weeks, and then the doctor said: "I leave it to you. Would you like to stay or quit?" and I said I would like to stay for the winter, so I stayed there right through the winter.

14,668. During the last few years since 1920 you have been in London, have you not?—During the last five years I have been in London, and in the same room that I am occupying now.

14,669. While you have been in London you have been interesting yourself to some extent?—In industrial questions.

14,670. And in the working of the lunacy administration in London, have you not?—No. It is quite true I am a member of the Lunacy Reform Society. I was one of the first members, and attended their first meeting about five years ago, but I have done no active work for them. I have visited a patient twice in the last year, that is all.

14,671. May I refer you to a passage in your letter which I do not quite understand. You say "L. was a charming and delightful retreat, but what a contrast to come to London, and see something of the work of the London County Council." What do you mean by that?—Because the system in L. is so backward. No one seemed to care about their work and duty. The London County Council are such a progressive body—at least some think so.

14,672. You are not contrasting the London County Council work in the asylums?—No, just the method of interest in the work, that is all.

14,673. Your point against the asylum is that apparently the medical superintendent and the attendants do not take sufficient interest in the welfare of the patients?—That is it, absolutely.

14,674. And you think, as far as you have observed, the medical superintendents leave too much to the attendants?—That is right, yes. On that point I have got one or two cases here—two special cases here.

14,675. I think we can take that from you?—A man called F., a farmer, struggling in the bath, and no one there at all. Another case, an engineer just received in a state of mania, and he was with four attendants sitting on him—that is the sort of thing.

14,676. I suppose when a man is in a mania of that kind it is absolutely essential that he should be restrained?—It is not essential to sit on him though, is it? Of course it is very essential that he should be restrained, you are quite right, and in many cases they are afraid to do it.

14,677. It requires two or three attendants from time to time to restrain a man?—Yes, but there is a method of holding him, and all that sort of thing, which, of course, Dr. Conolly has dealt with in his book written about 50 years ago, and I do not think anything can be improved on what he said.

14,678. There is another point that you refer to in your précis—you say there is a great lack of occupation. At L. what grounds had you? Was there a farm attached to the house, or large grounds?—Some very nice grounds, indeed.

14,679. Was gardening one of the occupations?—Yes, but Dr. M. did not care much about the gardening himself. It was not in his line, you see, and then he was very conservative about trusting any patients with tools, and that sort of thing.

14,680. He gave you your liberty almost at once?—He gave me power to go out by myself after seven months.

14,681. Did you occupy yourself in the garden at all?—Not for a long time, not for many years. For some years I was doing practically nothing. It was only on my initiative that I did go to work in the garden. I put in a lot of work there, about five years' eventually. I am very glad I did, for I got the utmost enjoyment out of it.

14,682. What more do you think could be done for a patient in the way of giving him occupation?—Walks and small games. My experience is that the first question is interest. If you once take an interest in the patient it is wonderful what you can get out of him. Then you get improvement, and you might get an absolute cure in many cases, which were supposed to be hopeless.

14,683. I suppose in your experience there were a great many people sent out relieved from L.?—There were some, yes, but of course you see L. has great advantages in many ways; for a patient arriving is quite an event, whereas in these big county asylums it is a sort of thing happening every day, but in L. perhaps a patient will arrive once in six months. It was like getting a microscope on them, if you can understand. The people at L. have every opportunity to deal with each individual patient.

14,684. The medical superintendent would have no difficulty there in knowing all his patients well?—It was delightful in that respect.

14,685. In what respect do you suggest that further occupation could have been given to the patients?—It must be done individually to a certain extent. There is one patient at L. now who is clamouring for a bicycle, but I am bound to say I do not feel inclined to put my hand in my pocket and buy a bicycle for him, when his own brother ought to.

14,686. You do not suggest that the medical superintendent should be driven to that expense?—A bicycle in the country there is a lovely thing to have.

14,687. There are certain risks attached to bicycle riding too?—Yes; Dr. M. asked me to be careful, I remember, the first time I took him out, but I always found him absolutely au fait on the bicycle in the most crowded streets; he never lost his nerve at all.

14,688. Did he lose that exercise when you left?—That is right.

14,689. Have you seen something of other asylums besides L.?—Yes, I have, B. Asylum. I went to see a terrible case who was at L. for some time.

14,690. You make some observation in your précis about V. Is that another asylum you have been to?—Yes.

23 March, 1925.]

Mr. B.

14,691. At the private asylum, L., I suppose you went to bed at any time, half-past nine or ten, whatever it might be. All the patients were not sent off at half-past seven?—Well, yes, that was about the regular time, sometimes earlier.

14,692. Would that apply in all cases, cases like your own?—No. For the first year or so I was there I was absolutely one of them, and of course it was very unpleasant to find oneself cheek by jowl with a fellow muttering.

14,693. You were rather interested in those cases, were you not?—I got gradually interested, yes.

14,694. They did not trouble you?—I did not go there with that idea, of course, but it is a sort of interest that one may have, or may not have, I suppose.

14,695. You take objection in your letter to the patients being sent to bed so early in these places.—That is at V., I noticed that particularly. I got run down here in London in 1918. I went to the Board of Control and asked them to recommend me a place where I could stay because in my condition then I did not want to go to a hospital. Then I thought to myself; "I will learn something more about this business and get a few more tips." The Secretary of the Board gave me a choice of two, that is B. and V. I went to V. and I stayed from February to July 1919.

14,696. How did you get there—you were not certified?—I went as a voluntary boarder, just for a few months.

14,697. Just give us quite shortly your experience at V., whether you found anything to take objection to.—It was a very large place; they say it is the largest private asylum in England; it has magnificent grounds. I may mention one little point while I think of it. At L. I always used to have a siesta in the afternoon; I found I had to abandon that when I got to V.; even as a voluntary boarder I could not go up to the dormitory and have a lie down.

14,698. You had very comfortable rooms, arm-chairs, and so on?—Of course there is everything there in that way. That place is divided into galleries, seven galleries, and I was in No. 1 which is considered the best. In No. 7 the very difficult cases are put. I got very friendly with the ground man there, and, with other patients, helped to roll the ground.

14,699. You enjoyed yourself in V.?—I went there to enjoy myself.

14,700. And you found the surroundings comfortable there, too?—Yes. Still, there is something in the atmosphere which I am bound to say is depressing. I should like to say I visited L. again the other day, and I found it very much improved in that sort of atmosphere, the arrangement of the rooms and everything, no doubt very great care has been taken. The new doctor, Dr. B., has got the place absolutely 'tip-top' now.

14,701. Did you observe at V. anything to which you ought to call special attention, do you think?—In No. 4 gallery I thought the people there were sent to bed very early. They had not got the man power to attend to them. It is difficult.

14,702. Were the attendants a good set of attendants there?—Yes.

14,703. A kindly humane set?—Yes.

14,704. Was the diet good there?—It was rather too much for me, a rather heavy diet. I did not want meals every two or three hours in the day.

14,705. Is there any other thing you would specially like to call the attention of the Commission to?—I have got some rather interesting statements here—of course I do not know that I can hit upon them. There is one thing, you spoke about the charges. I may say I got a complaint the other day from the widow of a man who died in L.—died by his own act. She told me the charges were very excessive.

14,706. Earl Russell: I would like to ask you a few questions if you will try to answer me shortly, otherwise I do not think we can pursue it. You have been in these places for some time, and I understand you have seen the other patients that have come in?—Yes.

14,707. And of course you have had the opportunity of being well acquainted with them?—Yes; that is why I have written some of these things down, so that I can read them straight off and finish it.

14,708. If you please, I do not want that; if you would not mind answering my questions. You have had the opportunity of being well acquainted with them?—Certainly.

14,709. Are you under the impression that you have come across anybody who was wrongfully certified, or wrongfully detained in these institutions?—I have thought of that a good bit, and I should say "No." There are just two rather doubtful cases. There was a young fellow when I first went there, and I am bound to say I did not see much the matter with him. Then there was another man who came in with slight depression. He was not in the house very long; it depressed him very much to see the demented patients circling round and round with nothing to do.

14,710. Those are the only two cases you can recollect in your experience?—Yes.

14,711. As regards cruelty, I understood you to say that although there was rough handling there was nothing that you could call deliberate cruelty?—But there is a lot of bullying, which, in my opinion, may be worse.

14,712. Bullying in what sense?—I can only tell you I drank the cup of humiliation to its depths.

14,713. I should like to have something a little more specific?—When you come up against a bully who is determined to repress you and restrain you in every possible way, in your position what can you do? You are entirely at his mercy.

14,714. I want to know in what way he tried to restrain and repress you. Were you made, for example, to sit in a particular place?—No. I was prevented from going into a better room, which is perfectly legitimate.

14,715. Was it a room to which the patients in the ward you were in legitimately had access?—Yes.

14,716. And you were prevented, from mere caprice, do you mean, as an exercise of power?—Yes, that is it. There is another case. I asked him, "Will you unlock the door for me, please," and his answer was, "Go to hell." I wish I had reported that, and got the fellow dismissed.

14,717. You said he would not unlock the door for you?—The front door of the house.

14,718. In order that you might go into the grounds?—Yes.

14,719. And that would have been a legitimate thing for you to do?—Yes, because the gates outside were closed.

14,720. And that again you mean was a mere capricious exercise of power on his part?—Yes.

14,721. Tell me about the lavatory doors. Were the lavatories always accessible when required during the day?—Yes. There was a lavatory outside, and there was one patient very troublesome, always using it, and I think they had to lock it up sometimes.

14,722. But not unreasonably?—No.

14,723. Tell me about shaving—were people who wanted to shave allowed to shave themselves—those who were fit to?—There was a barber who used to come in; they did not allow shaving.

14,724. There was nobody who was allowed to shave himself?—No.

14,725. It is no good asking you, because I see you did not.—I did at that time.

14,726. Were you allowed the use of a razor at that time?—Yes.

14,727. Now, one more question only. Were the wards cheerful and agreeable and pleasant?—The wards were one in number, that is all. It reminded one of nothing so much as a tap room in a bar. I have got my account.

14,728. I do not want to give you the trouble of reading details.—When I first went to L. I went into the place; I realised perfectly well I had been trapped, but nevertheless felt optimistic. I got into the front room; that was the best part of the house, the front of the house was quite all right. Then an attendant comes along, this gentleman I have just mentioned to you, and he said, "Will you come this way, Sir?" Then I followed him down a flight of two stone steps into a gloomy corridor below, where I found out the sitting rooms were situated. In this narrow room there was very little furniture, but there were two engravings, and one was an engraving of the Achilles statue, and that heartened me very much, and I do think pictures do influence people.

Mr. B.

14,729. Were there ever flowers in the ward?—I do not think I troubled much about flowers; there were plenty in the garden outside. I wish you would go and see it yourself, I am sure you would like it.

14,730. Sir David Drummond: You have attended nearly all our meetings, Mr. B?—Yes.

(The Witness withdrew.)

Miss B. called and examined.

14,733. Deputy-Chairman: We understand that you wish to give evidence before the Commission and you have furnished us with a statement of the matters you specially wish to refer to?—Yes. I sent a letter first and then a lawyer made a sort of summing-up of it all.

14,734. I see from your letter that you think you were detained too long?—I was kept for two years and eight months beyond the time.

14,735. I will deal with that a little more fully presently. In your letter you say, after you had been under care for two years and some months, "I only managed to get out on April 4th, 1923, after I had said I must have paper and pen, for I was going to put my affairs into the hands of a lawyer and summon my relations." Then a change came over things and you got out?—Yes, immediately.

14,736. May I ask what you mean by saying "I must have paper and pen"?—Because I was not given anything.

14,737. Could you not write letters?—Never. I have listened to all the evidence that has been given before the Commission about the letters and the letter boxes; and I was not allowed anything. I did not get a letter for two months. I wrote one and they tore it up.

14,738. You were at P.—a licensed house?—Yes.

14,739. Of course you were a paying patient?—I was paying 7½ guineas a week.

14,740. Did you have a separate room?—No, there was no accommodation of any kind for taking patients like that. I was in a room once with a lady for three or four weeks, shut up in a room with her with a nurse watching us all the time.

14,741. Was that a sitting-room?—No, a sleeping room. There was no separate accommodation for sitting-rooms. There was a big room; there was a skylight in it, but the only air was over the washing-up sink at the end.

14,742. Still you had your large living room and so on?—We had a tiny living room with no fire in it.

14,743. What other room?—This big room and a place which was a dining-room.

14,744. In those rooms there would be writing materials, would there not?—Certainly not. All my writing material was taken from me the moment I arrived, and my purse, and I never saw them again until I came home.

14,745. How many patients were there at this place; is it a small place?—The matron always said she had 60 people to look after; that was including everybody. I have a list of the ladies; of course I do not know about the men.

14,731. I was just wondering whether you found them interesting?—Some of the points, because, naturally, I have been through the mill, and unless you have been through the mill you cannot possibly tell.

14,732. Do you think we have made much progress up to now?—I do not think that we could have had a better Chairman, if you do not mind my saying so; and I think it is magnificent, the work that is being done. I mean it gives me absolute satisfaction. I do not know why the other members of my Committee do not agree with me. However, that is my considered opinion, that it is absolutely safe in your hands, the whole thing.

Deputy-Chairman: Thank you. I hope you will understand that though we have not taken, of course, all the matters you have written down, I think you have covered the ground extremely well; and we are much obliged to you.

14,746. There was a man's side as well, was there?—There was a man's side as well.

14,747. I am told that there were 24 ladies?—I could not tell you about that.

14,748. What medical superintendent had you?—Dr. N. and Dr. T. were the only doctors.

14,749. Who was the superintendent?—Dr. T. Dr. N. was the young partner; he was away for months and months, and when he was there Dr. T. was often away.

14,750. Were not the other patients using pen and paper and writing letters?—They were allowed to; sheets were given out and they kept a book as to when they wrote. I was never told I could write to anyone; I was not allowed to have the things. I was told, "Your friends do not write to you." My friends were asking to write to me. With regard to all the rules you have heard about these places, not one of those rules was ever applied to me.

14,751. You mean there was no letter box with a notice on it?—No, certainly not.

14,752. And no notice that you could write to the Commissioners?—The Commissioners came and never spoke to me at all.

14,753. In your recollection you had no opportunity whatever?—I had no opportunity whatever, unless I cudgelled it out of them. The matron was furious because she was away once and I got Dr. T. to let me write.

14,754. What was the name of your matron?—Miss R.

14,755. Do you know if she is still there?—I imagine so; I do not know, because I send lots of things to the patients now, but they are not allowed to write to me.

14,756. Could you at any time communicate with Dr. T. or Dr. N.?—Dr. T. used to come up and listen to me, and say, "Oh, no, Miss B.," and run off again. I used to say, "I have not got delusions, doctor." He said, "That is all right." He was always running about, saying, "Festina lente." One laughs now, but it was terrible at the time. My aunt was dying all the time, and I could not get out to her.

14,757. You have been making certain statements about the house—the want of ventilation and want of comfort?—There was no comfort at all.

14,758. Did you appeal to the doctor about those things?—It was no good appealing about anything. If you appealed they just treated it as folly. You cannot appeal when you are a private patient. I did, when the row was so awful in the dormitory. The young nurse said she was going mad. I said,

Miss B.

"I do not wonder, but what do you think I am like?" I was in bed all the time.

14,759. When you first went to the house did you have a separate bedroom?—No. They moved me straight into the dormitory and put me into the padded room simply because I jumped out of bed and wanted to see the matron. I was put straight into the dormitory, where the noise was simply awful.

14,760. How many beds would there be in it?—There were five beds, and the nurses ran in and out the whole of the night. It is the passage room for all of the lavatories. They carried through everything for the other rooms. This went on all night. I shall never forget it.

14,761. How long were you in the padded room?—I jumped out of bed and asked to speak to the matron; I got thoroughly frightened. Then I was dragged across to the padded room. I was in the padded room just before Christmas, with a nurse watching me day and night. It sent me quite off my head. What else could you expect? These nurses were young girls, perpetually changing, talking of their love affairs all night. It was perfectly hideous.

14,762. After you had been in that room for some months, where did you go next?—The next thing was I was taken to the dormitory, because they wanted the padded room for another patient.

14,763. As I understand, at this place you were paying considerable fees?—I was paying enormous fees. I did not know what I was paying until I got out.

14,764. Were there not separate bedrooms for patients who paid considerable fees?—Miss V. and Miss H. were the only persons who had bedrooms to themselves. Miss V. had a bedroom to herself.

14,765. What was the accommodation at this place? There were 24 ladies. You have described the reception dormitory?—It was the ball-room of an old hotel; it was the ball-room where they had this sort of general meeting room with a coke fire in it. The bedrooms opened off from that like a rabbit warren. It is a very, very old house. This was on the top of the house.

14,766. Were there not a good many separate bedrooms?—There was a wing down below; built in 1911; there were separate bedrooms there. Some were used for the men and some were used for the ladies. We used the top wing. When there was a great press they put one or two downstairs. There were plenty of bedrooms always.

14,767. How many dormitories were there altogether?—Only the one dormitory, and all the rest were bedrooms.

14,768. Is the reception room what you call the dormitory?—No, the dormitory led off that.

14,769. How many beds would there be in a dormitory?—Five, I think.

14,770. That only takes five. What other sleeping accommodation was there?—There were all these different bedrooms. Miss H. had one to herself and Miss M. had one. There was one with three people in it, and there were these two old ladies outside the padded cell, and the matron's room at the end.

14,771. When you came out of the padded room did you go into the dormitory?—Yes. The padded room was used as an extra room.

14,772. Mr. Jowitt: There was one bedroom where five were sleeping?—That was the dormitory.

14,773. There was one room where five people slept, and there were two rooms in each of which three people slept?—Yes, and one in which two people slept, and these others were little single rooms, and then there was the matron's room.

14,774. Deputy-Chairman: I see you say in your note you were forbidden for many weeks to write to any of your friends and relations?—I was kept there for weeks without writing. The first note I wrote was soon after I got there, and they did not send it. Then after that I was allowed to write one which they did send. Then it was months before I wrote again. I was not allowed to have letters. My friends were told not to write. I was lost to the world.

14,775. I think you suggest that after you had been in there some months you were in a condition to be discharged?—In June I was well.

14,776. Does your memory really go back?—My memory goes the whole way, because I was ill for such a very short space, and I made notes in my own mind. I could not make notes on paper.

14,777. I find from the medical notes that were made about you that on the 21st June, 1920, for instance, you managed to take your food with difficulty, and that sometimes—only rarely—tube feeding was necessary?—I want to explain to you why that was. They were so extraordinary. I said, "Very well, I shall not eat anything until I get back to R," so I declined to do it.

14,778. Do you mean you were deliberately putting yourself on starvation?—Deliberately. There was my aunt dying at home whom I had looked after all my life, and I never saw her again. It was a most cruel thing.

14,779. You complain that you were detained there too long. Have you any other complaint against your treatment?—I did make notes about my hands, did I not?

14,780. Yes, you have made some notes about them. —You have only got to look at them. I have just had an operation for this thumb—in January. I do not know of anybody who would sit in a padded room all the night on a filthy mattress.

14,781. Recollecting the mental condition you were in, according to your own account, you would surely call the doctor's attention to that, or the nurse's or the matron's attention?—It was no good calling attention to anything. I said how filthy it was, to one of the nurses, and she said, "It is your own fault for being in here."

14,782. Could you not get behind that?—It was not the slightest good calling attention to anything.

14,783. There were a good many patients in there who were treated properly?—Some were treated very properly indeed. It just depended.

14,784. What did it depend upon? — Apparently whether the matron took a fancy to you or whether she did not. A Miss S. came in and some of the nurses began to treat her badly, and the head nurse said, "Be careful what you say to her, because she is a favourite."

14,785. Your suggestion is that the matron had some regard to some patients and not to others? —To my sister she was very good.

14,786. Was your sister there as a patient?—My sister was there as a patient, only for a short time.

14,787. Was that before you were there?—Before I was there.

14,788. Your sister had no ground of complaint, had she?—Not the slightest. They wanted her to come home before she was well.

14,789. How long was she there?—She was there from December, 1914, to the January year—that was 13 months.

14,790. Has any other member of your family been there?—No; we did not know anything about it. My sister was taken ill in India; she had a very good appointment there. I went down to P. with my other sister, we took her off the boat at P. and Dr. F. said it was a good home to send her to.

14,791. It sounds a little strange that she should have been there for a year and a month and have been quite comfortable and that you should have followed her and found the condition of things was so different?—I will tell you why I think it was. To begin with I must tell you that the matron brought my sister home. I was living with my aunt then. We had the matron stay with us for the night. We were always noted for receiving everybody hospitably, and she was treated very hospitably. She had her breakfast in bed next morning, and so on. She has told me since that I was rude to her

Miss B.

on that occasion, and when she heard I was coming she said, "The other one was grateful. We will make gratitude do for both." She was a frightfully ignorant woman.

14,792. How long had she been there?—For years; I think she had been there for 20 years. She had a keen class hatred; that is the only way to express it. She came from a cottage home. She was always hurling it at me: "You B.'s are better educated than I am." I had never come up against class hatred before, and I did not know what it meant.

14,793. She did not show that in any of the other cases?—No. They always made out that nobody ever paid anything. At least, it struck me that possibly, from the way I was being treated, the head nurse thought I was not paying, too. She had to take me to the dentist, and I got her by herself, so I said, "Now, nurse, you know what the accommodation is. Do you know that I have been paying 7½ guineas a week?" She said, "I had no idea. Are you sure your people have paid up?" I said, "We are not like that."

14,794. Did not your people come to see you from time to time?—Hardly ever. I have written it all down here in case I make any mistakes. I went down on the last day of January, 1920. Mr. W., my brother-in-law, came to see me on the 1st April, and then on September 29th, 1920. Of course, I was taken out of the padded room—

14,795. Was he your solicitor?—He was the doctor who signed my certificate. Of course, I was taken out of the padded room and had a pair of stockings given me and a handkerchief, but it was quite useless to visit me then, or at any other time, as you could hear everything that was said, and I was only told and scolded if I dared say anything, and, of course, he naturally believed every word they said.

14,796. Could you not see the doctor alone?—I saw him in a room up there; you could hear every word that was said, all over the corridor. The thing was, of course, that I realised he was told that no doubt I was a dangerous patient, because they were calling out, "If you want me, Mr. W., I am here." In April, 1922, there was a very nice nurse, an old woman, who had grown-up children; we had her and one other nurse of a proper age. She was very kind to me, she saw I was well, and she said, "I cannot think why you were here. I wish I could see your people." I said, "I should go and see them; they live in R. Will you write to them?" She said, "I will."

14,797. Had you no visit between April and September?—Yes, I had the visitors, but whatever I said was no good. The nurse said, "Very well, I will write." So she chanced very much on that. She said to me, "Your sister would never tell, would she?"—not dreaming anybody would tell Dr. T. about what happened. So she gave me a paper and a pen in the middle of the night, and I wrote an account of how I had been treated. She wrote a covering letter with it, saying that she was an old woman and had been with me for a long time as night nurse, and Dr. T. had repeatedly said that my brother-in-law should come, and she sent this. My sister took the letter and posted it back to Dr. T. Of course, there was a most frightful row, and the nurse was dismissed and went. That settled me.

14,798. Would you mind telling me the visits you had after September?—No one of any kind visited me again until April, when Mr. W. came.

Mr. Jowitt: Which year is that?

14,799. Deputy-Chairman: April, 1921?—Yes. Then in July my sister, Mrs. H., rushed in without my knowing she was coming, on her wedding tour, and stayed half an hour.

14,800. Could you not talk to her?—I talked to her downstairs, and told her I was quite well, and begged to go home, with the usual result. She said, "The doctor has settled this." They treated it as a rule. My brother-in-law came again in April, 1922, with the usual result—quite useless. In October of the same year he came again, and informed me that I should not come home until the Commissioners said I was well. I knew what the Commissioners said, but no Commissioner had spoken to me except in the first three months I was there. The second Commissioner, whose name I do not know, came on the day of Mrs. S.'s funeral, and only said "Good afternoon." I thought he was somebody who had come down for the funeral, and had just come to see the place. So it seems difficult to me always to imagine what a Commissioner is supposed to do.

14,801. Then you had no visits from your relatives except by Mr. W?—Only these visits every six months. Dr. Bond had never been before. However, when Dr. Bond came in June, the end of June, I think, in 1922, I told him my whole story. I thought I would try. I had been told I was never to speak to anybody. I thought I would have a try. There was another patient in the room the whole time. I told him my whole story, and he expressed surprise that I had never been home, and said he would see into it; and I was foolish enough to believe that he would do so. That was the last I heard of his visit either from him, my relations, or Dr. T. Mr. W. came in October, 1922, for half-an-hour, with the same result as before; and my two sisters (who had never been before) rushed in about 7 o'clock one evening in December for half-an-hour. I had never been told they were coming. The result was the same. They said, "Of course you must be self-controlled. You cannot come out until the doctors say so." Dr. N. and Miss R. were rushing in and out of the room most of the time, so I hardly ever got them to myself. Dr. Bond came in December, late, before Christmas, but this time I naturally refused to speak to him.

14,802. Perhaps you think now it is a pity you did not?—It was not, because I came out. Dr. Bond came in December, but I naturally refused to speak to him, and when he left the room that was the last Commissioner I ever saw in P., and did not speak a word to him. Now bear in mind that my brother-in-law had said, "You cannot come out until the Commissioners say you can."

14,803. Then you got a good deal better at the beginning of 1923?—I was quite well. I went in in 1920 and I was quite well in June.

14,804. Let me put it in this way. I follow that you think that was so?—I know you will never believe me. I have got so used to that, that I do not take any notice of it at all; I am hardened, really.

14,805. You must not take it from me that I do not accept your evidence?—I do not think that.

14,806. As a matter of fact the doctors themselves realised an improvement at the beginning of 1923?—In 1923 they were perpetually telling me, "You will never go home."

14,807. At all events they gave you a discharge in April?—In April, 1923, but not until I threatened them. Dr. N. was abroad—

14,808. It was Dr. T., was it?—Dr. N. went off the day after the Commissioner came.

14,809. When you say you threatened him, will you tell me exactly what you did?—I will tell you. Of course it is all so childish. I had to think it over. My own people said I could not come out until the doctors said I was well. Dr. T. and Miss R. both told me they had to keep me, much as they disliked it. Mr. W. said it depended upon the Commissioners. I dealt with Dr. Bond without the slightest result. So I determined to try for a lawyer, and in March I said to the matron, who settled everything, that I demanded writing paper and a pen and was going to write to a lawyer and summon my relations. I had previously borrowed a pencil from a nurse who had lent it. On a bit of drawing paper I made out a note to a lawyer friend of my own. I did not write to my own lawyer, as he had sent the paper announcing that I was being deprived of the management of my money; so I supposed he would act for my family. The matron, as usual, went into a great rage—she had a most awful temper—and shouted, “You shall have it.” The next day she quieted down, having evidently taken counsel downstairs, and said, “You can have paper if you wish, but you will be a great fool if you do, as matters are being arranged, as you wish, and Dr. W. has been written to.” I had been told so many untruths, but this sounded more truthful, so I said I would wait a few days; and soon, in a few days, I got letters from Mrs. W. and Mrs. H. recording their surprise at my recovery. Mr. and Mrs. W. came down a week after Dr. T. wrote, and I returned to them on April 4th.

14,810. That explains it. You did not in fact get so far as writing to the lawyer, but you threatened to do so?—I had got the copy all ready.

14,811. Mr. Jowitt: Have you got the letter you had prepared to write to the solicitor?—It was a draft on a block of drawing paper. I could not do anything, you see. You were not allowed to write to a soul.

14,812. Deputy-Chairman: You were discharged by Dr. T.?—Then I want to tell you what I did after that, because this is where the senselessness comes in. I must tell you that in December, 1922, they brought an enormous box containing all my possessions, and settled me in for life, and they left it. I cannot tell you how that made me feel. My old maid tells me (my family have hardly held any communication with me on the subject) that when they came back in December they were told I should not be out certainly for eight years, and it might be never. Then after I threatened that letter, my brother-in-law came down and expressed how surprised he had been.

14,813. That was when you were discharged?—Yes, my home was gone and broken up. I went back to my brother-in-law on April 4th, and stayed with him, I think, to the 1st of May. Then on the 1st May I went up to my club, where you get a room, for a fortnight. Then I looked about and got a bedroom at H. Street, where I have been ever since. I went to my lawyer, and I cannot tell you how kind he has been. He said, “Do not speak to the Commissioners until you have got your money straight.” I wanted to go to Switzerland to climb. So out of his own pocket he lent me £100 to go and climb. He just managed to do it before the Courts closed.

14,814. Your affairs had meanwhile been put into Chancery and had been before the Master in Lunacy?—Yes. Everything was gone.

14,815. Did the solicitor get them restored to you?—Yes. But I did not want to go to Switzerland before I could write my own cheques.

14,816. Still, with £100 in your pocket you would have been all right, even in Switzerland?—Yes, I should have been, but I did not want, until I could pay by cheque, to go anywhere. I saw the Chancery Visitor in the last days of July. I said, “When I come back I am going to ask to see Dr. Bond.” He said, “Will you leave it to other people?” I said, “It depends upon what you are going to do.”

14,817. Did you have another interview with Dr. Bond?—Yes; I have all the papers here.

14,818. I do not think we need trouble you to go into those, because the only point we really want now is to ascertain what happened while you were in this house?—What I do want you to realise is that on coming out I went to Dr. Bond and laid the whole thing, the terrible treatment of patients, before him, and I got the answer of a child.

14,819. I think you may assume that anything you said to Dr. Bond about any other patients is sure to be carefully considered by him?—Would you like to see the letter?

14,820. He would not write the details to you, you know?—Of course we all knew it happened in the home, and we told him. You do not know what it is to see those sort of things.

14,821. Shall we get back to your own case while you were in the house?—Yes. Might I finish this about coming out?

14,822. If you please?—Then I went straight off on July 23rd. I sent for my guide and in 16 days I climbed the Zinal Rothhorn, Monte Rosa, Dufourspitze, Lyskamm, traversed Ringsfischhorn, and climbed the “Dome”—all in 16 days. We had no porter with us; it was simply my guide and myself. Of course you could not have done that if you had been out of your mind in March.

14,823. I would say that, having done it, you are not likely to be out of your mind next March?—My guide trusted his life in my hands; we were all alone on the glaciers.

14,824. Now will you tell us how you yourself were treated while you were under care at P.? You complain of ill-treatment?—What exactly did happen was this. I naturally first of all tried to get out of the padded room. I had a huge bed sore on my back. I tried to get out. The nurse seized my finger and dislocated it, twisted it right round. It will never go back, of course. She said, “I am a past master in these things”—and just went like that—(describing).

14,825. Sir David Drummond: Why did they put you in the padded room?—Because I tried to get out of bed first of all to speak to the matron.

14,826. Deputy-Chairman: Were you very violent at that time?—I was not the least violent, except when I got out. Then when I got into the padded room delusions swarmed over me. I tried to put an end to myself. I climbed the Obergabelhorn in the year 1919, the first year after the war, with a friend, and an English lady asked if she might go with us, with her own guide. We hated doing it, but she was very keen to come, and she went with us. She was killed, unfortunately, by a stone which she pulled over herself. My guide should have said, “Do not touch that stone,” and I should have waited to tell her. I was not at all well at that time, and it got on my mind. I thought it was my fault.

14,827. You thought that you had loosened the stone?—I thought I might have loosened the stone. It was not that so much as that if I had told her guide, he would have told her. I did not realise it. I felt the stone was a little bit loose, but it never struck me that anybody would pull at it.

14,828. Now when your thumb was injured, was it injured by accident?—No, on purpose. The nurse seized it like this (describing)—to prevent me getting out of the room. She did a sort of jiu jitsu thing she had been taught. Then with regard to this hand I said one day, “I shall not take any more food.” I held on to the back of the bed and the nurse dragged at my thumb. Dr. W. has recently operated on it and cut it open from there to there—(describing)—and has put it back again in its place and hopes it will be all right.

14,829. Can you remember when this was?—This thumb was hurt very early. It must have been, I suppose, in April or May. I could not really tell you.

14,830. But it was very soon after you got there?—Yes. The other was later on. I was not allowed to work or do anything. I just sat with my hands folded.

14,831. I suppose you could not do anything much?—I could have worked.

14,832. With your thumbs like that?—They had been very painful, but it was not until I began to work. Then in two weeks’ time they found out I could work very well, and I was put to hard work. Of course, then this thumb immediately began to get very painful, and so I showed it to Dr. T. and said, “This hand is dislocated.” He said, “Nonsense. A little rubbing, I think.”

14,833. Let us take the first occasion, when your left thumb was injured; did you make any complaint?—I showed it to the head nurse and she said, “That is your own fault.”

Miss B.

14,834. Did you make a complaint to the doctor?—No, I was not spoken to.

14,835. You could surely have shown it to the matron?—I very nearly did show it to the matron. They did not care. I am rather a good hand at bearing pain. Another thing is that it was no use. I was told everything was my own fault.

14,836. What strikes me is this, Miss B. Let us assume you were in the condition of mind you think you were—in the same condition that I am in. If somebody had dislocated my thumb like that, and I had had an opportunity, I should have immediately applied to a doctor?—It never would have struck me to apply to Dr. T. I showed it once to the nurse who did it. I said, "Look what you have done," and she said, "That is your own fault entirely."

14,837. But it seems an odd thing that you did not call the attention of the doctor to it?—It no doubt does. I felt I was in the hands of fiends.

14,838. Take the second case.—The thumb on the right hand she almost pulled right off. Then after a while I began to work, and it got frightfully painful. I knew it was dislocated. It was only when began to work that I realised how bad it was.

14,839. Surely if your thumb were dislocated the best thing you could do would be to send for the doctor?—I was not allowed to. I cannot move it now.

14,840. Sir David Drummond: Did not you show it to the doctor the next time he passed?—I showed it to him, and he said, "A little rubbing, I think." I knew that was useless. So when my brother-in-law came down I showed it to him.

14,841. What steps did he take?—None. I have never told the surgeon this. I showed him both hands and he looked at them and did not say one word. That was in April, 1922.

14,842. And all this time you had this dislocated thumb?—Yes. I had been working then, and by that time you can imagine what it was like.

14,843. Had it not occurred to you to show it to the doctor?—I had shown it to Dr. T. long before that. There was no care; they did not care.

14,844. Any doctor could have seen it at once?—Of course he could, but there was no care there. People just died. You might die of anything, and nobody cared a halfpenny hang about you.

14,845. Deputy-Chairman: Did this place belong to Dr. T.?—Yes.

14,846. If it were Dr. T.'s own private house, and he was making a living by taking these patients, it would obviously be in his interest to treat them well, in order to get a reputation for his house?—There was no occasion to. They had got me safely there.

14,847. From a doctor's point of view it must have been in his interest to run his house so that it had a good reputation?—I can only tell you what did happen to me. Then I showed it to Dr. N.; he was supposed to be the surgeon, and he did not take any notice. When I came up and saw him in London I told Dr. Bond about my hand.

14,848. You had had a long interview with him at P. in July, 1922?—Yes.

14,849. Did you complain to him and show him your hand then?—How could I? The only thing I was thinking of then was to get out.

14,850. It strikes me as being such a very serious thing. Supposing my thumb were out of joint all this time: if a Commissioner to whom I could appeal came into the room and I had an interview with him, one of the first things I should do would be to say: "I have been ill-treated here, and my thumb is even now out of joint."—I think if you had had the experience I had had of them by that time, you would not have dreamt of saying such a thing. There is no court of appeal for anybody there. When you are once in, you are like a convicted prisoner. Then the matron hit me on the hand, here I was kept in bed months on end. I could have knocked the place down. All my muscles were perished. I said to her, "I want to go out." She banged me on the hand with a huge bunch of keys and it came out in a huge bruise. She used to drag me by my hair.

14,851. There again, did you complain to Dr. T.?—I wrote a letter to my family, which they returned to the nurse. I wrote and told them.

14,852. That was much later on?—I had not any chance before.

14,853. We want to get at the facts about this. As far as one can judge, your sister was there for a year or more, was treated very well, and was very comfortable. It seems an odd thing that you should come a little later and, under the same supervision and management, find everything wrong?—There was always favouritism shown. If you want to know what I honestly think about it, it is this: my sister only paid four guineas a week for everything. I used to pay the cheque for her in advance; it was regularly paid. It was four guineas for everything. I think she gave them all very handsome presents when she left. I am afraid they had not realised that we were quite as comfortably off as we were, and they were very sorry they had not charged her more. The other day I was talking to a doctor, and I mentioned my sister having been there, and the doctor said, "Was it your sister who was taken ill in India?" and I said, "Yes." She said, "We had a nurse from P. seeing us, and she told us they had got a lady who had been taken ill in India, and they had not seen a penny of her money yet." Of course, I knew that was just how they were speaking about me. I have brought my pass book so that you should see that Dr. T. had always been paid as far as I am concerned.

14,854. Was there a committee appointed for you—a trustee?—A receiver; yes.

14,855. I want to ask you one other question about the condition of things. Were the lavatory and sanitary arrangements good in that place?—I should say they were horrible sanitary arrangements. You had to go through a dormitory down below, and the washing place was in the same place. The whole time I was washing, the kitchen maids would be running in, emptying pails and pans.

14,856. Do you mean you had no privacy?—There was no privacy whatever. There was a choice between that or washing in the lavatory with the most insufficient screen, with everybody rushing through there in the dormitory. The only time I ever had privacy in washing was when I was in the two small rooms. There was one bath downstairs. We used the one bath which all the nurses used to use. I was only allowed a bath once a week. It was most disgusting.

14,857. What have you to say about the food and diet?—The diet was starvation. We had bread and scrape three times a day. For breakfast when I first went there we had—you could not call it porridge; it was little bits floating in milk, and sometimes you were given a tiny mite of baked potato. We had that for two years for breakfast. There were three slices of very thin bread and margarine. I believe they sold quantities of butter. There was a huge farm attached to the place. I saw chickens—they had got hundreds of chickens. For tea we had five slices, and sometimes six, of this thin scrape, and about half a teaspoonful of jam for each person; it did not cover one slice; and a very thin piece of always the same cake, the kind of cake that you buy for 5½d. or 4½d. a pound. If you asked for another piece and there was any more you might be given another slice.

14,858. Did you have any meal after that?—We had in the evening for the first part of the time what they were pleased to call pearl barley, and one or two slices of bread and butter sent in, and the last time there were scrapings of cold pork or beef, and I think twice there was a drum-stick of a chicken.

14,859. Did you get a good dinner in the middle of the day?—The first part of the time there were only scraps. I think the rationing had taken an effect on them, and I think they had found they could make on people. The last part of the time we got fairly good helpings of meat. The poor young nurses used to ask for more, and there was not anything for them; everything was finished.

Miss B.

14,860. Were any patients paying larger sums than yourself?—One lady who took drugs paid eight guineas a week. They made a great fuss of her; she was a very wealthy lady.

14,861. Did the average patient pay about the same as yourself?—I should not think so. I am very socialistic. I am quite willing to go into a hospital and share, but I was paying seven and a-half guineas a week and was with one woman there who used to eat with her hands!

14,862. But they were all paying private patients?—They were all paying patients, but I mean they had not any manners. That woman used to eat with her fingers; she used to put potatoes and things down her stocking. There was an awful old farmer's wife who jeered at me all day. It drove one nearly wild.

14,863. They were of a different social status, rather?—They were entirely so; there was hardly anybody of the same social status.

Deputy-Chairman: I think some of the other members of the Commission may wish to ask you a few questions.

14,864. Sir David Drummond: At what date had you quite recovered?—I was quite well in June, 1920. All the rest of the time I was driven nearly wild.

14,865. Then anything that happened afterwards, as shown in the note, delusions, and so on, did not occur?—No, they did not occur.

14,866. We have notes before us to the effect that weeks after the date you mentioned you had delusions?—I can tell you most truly what the delusions were. I lost all knowledge when people were treating me like that.

14,867. You had no delusions, had you?—No.

14,868. You never thought they wanted to take you to a house of ill-fame?—I did. I had no conception for months. I did not think about the house of ill-fame before that. I had no conception when I was kept in a padded room, that anybody in their senses would keep anybody they were trying to get well like that. I thought I was in some peculiar house. It was no delusion, because Dr. T. kept saying to me, "If you do not behave yourself you will go elsewhere." I did not know what he meant.

14,869. You thought he meant to take you to a house of ill-fame?—I certainly thought so. I had no conception that anybody was treated like that in a lunatic asylum. How would you feel if you lived in the half dark in this padded room with these women screaming outside from the end of February till December?

14,870. The point I wish to be clear upon is this. You thought you had recovered at a certain date. Weeks after that date it is in the note that you had this delusion. Could you say you had recovered then?—I had recovered. My delusion was the whole time I was there. They kept on saying they were going to send me elsewhere.

14,871. Mr. Jowitt: I have just a question or two to put to you. You were in the padded room from May, 1920, to the end of 1920?—Much earlier than that. I went there at the end of January. I was in the padded room by the end of February.

14,872. And you were in the padded room for ten months?—I should think it was till December.

14,873. May I ask you to agree with me to this extent: For the first two months or so you were in the padded room you were suffering from delusions?—Yes. Truly I should never have been so bad if I had not been put there.

14,874. During those first two months when you did have those delusions, you were rather violent, I suppose?—Only that I was trying to get out of the padded room; no other violence.

14,875. But you were violent?—Of course, you cannot get out of a room without being violent. I did not hurt anybody.

14,876. Was the nurse in the room with you?—The nurse sat outside.

14,877. And every now and then the nurse used to come in?—Yes.

14,878. Was it on one of the occasions when the nurse came in that you made for the door, trying to get out of the door?—I always tried to get out of the door.

14,879. Was there then some struggle between you and the nurse?—Certainly.

14,880. Was it in this struggle that the accident happened to your thumb?—Yes.

14,881. Now having had that accident to your thumb in that way, I understand you did not complain to any of the doctors about it?—I think I only complained to the nurse. I had little feeling about the nurse.

14,882. You did not complain to your brother-in-law, who himself is a doctor?—Not till I showed him my hands.

14,883. That was the other hand, a year later?—I showed him both hands.

14,884. The right hand was a year or two later?—I complained to Dr. T. when it became so painful, when I began to work.

14,885. Did the food remain bad all the time?—All the time.

14,886. Your mental condition when you went out was better than when you went in?—But I was perfectly well by June.

14,887. Was your physical condition better, too?—My physical condition was always good. I was blown out to the most frightful degree by this dreadful milk diet. It was all a sort of wretched fat. Might I just tell you what happened? The doctor was injecting that awful hyoscine, or whatever it was; it made my eyes look funny, and I felt dreadful all over.

14,888. Deputy-Chairman: When was this treatment begun?—Dr. N. rushed in and gave it me one day when I was trying to get out of the padded room. Then I began to hope I might go into a sort of everlasting sleep. Then one day I said, "You might give me an injection," and he did. Then another day I was sitting talking quietly to the matron, and he rushed in and injected something into my arm again.

14,889. How many injections were made altogether?—I could not tell you, but I was all over little marks.

14,890. Mrs. Mathew: I just want to know about your thumb. Did you go to Switzerland with a dislocated thumb?—Yes, I did, and made it worse, naturally. I traversed the Matterhorn down the Italian side this last year. The nuisance of it was it was always freezing, so I had no end of trouble. When we were on the "Dome," we nearly had to come back; that was partly why I was so anxious to have the operation. Coming down the ropes on the Italian side last year my hand came right off the ropes, and I had the greatest difficulty clinging with my left hand. It was awfully bad this last autumn. The doctor did not want to operate, but he said in December, "I could help you," so I chanced it. On the 8th January I went to have this done, so I thought the most satisfactory way would be to ask the Harley Street doctor about it. I want for my own sake to get everything straight.

14,891. Deputy-Chairman: I do not think really we shall want evidence that your thumb is dislocated?—I should like you to appreciate what I feel about it, that I have been treated as a sort of half fool ever since I came out. I have tried to speak to my family. Nobody has spoken to me. I want to get it straight now, because I do not want any longer to be treated as a fool.

14,892. Mrs. Mathew: You had been to Switzerland before and you knew all about mountaineering?—Yes; I had been for years.

Miss B.

14,893. Deputy-Chairman: I gather you are not quite restored to friendly relations with your relatives?—We are on perfectly friendly terms, but I mean all family ties are gone. I could never tell them or consult them about anything. If it had not been for the doctor and the lawyer after I came out I do not know where I should have been.

14,894. Before you leave us, is there any other point you would like to lay stress on?—I would like to read what I have written, because that is what I want you to have.

14,895. If you please; you have read the first part I think?—This is the beginning: "Kept in padded room from March, 1920, for many months until nearly Christmas 1920, in fact until the room was wanted for another—only put there because I asked for matron and jumped out of bed to try and get her. Lay for months on a filthy mattress, left in dreadful condition by dirty patients only one on hard floor—smell horrible—got a huge bedsore on my back, about three inches wide and long. Patients used the outside room, out of which padded room opened, sometimes for all purposes. State of atmosphere needs no comment and no window opened more than a foot in the place and some—padded room did—only at the bottom at all. Padded room bitterly cold, draughts, no bed socks or hot water bottle and filthy pillow without case—no sheets—got a sore ear from being kept there day and night, but would not sit in my night dress in room outside with the bedridden old women, as that was far worse—given no work—no books not even Bible and prayer book, told to sit with hands before me—should have gone mad, but went on in my head with foreign languages." That was my only comfort. I knew a lot of foreign words and I went on with my foreign languages, and a wonderful lot I can talk now. "Dr. T. used to run in and treat one as a fool." He would say, "Good morning. Where is Newcastle? Is it in the north or in the south? How do you pronounce the name of those slippers, 'Mocassins or Mocassines,' " etc., etc., always insisting that the reason of my illness was nothing but a lie—and I was perpetually told I should never come out until I acknowledged it as such. Not allowed to write for months at a time and then only when they had read the letters and this I understand from Dr. Bond is strictly contrary to the law, as I had the right to seal up any letter to him or to Mr. W. and write to them when I chose to. Always told my relations did not want me home and at last told "that they only asked not to be worried when I asked to write" and "that my friends did not write to me and had evidently forgotten me." "

14,896. Although that may be very interesting, I am not sure that it will add anything to what you have told us.—I did want you to know what went on in these places. With regard to the nurses, it was "often pandemonium at night with all the things being brought through to the lavatories below and no other entrance to them day or night; the last summer rats got into the house, came out in the dormitory at night and one died in the sitting room; and we had to eat our meals there while it decayed. The so-called nurses were utterly untrained girls out of shops or cottages—some so rough one would not have taken them for servants—utterly ignorant of the simplest ideas of nursing and they learnt none there—sore backs, the most usual thing among patients. These girls were all paid £20 a year and put into uniforms as nurses. Once there were two older nurses for night, paid £24, really as untrained as the rest only far kinder." Then there is an account of food. Then comes this: "My whole cost could not possibly have exceeded £1 ls. a week and I paid 7½ guineas for far worse than workhouse accommodation and an extra £2 quarterly for something I never had—altogether Dr. T. had over £1,000 of mine for nothing but misery. I wrote and drew attention to the fact that extras were on the last bill (which was undated) which I had not had—as I never had even an extra cup of tea and asked that the mistake might be rectified. I wrote a list of all expenses. Dr. N. cashed the cheque immediately and wrote a note with it entirely ignoring my letter. Money was all they cared for from first to last. There was no treatment of any kind. If one got out at all, it was only for one hour in the afternoon—in that miserable drive." You could not call it a garden.

14,897. They were large grounds, were they not?—We never went into the large grounds. The little ground we had was the drive. I was never allowed out for a walk. I took one walk in two years, when I went to the dentist. "I had one walk only and the only other time I was out was going to a dentist who made me two sets of teeth I could never wear." Never allowed inside church but once and then when it was found convenient suddenly to announce I was well. Then I want to leave with you these papers (handing in the same).

14,898. We need not trouble, I think, with the passbook. We will take it from you that the fees were all paid.—Very well. You do not want the bills?

14,899. No, I do not think so.—I do want it cleared up once for all.

14,900. We quite appreciate the position. We are very much obliged to you for giving us your evidence, and I hope you think that we have given you a full and fair hearing?—Yes, I am sure you have. Only I do want you to know why I did it. I have been to everybody straight. I went to Dr. Bond and I warned Dr. T. that I was not leaving matters there.

MR. W. FAIRLEY (Assistant Secretary).

Chairman: Since we last met, the death of Sir Thomas Hutchison, which occurred with tragic suddenness in Edinburgh last Sunday, has deprived us of the assistance of a valued member of the Commission. He was greatly interested in our work. Endowed with an instinctive aptitude for affairs and a philanthropic outlook on all the problems of social life, he was well fitted to make a notable contribution to our deliberations. He leaves behind him a record of conspicuous and varied public service, and by his death a career of great usefulness has been prematurely cut short. We lament this morning the loss of a genial and helpful friend and a much esteemed colleague. I propose that we should transmit these few and inadequate words to Lady Hutchison and her son with a message of respectful sympathy from us in their great sorrow.

Sir H. ARTHUR ROSE, D.S.O., and Dr. HAMILTON C. MARR, called and examined.

14,901. Chairman: This morning we have with us Sir Arthur Rose, who is Chairman of the General Board of Control for Scotland, and Dr. Marr, the Senior Commissioner, is also in attendance with him. We are to have the advantage of evidence from these gentlemen upon the system of Lunacy law and administration in Scotland. It may be well to remind the public that the scope of our Reference does not extend to Scotland, and therefore that in receiving this evidence we are receiving it for the purposes of comparison and instruction, rather than with a view to any practical recommendations being made by us with regard to the law of Scotland; but I am sure we shall derive much assistance from the witnesses who are coming to-day and the two following days upon the methods of the sister country. Sir Arthur, you have been good enough to furnish us with a précis setting out the existing law which you apply in Scotland, and I propose to go through it with you in some detail to-day; but, first of all, let us take from you your own designation—you are Chairman of the General Board of Control for Scotland?—Yes.

14,902. When were you appointed to that office?—Two years ago.

14,903. I forget, who was your predecessor?—Sir Thomas Mason.

14,904. The Chairman of the Clyde Trust?—Yes. He had retired at least a year before I was appointed.

14,905. And you yourself occupy that position not as a whole-time officer, I understand, Sir Arthur?—Quite.

14,906. In other words, you are a man of business in Leith, are you not?—Yes.

14,907. And the office which you hold is an honorary office in the sense that you are an unpaid Chairman?—That is so.

14,908. With regard to the General Board of Control for Scotland, I think prior to 1913 it was known as the General Board of Commissioners in Lunacy for Scotland?—That is so.

14,909. And under the Mental Deficiency and Lunacy (Scotland) Act, 1913, your Board was, in 1913, re-established under its new name?—That is right.

14,910. Just as the English Board of Control also received a new charter in that year under the corresponding English statute?—Yes.

14,911. It would be useful, I think, to get at the very outset some information from you as to the composition of your Board. At present, does it consist of five members?—It consists of five members.

14,912. Are these yourself, as Chairman, a layman—unpaid layman if I may once more emphasise the fact—and two unpaid Commissioners?—Yes.

14,913. These gentlemen at present are Sheriff Macphail, who is the Sheriff of one of the Scottish counties, and Mr Prosser, who is a Writer to the Signet in Edinburgh?—Yes.

14,914. It is usual in practice, I think, that these unpaid Commissioners should be selected from the legal profession?—That has usually been the case.

14,915. And these gentlemen are also unpaid Commissioners?—That is so.

14,916. Then, in addition, are there two paid Medical Commissioners, who are whole-time officers?—Yes.

14,917. One of them we have the pleasure of having with us this morning, Dr. Marr. Who is the other?—Dr. Sturrock. There is one vacancy.

14,918. Yes, there is a vacancy at present in the office of paid Medical Commissioner which has not been filled up?—Quite.

14,919. Then turning to the Mental Deficiency and Lunacy (Scotland) Act of 1913, I think we will find the constitution of your Board and its functions in Part II of the Act, Section 19?—Yes.

14,920. While there was a reconstitution at that time of the Board under its new title, all the previously existing powers of your code were carried on?—Yes.

17 April, 1925.]

Sir H. ARTHUR ROSE, D.S.O., and Dr. HAMILTON C. MARR.

14,921. There has as yet been no consolidation Act in Scotland such as the 1890 Act for England?—Unfortunately not.

14,922. Sir David Drummond: Why was the vacancy not filled up?—For reasons of economy chiefly. (Dr. Marr.) Two of the Commissioners retired simultaneously two years ago, and instead of filling up the two vacancies, for reasons of economy, it was decided to fill up only one vacancy.

14,923. Chairman: So there is at present a vacancy?—Yes. It is not intended to fill up the third vacancy in the Commissionership in the meantime.

14,924. At the moment there are two paid medical Commissioners, full-time officers?—That is so.

14,925. And three unpaid officers who are laymen?—That is so.

14,926. One of whom is the Chairman, and the other two are lawyers?—The Mental Deficiency Act made provision in 1914 for a third paid Commissioner, and that third paid Commissioner was appointed. But, owing to the war, and the Mental Deficiency Act being not in full practice, it was decided to do away with the third Commissionership in the meantime.

14,927. There is provision made for that in Section 19, sub-section (2)?—Yes.

14,928. "In addition to the two paid Commissioners, for whose appointment provision is made by the Lunacy Acts, there may be appointed by His Majesty on the recommendation of the Secretary for Scotland, at any time after the passing of this Act, a third paid Commissioner, who shall be a duly qualified medical practitioner."?—That is so, and that third paid Commissioner was appointed, but resigned two years ago.

14,929. Then may I take it that the appointments to the Board are made by His Majesty on the recommendation of the Secretary for Scotland?—(Sir Arthur Rose.) That is so.

Sir Humphry Rolleston: Why is it the medical members are paid and legal members give their services for nothing?

Chairman: You must think of the national characteristics upon that matter, I think, Sir Humphry. There is a tradition of public service in these matters in Scotland.

Sir Humphry Rolleston: Are the legal Commissioners whole-time Commissioners?

14,930. Chairman: None of them are whole time except the paid medical Commissioners. One of them is an active Sheriff of a county, and the other is a well-known solicitor in Edinburgh, and Sir Arthur Rose tells us he has some time to spare for his own business?—(Sir Arthur Rose.) A certain amount.

14,931. Then, in addition to the Board properly so-called, have you Medical Deputy Commissioners?—Yes.

14,932. Who are not members of the Board, but who have important duties to perform?—Yes.

14,933. At the present moment have you three such Medical Deputy Commissioners?—Yes.

14,934. And of these, one is a woman?—Yes. Again a vacancy exists in that branch.

14,935. With regard to that matter, again referring to Section 19 of the 1913 Act, provision is made to this effect, that "In addition to the two Deputy Commissioners for whose appointment provision is made in the Lunacy Acts, the Secretary for Scotland with the approval of the Treasury, may at any time after the passing of this Act, and from time to time appoint not more than four duly qualified medical practitioners to be Deputy Commissioners of the Board, of whom at least one shall be a woman"?—Yes.

14,936. That power has been exercised to appoint three, but there also you are one short?—That is right.

14,937. These Deputy Commissioners are paid, of course?—Yes.

14,938. And is their province specially to concern themselves with the patients in private dwelling-houses?—That is so.

14,939. In contradistinction to those resident in establishments?—Yes.

14,940. Then we may also bring out a distinctive feature of the Scottish system, and that is the division of Scotland into lunacy districts.—Yes.

14,941. I think that since 1857 when modern legislation in this matter begins, there has always been a division of Scotland into lunacy districts?—Yes.

Earl Russell: As against our county divisions?

Chairman: Yes; it corresponds to some extent to county divisions, but the areas are not always co-terminous.

Earl Russell: It is a species of grouping?

14,942. Chairman: Yes, exactly.—There are 27 districts.

14,943. At the moment there are 27 districts if we include Greenock as a district; but Greenock is a district, as I understand, only for mental deficiency purposes?—Yes. (Dr. Marr): There are 27 lunacy districts altogether, including large city districts which are districts of themselves, that is to say, the parish council is ipso facto a District Board of Control.

14,944. Now it does not follow that each District Board will have its own asylum. Provision is made, is it not, that a District Board may send its patients to the asylum of another district under contractual arrangements which are provided for?—Sir Arthur Rose: That is so.

14,945. Therefore we shall not find in Scotland 27 district asylums, but only 21?—Not necessarily to another district asylum, to any asylum with which they care to contract.

14,946. Then with regard to this division of Scotland, I think that the districts consist of groups of counties, or single counties, or parts of counties?—That is so.

14,947. And in the case of the principal towns the lunacy districts may consist of a single parish, in which case the parish council becomes the District Board?—Yes.

14,948. And the parish council, of course, as we know, is a popularly elected body?—Quite.

14,949. Earl Russell: Is this grouping geographical, or is it by population? What is the general principle that governs it?—Geographical chiefly, but, of course, limited on account of population.

14,950. Chairman: But it is a regional division of Scotland really?—Yes.

14,951. And was advantage taken of the Act of 1913 to reconstitute those District Boards of Control also?—That is right.

14,952. Where the lunacy district happens not to consist of a single parish, where the parish council is the District Board, is the District Board of Control an elective body?—Yes.

14,953. And is it elected by the county council, or county councils of the county or group of counties comprising the district, the magistrates of burghs which are situated within the county or counties, and one third by the remainder of the parish councils of the parishes within the district?—That is so.

14,954. In that way you get representation of the county authority, the burghal authority, and the Poor Law authority?—Yes.

14,955. Mr. Micklem: Does that mean one-third by each?—Not necessarily; the numbers are laid down by the Board.

14,956. Chairman: Then if the District Board contains no women, is there a statutory obligation on the District Board to co-opt not more than two women?—That is right.

14,957. Then, I think, the actual number of members of the District Board is fixed by your central authority?—Yes.

14,958. And is apportioned among the electing bodies as nearly as may be in accordance with the valuation of each county or burgh?—That is so.

14,959. Does the number of members of these Boards vary from 11 to 34 according to the size and circumstances of the district?—That is so.

17 April, 1925.]

Sir H. ARTHUR ROSE, D.S.O., and Dr. HAMILTON C. MARR.

Earl Russell: Does this District Board correspond more or less to our Visiting Committee?—

14,960. Chairman: Yes, exactly; it is elective at second-hand really.—That is so.

14,961. And it is probably a rather more comprehensive body than the Visiting Committee with which we are familiar in England?—Yes.

14,962. We shall come to its powers in a moment. It is much more like a local authority. We have then at once a picture of the organisation of the lunacy administration in Scotland, the General Board at the top with a series of District Boards throughout the country, comprised as you have explained to us.—Yes.

14,963. That is a general outline of the organisation?—Yes.

14,964. Now as regards the position of these bodies and the legislation, I think that in Scotland unfortunately you have had no Consolidating Act?—That is so.

14,965. Therefore you administer the law at present under the statute of 1857, which has been amended in 1862, 1866 and 1913?—That is so.

14,966. And also there are certain other intermediate statutes which have modified the law in certain minor respects?—Yes.

14,967. You have accordingly rather a complicated code to handle?—Distinctly so.

14,968. Then let us pass at once to the functions of the General Board of Control. I think that they have the general supervision of the administration of the Lunacy law in Scotland?—Yes.

14,969. And, as we proceed, we shall come across the various matters in which they take an active part. Let us just see how you conduct your business. Have you board meetings from time to time?—Yes. We have two statutory meetings a year which must be held, otherwise we meet normally monthly, and as frequently as necessity and the business calls for otherwise; but as a general rule a monthly meeting suffices for the formal part of the work.

14,970. And do you, in addition to those stated meetings and those monthly meetings, from time to time have local meetings for the investigation of any case that may arise?—If the local necessity arises we do not hesitate to have an enquiry locally.

14,971. And do you also have conferences from time to time with local bodies either in Edinburgh or in the country on matters of local importance affecting them?—Quite frequently.

14,972. Do the Commissioners visit any property that is proposed to be acquired by the District Boards?—Yes, invariably.

14,973. And do they examine and approve all plans and estimates?—Yes.

14,974. Then is there daily attendance at the Board of Control by one Medical Commissioner?—Yes.

14,975. I think the principle on which you work is that one of the Medical Commissioners shall be on inspection work, while the other is in daily attendance?—That is the usual arrangement.

14,976. Is there a duty imposed upon the Medical Commissioners of visiting each establishment twice a year?—That is right.

14,977. And reporting to the Board?—Yes, seeing each patient individually twice a year in institutions.

14,978. So it is not merely an inspection of the institution but a visitation of each individual patient?—That is so.

14,979. Sir David Drummond: Might we hear about that?—Perhaps Dr. Marr had better speak to that.

14,980. Chairman: Dr. Marr will either visit or be in the office, as the case may be. Would you tell us about the actual visitation?—(Dr. Marr:) We are bound by statute to see each patient twice yearly; that is to say, a Commissioner sees every patient in the institutions twice yearly, but an individual Commissioner sees every patient once yearly in institutions under this arrangement. When we go to the institution of course we go like a thief in the night; we are not known to be coming, and we immediately commence our inspection. We have a book, and the patients' names are ticked off as they are seen.

14,981. Now I would like to know about the seeing, because "seeing" may mean many different things.—I, for instance, stop before each patient and simply tick off the name as I see the patient. I go round the whole of the place.

14,982. But are the patients brought before you?—No, we go round and see them; we go into the institution, because otherwise it would upset the patients, and we want to see the patients in the normal circumstances.

14,983. You will start with the book in your hand?—Yes, take any part; sometimes we begin with the workshops; sometimes we begin with the laundry, and sometimes we begin with the kitchen; sometimes the far off part of the institution, chronic wards. We do not take any special routine, and every patient we see in the institution. We do not see a patient unless we have a pencil mark at the side of his name. If he is on parole, we note in our inspection that this patient was not seen because he was absent on pass.

14,984. I want to know more about seeing them. You find them in their ordinary surroundings as you pass through the institution. To what extent do you make an examination of each individual patient, or enter into conversation with them?—If the patient wishes an interview, then you stop and have a talk and examine the patient to see if he is really a case which should be considered. If they want an interview we give an interview in every case, no matter whether we have interviewed the patients on several occasions.

14,985. We have heard complaints made that these official visitations are apt to become mere formalities?—We never look upon that as a formality. We have always looked upon it, from our point of view, that our duty primarily is the interest of the patient. We are in loco parentis to the patient, and that is our primary and basic duty, and everything else must be subordinate to that.

14,986. Do you think that any patient who really had some case of complaint, or wanted to bring something before you, might be deterred from doing so because other patients were there, or the medical superintendent was there?—No; we have never had that experience; all they have got to do is to ask for a private interview.

14,987. Earl Russell: Do the patients in the ward when you go through know you are a Commissioner?—Yes.

14,988. How?—We should announce it to them—they all know, of course. We know our patients pretty intimately I should say, considering that these are approximately 20,000. Of course, generally speaking, the complaints are usually relating to their mental condition. In some cases, it may be a desire to get out, or they feel that they have been illegally detained. Of course these cases we go into very carefully.

14,989. Chairman: With regard to the private interview, if a patient, even although he has had a private interview before, says "I want to see you, Sir, alone," can he do so?—Yes, undoubtedly.

14,990. And do you have such interviews frequently?—Yes.

14,991. Where do you take the patient?—We either get a private room, or they are brought to me, and they have the interview alone.

14,992. Do you find these interviews useful in practice?—Very useful. Where there is doubt as to whether the patient should be retained in the asylum, we pay very serious attention to it; but, as a general rule, the patients want to air some grievance of some kind, particularly relating to the delusions. I may take an actual instance: in one of our Glasgow institutions there is a lady who has very marked hallucinations and delusions, a single lady, about being married. I have given her an interview ever since I was appointed some fourteen years ago, and the interview extends sometimes to half an hour.

Sir H. ARTHUR ROSE, D.S.O., and Dr. HAMILTON C. MARR.

14,993. Earl Russell: She always asks for a private interview?—Yes, and we are told that the mere fact that we give her that interview soothes her and keeps her in a better frame of mind. She is in a very unfortunate position as far as her delusions are concerned, believing that she is married to a professor in a university who is dead, and that he has left a large sum of money.

14,994. Chairman: Do you find you sometimes get from the patients information about small matters of administration, and so on, which are rather galling to them—giving you hints?—Exceedingly useful information. If I may go back some 20 years ago, a middle-aged lady objected to the bathing arrangements in one of the institutions, which has a beautiful bathroom with about 14 baths in it, and she objected, and naturally objected, to being bathed in the presence of younger women on a general bathing day. I was delighted to have that suggestion from her, and recommended that curtains should be put between each bath, and that little cubicles should be arranged in the dressing room so that women bathing should have complete privacy.

14,995. Was that done?—That was done, and it has been done practically in every institution in Scotland.

14,996. Then do you find that you sometimes get quite intelligent criticisms?—Most intelligent criticisms.

14,997. Sir David Drummond: May I ask how long does that examination of the patients take?—The smaller institutions usually one day, but the larger institutions from two to three days; and sometimes I spend four days at the very largest institutions.

14,998. Chairman: We will get the figures as to the number of patients in the different institutions. You have not anything comparable to the large institutions here running up to 3,000 patients?—Nothing at all.

14,999. Earl Russell: I rather want to know when you are ticking the names off in the book do you speak to each patient, or do you simply tick them off?—If he is obviously very seriously demented I do not bother, but if there is any intelligence at all then I say "Good morning," and I ask "Have you anything to complain about?" I vary it. I do not make a routine of asking every one.

15,000. Even if there are 30 or 40 patients there, some of them will not speak unless they are given a chance?—That is so, especially depressed patients.

15,001. Sir David Drummond: You do not interest yourself in the case medically?—Yes, especially the hospital cases.

15,002. You do not visit the institution as a physician visits the wards?—I cannot possibly do that.

15,003. Chairman: That is to say, you do not make a medical examination of the patient?—Not at all; I could not possibly do it, or pretend to do it.

15,004. It is not your function, if I may say so?—That is so.

15,005. You are visiting the patients to see whether the law is being properly carried out, and that their welfare is being adequately attended to?—That is so.

15,006. Earl Russell: Still each patient has a definite chance of saying anything he may wish to?—Yes.

15,007. Chairman: Does the medical superintendent go round with you?—Sometimes; the matron or the charge attendant, or the assistant medical officer, very often with the medical superintendent.

15,008. May we take this general answer from you: Do you think that the visitation system as practised in Scotland by the Commissioners enables each patient who has any real cause of complaint either as to his detention or as to his treatment, to bring it before an outside authority in your own person?—That is so. I think it might safely be said that there is no case of injustice or want of observation as far as inspection is concerned in any institution in Scotland. There might be slight individual grievances, but if these are brought to our notice we usually pay special attention to them; but, generally speaking, there is no case which I might say is capable of being neglected throughout our Scottish institutions.

15,009. Do you find among the complaints or criticisms you receive that there are ever complaints as to the treatment of the patients by the attendants?—Yes, on occasion, but very seldom.

15,010. What do you do in such a case where there is a complaint of ill-treatment?—We enquire into it, of course. Generally, if it refers to some accident that has taken place, or some injury, we first of all have a register of all injuries taking place in the institution, no matter how trivial they are, and we have evidence of that; and then if there is evidence of really serious abuse and we come to that conclusion, we recommend the superintendent of the asylum to report the case to the Procurator-Fiscal to make enquiry.

15,011. Perhaps it might be as well, since that official has been mentioned for the first time, to explain that the Procurator-Fiscal is the local Crown Prosecutor who, under the Scottish criminal system, is charged with all local investigations into criminal matters, and he reports to the Crown Office in Edinburgh with a view to proceedings being taken in serious cases.—That is so.

15,012. You have throughout Scotland in every district an official who is charged with the investigation of all criminal matters?—That is so.

15,013. And who takes the initiative in prosecuting all offences locally and in reporting to headquarters all serious offences?—That is so.

15,014. Earl Russell: In allegations of ill-treatment, even if you think them well founded—it is always very difficult to establish a case?—To some extent it is; on the whole it is not very difficult. If you have a recent injury, of course it is obvious; but the difficulty is to say whether a person has really been assaulted by an attendant if the injury has taken place some time previous to your inspection.

15,015. Chairman: I do not quite follow that the recent character of the injury will prove its cause.—When a complaint has been made to us, say, that the patient was ill-treated three months ago, we ask if there has been evidence of any injury; we find out if there is such an entry made in the register of accidents, and then in addition to that we enquire amongst other patients and find out what the superintendent has done with reference to this allegation.

15,016. You hold a sort of informal enquiry?—Yes. Sometimes of course the allegations are so obviously connected with the mental condition that we do not need to enquire into them.

15,017. Earl Russell: That is what I want to get out,—where you find, and how you find, your corroborative evidence. It is very difficult in these cases?—It is very difficult unless the superintendent has at once enquired.

15,018. Chairman: Have you ever found in your experience a case of some ill-treatment actually made out to your own satisfaction?—We have had cases of that kind, yes,—I do not say frequently; we have had two or three cases during the course of my 14 years, and there we have had an enquiry.

15,019. A formal enquiry?—A Board enquiry.

15,020. Whenever you find there is what I may call a prima facie case for investigation, do you hold a formal enquiry?—Yes, that is so.

15,021. And have you found the complaints substantiated in any cases?—In many of the enquiries we have not found them substantiated.

15,022. You have in some?—No, I do not think we have had any enquiries where there has been a substantial basis for alleged ill-treatment. The cases where there has been actually bad treatment have been dealt with by the Procurator-Fiscal.

15,023. Dealt with as assault cases?—Yes, dealt with actually in public.

15,024. Earl Russell: Still, you, generally, have looked into them first?—Yes. As a matter of fact we often originate the prosecution by suggesting that the case should be reported.

17 April, 1925.]

Sir H. ARTHUR ROSE, D.S.O., and Dr. HAMILTON C. MARR.

15,025. Sir Ernest Hiley: How many of those cases have there been during the last five years?—I think I only remember two; one in Inverness.

15,026. Chairman: I remember the Inverness case myself, a really serious case that ultimately became the subject of litigation, I think.—Yes.

15,027. Earl Russell: Supposing a charge is made against an attendant, how do you find the other attendants act—do you find they back him up with their evidence?—I am speaking as an old superintendent. It depends altogether on how quickly the superintendent enquires into the alleged accident, so as to prevent co-operation between the other attendants in making a uniform story.

15,028. Chairman: I suppose you will find that many of the patients themselves have quite sufficient powers of observation and quite sufficient intelligence to assist you in an investigation of their case?—Yes, there are some patients whose word is absolutely trustworthy.

15,029. They may be merely affected by some delusion—apart from that they are quite capable of giving reliable testimony?—Yes.

15,030. If you find there is a prima facie case, then it either becomes the subject of an official inquiry by your Board, or they submit the case to the Procurator-Fiscal, who then takes the matter up and deals with it through the medium of the criminal law?—That is so.

15,031. May I take it that such cases are not of frequent occurrence?—Very infrequent occurrence.

Mrs. Mathew: Are these cases tried in open Court?

15,032. Chairman: Yes; any cases taken up by the Procurator-Fiscal in a county would go before a Sheriff and be tried in open Court?—Yes.

15,033. Mr. Micklem: Have you had any cases where the medical superintendents have dismissed attendants before coming to you?—Yes, or have suspended them, but they often dismiss them on account of alleged ill-use of patients, and then we make inquiry there to see the extent of the alleged ill-treatment of patients.

15,034. Chairman: The Sheriff, of course, has power to award up to two years' imprisonment, coupled with lesser powers of fining, and so on?—Yes. (Sir Arthur Rose): Might I just add to that, that we have only had one formal inquiry since I was put into this position?

15,035. That is to say, in the last two years?—Yes. It arose through a patient reading Dr. Lomax's book and giving us chapter and verse of corresponding incidents that were purported to have happened in this asylum, right throughout the book. It was felt by us that the allegations were sufficiently serious to justify a formal inquiry into the whole situation.

15,036. Just let me interpose at that stage. You have very strong powers under the Acts of Parliament for enforcing the attendance of witnesses, and getting documents and everything else. You are practically given the powers of a Court in these inquiries?—Yes; and there is quite a heavy penalty if our orders are disregarded; and the witnesses are all sworn.

15,037. Let us hear about this inquiry?—The inquiry dragged its way along the course of the forenoon with very wild charges of rather an indefinite nature, and suddenly the peculiar point emerged that the complainant had really no grounds for his allegations, but was in actual fact trying to get at the medical man who had certified him; and in the middle of the proceedings he withdrew entirely every allegation that he had made, after even having described how a bald-headed patient was hammered over the head with the leg of a chair, and various other things like that; and he suddenly admitted, and his agent admitted, that the whole reason for the allegations was that he had felt he had been improperly committed to this asylum, and he wanted us to take action against the medical man.

15,038. He was represented by a solicitor as well?—He was represented by a man in his own department; he was a solicitor.

15,039. Earl Russell: Of course that is a danger you are always exposed to?—Quite. As a matter of fact we quite welcomed the opportunity of holding the inquiry. There was sufficient prima facie evidence to justify us in making these investigations, and we did not feel it did any harm from the public point of view.

15,040. Chairman: We shall come across many matters of detail as we proceed, but we will try to keep the evidence on the lines of your précis. We have the composition of the Board now, and of the District Board. We also have from Dr. Marr a very full account of how the visitation is carried out by the Medical Commissioners, as well as their daily attendance at the Board's premises, where, I suppose, all the documents that come in are surveyed and examined?—(Dr. Marr): That is so.

15,041. And the register of patients kept?—Yes.

15,042. Now I think it might be useful to obtain a few statistics from you, because, of course, we know in Scotland the matter is on a very much smaller scale than it is in England. I think you have before you, Sir Arthur, a few figures which we had better get on the note. First, in all were there at the 1st January, 1924, 18,266 registered lunatics in Scotland?—(Sir Arthur Rose): That is so.

15,043. And of those were 9,112 male and 9,154 female?—Yes.

15,044. It is rather remarkable, quite a "50-50" division?—Yes.

Earl Russell: A much more even proportion than in England.

15,045. Chairman: Yes, it is very curious. Then, again, classifying them, 2,887 of the registered lunatics are private patients, and 15,379 pauper patients?—That is so.

15,046. Of the private patients, 2,887 in number, there are 1,539 males and 1,348 females?—That is right.

15,047. Taking the pauper patients, 15,379 in number, there are 7,573 males and 7,806 females?—Yes.

15,048. I think it would next be useful if we were to have from you a short description of the different places in which lunatics are to be found in Scotland. Let us just get that, because the system is a little different again in Scotland from what it is in England. First of all, shall we take what are called the public asylums proper which are a group which consists of the Royal or chartered asylums in Scotland?—That is so.

15,049. These are the only places which are rightly described as public asylums?—Yes.

15,050. I think they are seven in number, are they not?—Yes.

15,051. It might be interesting just to note them. There is the Aberdeen Royal Asylum, the Crichton Royal Institution, the Dundee Royal Asylum, the Edinburgh Royal Asylum, Glasgow Royal Asylum, Montrose Royal Asylum and Murray's Royal Asylum—these are the seven?—Yes.

15,052. These are institutions, are they not, which are not carried on for gain?—That is so.

15,053. They are all philanthropic institutions with endowments?—Yes.

15,054. And are institutions into which patients must be received if ordered to go there?—That is so.

15,055. In four of those seven institutions are paupers received?—Yes.

15,056. In three, namely, Dundee, Glasgow and Murray's, are there no pauper patients at all?—That is right.

15,057. Just to complete the statistical information, were there 3,595 patients in these seven public asylums on the 1st January, 1924?—That is correct.

15,058. Now in addition to those seven institutions, have you the district asylums to which allusion has already been made?—Yes.

15,059. These are the asylums which are provided by the District Boards?—Yes.

17 April, 1925.]

Sir H. ARTHUR ROSE, D.S.O., and Dr. HAMILTON C. MARR.

15,060. And with the construction of which, or extension of which, you as a Board have extensive and important powers?—That is so.

15,061. They are, as we know, 21 in number?—That is right.

15,062. And do many of them receive private patients as well as rate-aided patients?—Yes.

15,063. I think by far the greatest number of patients in Scotland will be found in those asylums?—That is right.

15,064. I think the number at the 1st January, 1924, was 11,649?—Yes.

15,065. Then is there in Scotland only one private asylum?—That is right.

15,066. That is to say, an asylum corresponding roughly to what we call a licensed house in England?—I suppose that is so.

15,067. And that is called New Saughton Hall?—Yes.

15,068. There is just the one private asylum which receives only private patients for remuneration?—Yes.

15,069. It is quite a small institution, is it not? I see it had at the 1st January, 1924, 54 patients only?—That is so.

15,070. Then there is also one parochial asylum?—Yes.

15,071. That is rather a small institution at Greenock, is it not?—Yes.

15,072. And is really rather a vestige of a previous system?—Yes.

15,073. But it remains in a category by itself?—(Dr. Marr): It is really on the status of a district asylum, the District Board of Greenock.

15,074. But it has a peculiar legal status, because it is the survival of a previous system, and it is what is known as an institution with an unrestricted licence?—Yes.

15,075. It has nothing to do with you, of course?—We license it. It is more like the lunatic wards. We have to license all parochial asylums. The only one left unconverted was Greenock Parochial Asylum, and we have to license the number of beds in Greenock Parochial Asylum, limited to 200 beds.

15,076. At Greenock Parochial Asylum there are 222 inmates, or were at the 1st January, 1924?—(Sir Arthur Rose): That is so.

15,077. Then we come to a not unimportant class, the lunatic wards of poor houses?—Yes.

15,078. The poor house in Scotland is the equivalent, is it not, of the workhouse in England?—Yes.

15,079. And they also come under your supervision, and there are 14 instances of lunatic wards of poor houses?—That is right.

15,080. On the 1st January, 1924, were there 883 persons in those lunatic wards?—Yes.

15,081. Taking those five classes which we have enumerated, I think we would find, on the 1st January, 1924, that of your 18,266 registered lunatics 16,403 were in these institutions?—Yes.

15,082. And then we come to a class of much interest to us here and which we hope to hear more about in a little: patients in private dwellings?—Yes.

15,083. Do we find the balance, namely, 1,863, of the registered lunatics of Scotland are in residence in private dwellings of one kind or another?—Yes.

15,084. That is a matter on which we want some further information later. Then the only other institution in Scotland is one with which we are not concerned, the Perth establishment for State and criminal lunatics?—Yes.

15,085. That really falls outside our survey, and we have not been considering Broadmoor either in England?—Quite. These are inspected by us.

Earl Russell: Could we have the total population of Scotland?

15,086. Chairman: Yes. (To the Witness): Could you give the total estimated population of Scotland on the 1st January, 1924, so that we may have an idea as to the extent to which lunacy prevails in Scotland?—4,915,500.

15,087. Should not one bear this in mind, that in addition to the 18,266 registered lunatics there may be persons who are of unsound mind resident with their own families?—That is so.

15,088. So that these figures are not exhaustive of what you may call the insane population of Scotland?—Quite.

15,089. Now, taking first of all the different classes of institutions which you have enumerated, we are much concerned, Sir Arthur, with the various methods of admission to institutions, and they do vary, do they not, in Scotland, to the same extent as in England?—Quite, up to a point.

15,090. Let us take, first of all, the seven Royal or chartered asylums of Scotland. You have already told us that they are philanthropic institutions, and they roughly correspond to what are known as registered hospitals under the English Lunacy Acts?—Yes.

15,091. Do they receive patients at high rates of board as well as others on more economical lines?—Yes.

15,092. And they have charitable funds at their disposal which are utilised for the reception and treatment of poor private patients?—Yes.

15,093. As regards your authority in relation to those institutions, I think you have no power to make rules and regulations for their good order and management?—That is so.

15,094. But you have power to prescribe the books and minutes and returns which have to be made?—Yes.

15,095. And have you some limited powers with regard to the plans of these asylums and alterations and additions to them?—Yes.

15,096. But apart from legal powers, do you find that in practice you are frequently consulted in connection with any alterations made in such premises?—That is so.

15,097. The district asylums are erected or acquired and managed by the District Boards of Control themselves, are they not?—Yes.

15,098. But are the sites, plans, specifications and estimates all submitted to your Board?—Yes.

15,099. And they require the sanction of your Board before execution?—Yes.

15,100. I think no other sanction is required in your case?—No.

15,101. You do not have to pass them on to the Scottish Board of Health?—No.

15,102. In England, as we know, the plans go not only before the Board of Control, but also before the Minister of Health, but in Scotland the General Board of Control is the final authority on premises as regards the district asylums?—Yes.

15,103. In their case I think you have power to draw up rules and regulations for their management?—Yes.

15,104. These require the approval of the Secretary for Scotland?—That is so.

15,105. Then it is a feature, is it not, of the district asylums, that if they have spare accommodation they may receive private patients. —Yes.

15,106. But for such reception is the sanction of your Board required?—Yes.

15,107. I think as regards the actual accommodation and treatment, private patients in district asylums get exactly the same as the pauper patients?—Exactly the same.

15,108. And should the accommodation run short, I think the pauper patients get the preference?—That is so.

15,109. Then with regard to the single private asylum in Scotland, there were formerly a number of them, I think, but they have dwindled to the single instance. There you have private patients of the wealthier classes, and your functions in relation to it consist in licensing and making rules and regulations, of course apart from visitation, which applies to them all.—Yes.

17 April, 1925.]

Sir H. ARTHUR ROSE, D.S.O., and Dr. HAMILTON C. MARR.

15,110. Then with regard to the single parochial institute at Greenock, there also, I think, you make regulations for its administration.—Yes.

15,111. Sir David Drummond: Do these private patients enjoy no advantages?—Not in the district asylums. (Dr. Marr): The service patients who are private patients do get little privileges, 2s. 6d. a week.

15,112. Earl Russell: But they get those as service patients, not as private patients?—That is so. The accommodation is exactly the same.

Sir David Drummond: Are we to understand there is only one private asylum in Scotland which accommodates 56 patients or so, where the patient is able to pay for what he wants?

15,113. Chairman: No; four of the seven public asylums, that is to say, the Royal or chartered asylums, take in nothing but private patients who pay.—And all the other Royal asylums take in private patients.

Chairman: The other three take in private patients, but also pauper patients as well.

Sir Ernest Hiley: Is there any prohibition in Scotland against licensing, similar to what there is in England?

15,114. Chairman: In England in 1890 the number of licensed houses was limited, and is a diminishing quantity; there can be no new licensed houses. I do not think there is a statutory limitation in Scotland.—The general policy of our Board is to do away with the private asylum, and this particular asylum is merely a survival.

15,115. But on the particular point, I think, if my recollection serves me, there is no similar statutory embargo on the number of houses that may be licensed in Scotland. It is a matter of practice with your Board not to license more?—That is so.

15,116. But the case of the wealthy private patient, who wishes the amenities of private life as far as possible maintained, is adequately met in Scotland by the Royal Institutions?—That is so.

15,117. Of course Crichton is well known to us as being probably the best equipped asylum in the Empire—at least it so says of itself, and we accept it.—There is the Royal Asylum in Edinburgh, and all the other Royal asylums have most excellent equipment for the very wealthiest patients.

15,118. What have you to say (this is very important) as to the policy which your Board has been pursuing? You tell us that while there is no statutory restriction on the number of such institutions you may license, in practice they have dwindled to one in Scotland. On what principle is that practice founded?—Generally, the Board do not wish the principle of private or personal profit to come in on the treatment of the insane. Of course, as you will find, in the case of private dwellings we can license to the extent of four patients, but with regard to private asylums the policy of the Board, as I have said, has been to do away with private asylums, on the ground that they do not think it desirable to have any person having a pecuniary interest in the insane.

Earl Russell: You are free from our difficulty in England, by having these very excellent chartered institutions, but how would you meet it in our case?

15,119. Chairman: I wish you could help us there.—You would have to have chartered institutions in the same way, I think.

15,120. But the Royal asylums in Scotland are of course, managed, are they not, by governing bodies appointed under their Charter or Act of Parliament?—That is so.

15,121. These, of course, are persons who have no pecuniary interest in the institution at all?—None at all.

15,122. The medical superintendent is a salaried official appointed by them?—All the officials are salaried officials.

15,123. Therefore, although patients in the Royal asylums may make large and profitable payments, these payments all enure to the benefit of the institution, and not to any private person's profit; that is the feature?—That is so.

15,124. And I suppose it is on the principle of bearing each other's burdens, that is to say, the wealthier patients in those institutions whose payments yield a profit enable the poor patients to be accommodated?—Yes. Concrete instances occur in all our Royal asylums. That very lady I instanced is being maintained as a patient would be maintained who is paying £500 to £1,000 a year, and her only payment is £35 a year to the Glasgow Asylum.

15,125. And she gets those benefits, because the institution is endowed and also because the institution receives from its wealthier inmates a profit which can be applied to the welfare of those less fortunately situated?—That is so.

15,126. Mr. Micklem: Is the treatment and accommodation for all patients in the Royal asylums alike, or do those who pay more get different treatment and provision?—The treatment is the same, but the accommodation is different; that is to say, you may have a separate villa, you may have a separate sitting room and bedroom; you may have only a bedroom with a conjoint sitting room; but the question of payment has more to do with accommodation really; the treatment is the same for pauper and for private patients.

15,127. Sir David Drummond: Do you recognise that a large number of patients go to these Royal institutions from this country?—From England and from Ireland.

15,128. The accommodation is abundant—is ample for all?—There is ample accommodation.

15,129. Even though a large number go from this country?—That is so.

15,130. We are obliged to send over the border a number of our private patients because we have not the accommodation.

15,131. Mr. Snell: Are those counted in the statistics as belonging to Scotland?—Yes.

15,132. So that really your proportion is less?—Yes.

15,133. It does appear, if large numbers go, that the proportion of insanity in Scotland should be lowered.

Sir Ernest Hiley: There are paying patients that go.

Mr. Snell: I quite understand that.

Chairman: I have no doubt that Scottish patients may benefit by the greater affluence of English patients who come to Scotland for the benefit of those institutions.

15,134. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Does that amount to very much? I mean Scotch people do come to England.—We have no fewer than 50 cases in England, not necessarily registered lunatics, but 50 cases not able to look after their own affairs.

15,135. Sir David Drummond: I suppose you have no statistics—you cannot say how many?—We have no statistics regarding nationality. They could be quite easily furnished if you think it an important point. I do not think it is.

15,136. Chairman: I do not think so. Of course, the statistics you have given us are of registered lunatics. Those will not include voluntary patients?—No.

15,137. And, as we shall hear in the sequel, the voluntary system has been greatly developed in Scotland, and many of those who come from across the Border may be persons who have come voluntarily for the purpose of getting the benefit of the institutions?—They generally come voluntarily.

Mr. Snell: What I wanted to find out was whether any number of persons from Ireland or England went to Scotland because the treatment there was more agreeable in these chartered institutions—whether the houses themselves were an attraction.

15,138. Chairman: Can you tell us, Dr. Marr, or Sir Arthur, whether the Scottish method, and particularly the existence of those institutions, has proved a source of attraction to persons from either England or Ireland, or elsewhere?—No doubt. I think particularly the Irish patients go to the Crichton Institution—there used to be a great many Irish patients there, and there is no doubt it was the general treatment there under Dr. Rutherford that first initiated that movement of the Irish patients to this country.

Sir H. ARTHUR ROSE, D.S.O., and Dr. HAMILTON C. MARR.

Mr. Snell: I wanted to find out why people went from England. I can understand the Irish conditions may be quite different, and it would interest us to find out whether English people felt that English institutions did not offer so good a chance as the Scottish.

15,139. Chairman: Have you found many English patients have been attracted?—Quite a number; I would not say a very great number, but quite a number.

15,140. Earl Russell: That would depend very largely upon the opinion of their medical advisers rather than on their own?—Yes, that is so. (Sir Arthur Rose): We can get these figures if you wish them.

Chairman: I think it is hardly worth the trouble of taking out the statistics, except that it is rather instructive. You naturally find a flow of patients to the places where they get the best treatment. That may depend to some extent upon the reputation of the medical superintendent of the institution, or it may depend upon the fact that the doctor in attendance on the case has himself come from the district or knows it, or it may depend upon the superior treatment given, or the greater amenity of the life in those institutions.

15,141. Sir David Drummond: And it also depends upon the fact that in the North of England a very large proportion of the doctors are Scotch, and they send their patients over the Border?—(Dr. Marr): I think there is more in that perhaps than in anything else. The doctors in suggesting institutions act just in the same way as a consultant would do with regard to a surgical case or a medical case, and send them to Scotland.

15,142. Earl Russell: Recommend what they know?—Yes.

15,143. Mr. Snell: Would there not be some real medical ground for removing a patient so far from his friends. One of our difficulties is to keep patients near to their friends, but if they are moved hundreds of miles away is there a real reason for it?—It depends upon the circumstances; in some cases they go voluntarily.

Chairman: Dr. Marr points out that a voluntary patient selects his own place with the assistance of his doctor. In the case of the involuntary or certified patient, it is the relatives who select it themselves, and they may petition for his admission to the institution, and they therefore have the choice of the place.

15,144. Mr. Snell: Then in those cases the relatives would presumably be well enough off to make the journey?—Yes.

Sir David Drummond: As a matter of attraction, I believe in Scotland it is not necessary to certify a patient until a certain period elapses, or until certain changes take place in that case after the patient has arrived in Scotland.

Chairman: That may be the attraction in Edinburgh. We come to the six months' question a little later.

15,145. Earl Russell: As a matter of law, I take it, a patient in a Scottish institution could not go there on an English certificate?—(Sir Arthur Rose): That is so. But on general principles we believe it is the extraordinary excellence of the way in which the Royal asylums are conducted in Scotland that attracts patients from outside; and it is because of this extraordinary high state of efficiency and comfort and general amenity (so far as it can be done in such an institution) that we, as a Board, have been able to limit any development of the private asylum.

Chairman: In short, the need is not felt in Scotland for licensed houses, because the need is catered for otherwise.

Earl Russell: They do not suffer from our difficulties?

15,146. Chairman: Yes. As regards the pauper inmates, who defrays the cost of their maintenance and treatment?—The parish of settlement.

15,147. There are lunacy assessments in Scotland. Is there a precept addressed to the parish council to rate, or to the city, if it happens to be a parish co-terminous with a district?—(Dr. Marr): The parish rates for maintenance purposes, and the city rates for providing; the parish always rates for maintenance.

15,148. Earl Russell: I thought I saw something here about half the cost.—That is in connection with the Mental Deficiency Act.

15,149. The entire maintenance is charged on the rates, much as it would be here?—Yes, with the exception of the relief of a lunacy grant—local taxation. In Scotland, it is a consolidated or a lump sum. In England it is 4s. per head per patient.

15,150. Chairman: It is over £100,000—the annual State contribution?—£115,000.

15,151. How is that allocated among the different institutions?—Since the war it has been stereotyped, but for each registered pauper patient the grant is paid on that basis.

15,152. Simply divided up?—Simply divided among the paupers registered.

15,153. Earl Russell: Per capita?—Yes, per capita: it comes to about 2s. 8d. per week.

15,154. Chairman: Now let us come to the question of admission to those different institutions. First of all, let us take the Royal asylums, and let us take there the case, first of all, of the ordinary insane person. In that case, is the admission to the institution dependent upon an order being pronounced by the Sheriff?—Yes.

15,155. And is the Sheriff's order made on a statutory form for private patients and pauper patients alike?—That is so.

15,156. Now just at this point we will get on the note a description of the Sheriff in Scotland. The Sheriff in Scotland is the local judge, is he not, of the territory allotted to him?—That is so.

15,157. And includes the Sheriff-Substitute?—Yes.

15,158. Is the principle this: that Scotland is divided up into areas corresponding to counties over one or more of which a Sheriff is placed who is resident in Edinburgh, except in the case of the Sheriff of Lanarkshire who resides in Glasgow; and the Sheriff is a practising member of the Bar in the ordinary case?—Yes.

15,159. He has Sheriff-Substitutes who function as the local judges throughout his district.—That is so.

15,160. Stationed at different points, in different populous centres?—Yes.

15,161. And the Sheriff-Substitute may be taken to correspond roughly to the County Court Judge in England?—Yes.

15,162. He is in practice almost invariably a member of the Bar?—Yes.

15,163. Although a member of the Solicitors' branch of the profession may be appointed, and there are some who have come from that source.—Yes.

15,164. Then they have very responsible jurisdiction, have they not? The Sheriff-Substitute can appeal to the Sheriff?—Yes.

15,165. They have practically unlimited jurisdiction in civil cases as regards pecuniary amount; and they have also extensive criminal powers which the County Court Judge in England does not possess?—Yes.

15,166. And may we take it that the Sheriff-Substitutes of Scotland are trained lawyers of very considerable experience?—That is so.

Earl Russell: The criminal powers correspond pretty well to Quarter Sessions?

15,167. Chairman: Yes; they have powers of imprisonment up to two years, and they have corresponding powers of fining, of course. They can try cases with a jury on indictment as well as summary cases, which they dispose of themselves. And a Sheriff-Substitute will be found in all the populous centres of Scotland?—Yes.

17 April, 1925.]

Sir H. ARTHUR ROSE, D.S.O., and Dr. HAMILTON C. MARR.

15,168. The Sheriff really is the judge of appeal from the Sheriff-Substitute?—Yes.

15,169. But he also has power to sit as a Judge of first instance, and all the powers that are given to the Sheriff may be exercised either by the Sheriff properly so-called, or by his Sheriff-Substitute?—Yes.

15,170. In Scotland therefore the principle has been to take advantage of the existence of those local or district judges for the purpose of pronouncing the orders for the detention of mental patients?—Yes.

15,171. And I think in Scotland the justice of the peace is not utilised at all?—No.

15,172. There is one exception—in remote districts he may temporarily act until a patient can be taken before the Sheriff?—That is so.

15,173. That is the only instance in which a justice of the peace functions?—Yes.

15,174. You have already mentioned what is a most important distinction between the English and the Scottish systems. In the case of those orders for admission to a Royal asylum there is no distinction between the procedure in the case of a private patient and in the case of a pauper patient?—That is so.

15,175. In each case alike is the procedure initiated by a petition to the Sheriff?—Yes.

15,176. And is that petition in a statutory form—must it be accompanied by two medical certificates for private and pauper patients alike?—Yes.

15,177. And must it also be accompanied by a statement of particulars of the case?—That is so.

15,178. Now who presents the petition to the Sheriff for the admission of a patient?—In the case of a private patient the nearest relative, the petitioner; in the case of a pauper patient, the inspector of poor of the parish to which the patient is chargeable, and in which the patient is found.

15,179. The inspector of poor in Scotland corresponds roughly to the relieving officer in England?—That is so.

15,180. He is the official representative of the parish council, the body in charge of the Poor Law administration in Scotland?—Yes.

15,181. You said the nearest relative is the normal petitioner, but it need not necessarily be the nearest relative, need it, in the case of the private patient?—It need not necessarily be the nearest relative, but anyone who has a special interest in the patient.

15,182. The Sheriff has to satisfy himself that the applicant is a proper person to act in the matter?—That is so.

15,183. As regards the medical certificates, which must be two in number for private patient and pauper patient alike, the form is practically the same for England, and we need not go into it. You are required to state facts observed by the medical practitioner himself, and those communicated to him, and the examination must be made independently. Have you any view, Dr. Marr, just in passing, as to the desirability of the doctors making their examination independently; because it has been suggested to us that consultation between the doctors is desirable, and that the risk of collusion is negligible?—I think the risk of collusion is negligible. It is more important, I think, to have a medical certificate given by a person who has some knowledge of mental disorders. The difficulty we have is that practically every medical man has a qualification in mental disorder which is a very abstruse and difficult department of medicine. That is, I think, where the confusion emerges more than anything else. That is to say, a newly graduated medical man is quite qualified to write a certificate as well as a man who has had 30 or 40 years in general practice or in special practice.

15,184. Earl Russell: Theoretically, of course, he is qualified to treat typhoid fever?—That is so, but he would not be appointed a Public Health Officer. He would require a special diploma. I noticed that in France medical men before they are appointed medical officers of asylums must have a special course of five years in medicine and pass two special examinations.

15,185. Chairman: That is the qualification for the head of an institution, but does the French law require that a certifying doctor shall have those qualifications?—No; I do not think it is possible in the present state of medical science, but I think something should be done on the lines of the Mental Deficiency Act where the Board of Control has to approve of a certifying medical officer.

15,186. We shall hear later, I understand, from Dr. Carswell of what was done in Glasgow where a special doctor was set apart for the purpose?—Yes, and, as a matter of fact, we have gone further in Glasgow. The question of the erection of a third asylum was raised, and instead of erecting a third asylum—it was a very difficult time to consider such an expensive matter—new observation wards were opened at Stobhill, over a year and a half ago, and all the patients that require certification in Glasgow come there in the first instance.

15,187. We look forward with interest to hearing Dr. Carswell's description of that method which has been pursued there, but the features of it are the observation ward, and a specially selected official whose duty is to certify in all the pauper cases?—But this method is to reduce the certification to its normal limits.

15,188. That is a large topic of great importance, but its relevance to what we are discussing just now is this, that the expedient has been adopted in one area of Scotland of having a specially qualified doctor set aside for certification purposes?—Yes.

15,189. Earl Russell: I understand from the doctors themselves there is this difficulty, that when you pass a doctor as qualified into the world you pass him as qualified, and it is very difficult to differentiate between one qualified medical man and another?—Yes, but mental disorders should be put at least on as high a plane as ordinary physical disorders, particularly public health.

15,190. He is quite competent to sign every sort of certificate, for instance, death certificates; he is competent to certify that his patient has died of heart disease?—I do not think he is competent to deal with ordinary mental disorders.

15,191. Chairman: Is that in consequence of the complexity of the disorders?—Undoubtedly. The ordinary medical man has only had three months' lectures on mental disorders. He may not be asked a question on mental disorders in his final examination, and then suddenly he gets his degree, and he has to deal with a subject of which he has had no experience, and the most difficult and complex of diseases.

15,192. Sir David Drummond: Would it not be better to improve the education of the doctor in this direction, so that every man might be competent?—Undoubtedly, so that they have some qualification to deal with this very complicated and special subject.

15,193. Chairman: One of the difficulties in exacting a special qualification from a certifying doctor is this, that in the less populous areas you cannot get them.—With the Mental Deficiency Act we, as a Board, have to approve the medical officers. Naturally, in the present condition of affairs every respectable medical practitioner is approved of, whether he has special knowledge of mental disorder or not; but as time goes on, as we perhaps get people educated to the idea that mental disorders are a very specialised department, we might be able to draw this net closer.

15,194. Earl Russell: But may it still not happen in a sparsely populated county area that you may not find a certifying man available?—The difficulty would not occur under the system I suggest. In Scotland we have very sparsely populated areas, and the medical man is there appointed under the Mental Deficiency Act.

Sir H. ARTHUR ROSE, D.S.O., and Dr. HAMILTON C. MARR.

15,195. Chairman: You may have no option, you know?—At first probably, if there is nothing against the man, it would not be a question of qualification.

15,196. I do not quite see that solution, because ultimately you will still have sparsely populated districts, and ultimately still have the country doctor in charge?—But the question of certification is a legal and social question more than a medical question.

15,197. Of course you always have the Medical Officer of Health for the county?—Yes.

15,198. Sir David Drummond: You are aware that in this country in a number of instances the qualifications involve an examination in mental medicine as well as in other subjects?—If that is so, that is satisfactory as far as I am concerned, if they have a diploma for psychiatry, but of course, you cannot expect it in every case, as the Chairman puts it.

15,199. Chairman: We note your observation upon it, and it is desirable, of course, in the public interest, that this responsible duty should be discharged by the most competent persons available. That is the ideal, of course. Whether we have reached a stage where a qualification ought to be prescribed or not is another matter?—I do not think we have reached that stage.

15,200. Earl Russell: It is also true that in 80 per cent. of the cases there is no difficulty?—Yes, I think so. It is the borderline case that is difficult.

15,201. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Are you not very anxious to do away with the separation between mental disease and bodily disease?—I do not see any separation.

15,202. It might seem inadvisable to have a special class of practitioner to judge of those people who are mentally diseased?—No, I meant the practitioner who would know the subject—not a special class.

15,203. Does that not apply to every specialist?—Yes, but mental disorders I think particularly require a specialist.

15,204. Will not every specialist say that?—Yes, I hope so.

15,205. Chairman: I think we see the difficulty, Dr. Marr. Now let us get back from this very valuable discussion of the qualification of the doctor to the main lines of Sir Arthur's proof. The features which strike us at this stage are that the magistrate is a qualified magistrate in this case, the Sheriff, a person possessing legal qualification, and that there is no differentiation in procedure between pauper and private patient, and that there are two medical certificates before the Sheriff will pronounce his order?—(Sir Arthur Rose): That is so.

15,206. Then in Scotland, I think, the Sheriff does not need to see the patient?—He can if he wants to, but he does not need to.

15,207. And, I think, in practice he does not generally do so?—Practically never.

15,208. So he confines himself to a scrutiny of the certificates to see whether they contain adequate evidence to vouch the statement that the patient is of unsound mind, and to justify him in pronouncing the detention order?—That is so.

15,209. Earl Russell: Was Dr. Robertson right in describing it as a mere formality?—Personally I consider it more than a mere formality.

15,210. Chairman: Of course one knows a good many Sheriffs oneself; some may treat it as a formality. I know that one or two regard it as a very anxious part of their work?—Quite, and they sometimes refuse to make an order.

15,211. But their task is not a task in supersession of the medical task in any sense of the term, but rather that of a person skilled in examining evidence. The Sheriff has before him statements and his duty is to see whether those statements support adequately the proposition that this is a person of unsound mind who ought to be detained?—That is so.

Earl Russell: He considers the same sort of material as on an ex parte application for an injunction 15,212. Chairman: Yes, on affidavits. He has before him two affidavits, and he must judge whether those are sufficient to justify him in pronouncing an order?—Quite.

15,213. And that is the point at which the public are represented in the process?—Yes.

15,214. Have you in Scotland had any complaints as to this procedure by means of the Sheriff and the two medical certificates?—No material complaints.

15,215. As regards expense, have you found that the two medical certificates involve you in considerable expense?—No, we have never had any complaints.

15,216. In England there is, in the case of the pauper patient, only a single certificate, and it has been suggested that a recommendation that there should be two certificates in England would involve a considerable additional charge upon public funds?—(Dr. Marr): With regard to pauper patients, the second certificate may be filled in by one of the medical officers of the asylum to which the pauper patient is sent.

15,217. Earl Russell: Really?—Yes. That is a point which we, as a Board, have noted for amendment in a Consolidating Act, because we would wish that the ordinary pauper patient should have the same privileges before certification as a private patient.

15,218. Chairman: Then in the case of the private patient there is this difference, that the two medical certificates must be by persons not connected with the institution to which he is being sent?—That is so.

15,219. Sir Ernest Hiley: Is the second certificate in the pauper case given after the patient gets into the institution?—Generally such patients are admitted on what is known as a certificate of emergency.

15,220. Then it would be given afterwards?—Yes.

15,221. Earl Russell: That would create great public alarm here, I think.—(Sir Arthur Rose): Still we have the one certificate which you have already from the independent medical man.

15,222. Of course we have it in a sense in the reports which are required to be made upon him when he arrives?—Yes.

15,223. Chairman: But the medical officer of the institution in giving a certificate would not receive a fee for it, would he?—(Dr. Marr): In certain cases he would. For instance, in Glasgow, which is a district, he would not get a fee because his emoluments cover his whole duties, but where a county is dealing with parishes, the District Board is appointed by the county council, but the patient is sent by the parish council; then the medical officer signing the second certificate would, and does, charge a fee.

15,224. Which is recouped by the parish council?—Well, the parish council pay him direct.

15,225. Earl Russell: What is the fee—a guinea each?—Yes.

15,226. So two certificates would cost two guineas as against one guinea?—Yes. (Sir Arthur Rose): We have raised the point with the district authorities, and we do not like this second certification by an official of the institution, and in one case, Lanarkshire, at any rate, it has been definitely stopped.

15,227. Of course we have a provision in England by which a medical officer of a workhouse can certify.

—Yes. (Dr. Marr): Of course there is great difficulty in the far off parishes, in the Outer Isles.

15,228. It is a thing you propose to make illegal?—Yes.

15,229. It could be met by the second certificate not being given before he comes in?—That is so.

15,230. That is the way you could get over your practical difficulty, is it not?—Yes. (Sir Arthur Rose): I think it is only fair to say we have never had any evidence of abuse from this practice. It is simply the possibility.

15,231. Chairman: Most of these requirements are precautionary and rather for the purpose of relieving any possible public anxiety than to remove existing abuses?—Quite.

17 April, 1925.]

Sir H. ARTHUR ROSE, D.S.O., and Dr. HAMILTON C. MARR.

15,232. Dr. Marr referred to the emergency order which is an important feature in Scotland. May any patient be taken direct to an institution on an emergency order signed by one medical officer and addressed to the medical superintendent of the institution?—(Dr. Marr): That is so.

15,233. But that operates only for three days?—Yes.

15,234. And within that time proper certification must follow?—Yes.

15,235. And if no such order is made by the Sheriff, the patient must be released?—Discharged within three days.

15,236. Then after the patient has been received into the asylum, has he to be seen after two days, and before the expiration of 14 days, by the superintendent who must make a report upon his case?—Yes, and send a copy of that report to the Board of Control.

15,237. Along with a copy of all the documents relating to his case?—A copy of the certification, and the admission of the patient.

15,238. Yes. Is that the method by which patients reach these Royal asylums?—Yes.

15,239. And is that applicable to all the certified patients who are there?—Quite.

15,240. Then is there a class dealt with specially in the legislation of Scotland, namely, dangerous lunatics—that is to say, persons who are behaving insanely in public, and who may be threatening danger to others, or be offensive to public decency?—(Sir Arthur Rose): Yes.

15,241. No doubt the police are the people who come into contact with these persons, first of all?—Yes.

15,242. If there is no actual offence committed, are such persons handed over to the inspector of poor or to relatives?—Yes.

15,243. And then the relatives, or the inspector of poor, will take the usual steps of petitioning?—That is so.

15,244. If, on the other hand, there is immediate danger to the person himself or to others, he can be dealt with as a dangerous lunatic under Section 15 of the Act of 1862?—Yes.

15,245. And is provision made for the Procurator-Fiscal holding an enquiry into the matter before the Sheriff?—Yes.

15,246. We need not go into the detail of that procedure, but it may either go its whole length, in which case the Sheriff pronounces an order for the detention in a particular institution of the person in question, or the proceedings may be abandoned, and the inspector of poor proceed in the usual way by petition.—Quite.

Miss Madeleine Symons: Is it usual for the patients to go direct to the asylum?

15,247. Chairman: That is the next point we must take up. There is one feature we have heard much of in England, and a feature which many think objectionable, that the patient in transit to the asylum passes through Poor Law institutions in one shape or another, is taken for instance to a poor-house or workhouse, is there examined and certified, and ultimately passes into the asylum. Do I understand that in Scotland that intermediate stage does not exist?—Normally it does not exist.

15,248. Does the patient go direct on an emergency order to the asylum, or is the patient just kept at home until the proceedings are gone through, if there is no immediate danger or urgency?—If there is no immediate danger or urgency, they remain at home as a rule, but if there is immediate danger or urgency they are taken direct to an asylum.

15,249. So they never pass through the wards of a poorhouse at all?—No, but of course they are pauper patients. We have that feeling, too, of the stigma.

15,250. For the moment that is rather a slightly different point. The legal status is one thing; but looking at it from the point of view of the patient, some have thought it objectionable that en route to the asylum the patient should pass through a Poor Law institution with the possibly unpleasant associations of that idea. In your case I take it the patient goes direct to the asylum from his house?—A certified patient.

15,251. Or, if he is found in the streets, what happens then?—(Dr. Marr): We have observation wards in all the big towns now. The patients go there.

15,252. Is that a Poor Law place?—No, observation wards are quite different; they are places for the treatment of cases that might not require certification.

15,253. They are not poorhouses?—They are parts of Poor Law hospitals.

15,254. Earl Russell: They would correspond to a Poor Law infirmary here?—Yes.

15,255. Chairman: That is the case of the dangerous lunatic, or the lunatic found wandering at large?—No; all cases, except the dangerous cases. The dangerous cases are usually sent direct from a Court.

15,256. Earl Russell: Suppose a man were found in the streets of Glasgow kicking up an insane disturbance, would they take him to an asylum, or to a magistrate, in the first instance?—In Glasgow they would probably report that case to the inspector of poor, and the case would probably be taken to Duke Street, or Stobhill. These observation wards are practically wards of a general hospital in every respect. That is to say, Stobhill, for instance, has consulting physicians, consulting surgeons, and all the necessary apparatus for treatment, and the wards for treatment of mental cases are visited by a visiting physician. They are exactly on all fours with the wards of an ordinary general hospital.

15,257. Chairman: But it is a parish hospital?—Yes.

15,258. Stobhill is a general hospital for all cases?—That is so.

15,259. You have certain wards which are exclusively dedicated to mental cases?—There are two wards.

15,260. Then it is just a general hospital, but it is not like the Edinburgh Royal Infirmary. It is on the rates, is it not?—It is on the rates.

15,261. It is a Poor Law infirmary therefore?—It is like the Edinburgh Infirmary in this respect, that they have visiting physicians; the only thing is that it is a Poor Law hospital.

15,262. Earl Russell: But he would not necessarily pass through the police court even though the police had apprehended him?—As a rule, he does not. (Sir Arthur Rose.) He would go to the police office until some other place was found. May I come back to your point, because I think we have wandered a little far away from it?

15,263. If you please?—Your point was what happens to a certified lunatic in regard to disposal?

15,264. Yes?—That is perfectly clear, they are taken direct to an asylum without any intermediate stage.

15,265. Chairman: Let us take an ordinary citizen, whether he is a person in the West end of Glasgow, or a person in the East end of Glasgow: it has been ascertained he is a person who needs to be detained in his own interests: the inspector of poor takes the initiative, or the relatives take the initiative. In either event the emergency order may be obtained at once on a medical certificate, upon which a patient is taken direct from his own house to a suitable institution?—Yes.

15,266. And within three days the necessary procedure for his permanent detention can be carried through?—That is so.

15,267. If, on the other hand, the case is not acute, the patient will remain at home until the necessary procedure is gone through, and then he is taken direct from the house to the institution?—Yes.

15,268. That is very important, because in England as far as we have learned, very few pauper patients go direct from their homes to the asylum.

Earl Russell: They do sometimes.

17 April, 1925.]

Sir H. ARTHUR ROSE, D.S.O., and Dr. HAMILTON C. MARR.

15,269. Chairman: We have had some evidence of it, but may I say the usual rule is through the workhouse?—(Sir Arthur Rose.) Where the confusion arose through the mention of observation wards to my mind was this: the observation wards seem to bring in that intermediate step, but it is in respect only of non-certified patients; they are not lunatics, they are incipient cases, and a great many should never become certified. (Dr. Marr.) The majority do not become certified. (Sir Arthur Rose.) There is that stage creeping in, but for a different reason altogether, I presume.

Earl Russell: The legal difficulty in this country is that the emergency order under Section 21 of the Act of 1890 does not admit to the asylum. It is only the complete certification that admits.

Sir David Drummond: Just with regard to that point, may we ask as to whether the patient is advised as to the contents of the certificate?

15,270. Chairman: Yes, we have heard a great deal about that. In the procedure of certification what part does the patient play? He does not see the Sheriff?—(Dr. Marr.) He only sees the medical man, and very often, of course, the characteristic point about mental disease is that a person suffering from it does not think he is suffering from mental disease. He only sees the doctor examining him, but does not see his certificate.

15,271. He has no right, I take it, in Scotland to see a magistrate at all at any stage?—That is so.

15,272. Here we have heard much of the importance of the alleged lunatic having an opportunity of, so to speak, presenting his own case. We shall assume that it is a mistaken diagnosis, and that the patient is perfectly sane, but may be eccentric, and that two doctors have thought he is a certifiable person who ought to be detained. Has he no opportunity of presenting his case, so to speak, against detention, to any independent person?—At once, if he feels that he is being illegally placed in an institution, he has the power of appeal to us as a Board.

15,273. But at the stage of certification, which Sir David has in mind at present, he has no appeal against his detention to any outside persons?—That is so, unless of course by pure resistance. He has no appeal. (Sir Arthur Rose.) That is the point—he loses his freedom.

15,274. He loses his freedom on two medical certificates scrutinised by a lawyer?—That is so.

15,275. What have you to say as to the advantages or disadvantages of that? Do you find that in practice persons are liable to be detained who should not be detained, and who might have satisfied a judge that there was no reason for their detention in spite of the medical certificates which had been pronounced?—(Dr. Marr.) We have many complaints about undue detention, but where there are real grounds for undue detention, I think I am safe in saying that the Board have only investigated two cases within the last year, and these two cases applied to the Board immediately they had been put into an institution.

15,276. I think there is that safeguard, that although at the stage of certification the patient is in the hands more or less of the doctor and his relatives, there is in Scotland provision made for his being entitled to appeal after he is in an institution?—As soon as he is admitted into an institution he can say he is illegally detained, and as a general rule we are there next day. We got an appeal from Montrose one day, and I was up next day seeing the lady who appealed.

15,277. That is a statutory right?—That is a statutory right. All letters must be sent to the Commissioners at once unopened.

15,278. So that if I found myself an unwilling inmate of one of the institutions I could write a letter to the Board of Control, and it would be sent unopened; and would immediate action be taken upon that if I complained that I was being improperly detained?—Immediate action is taken.

15,279. Earl Russell: Does it come to anything further than the right he has here, to write to the Board of Control here and say he is wrongfully certified?—I do not know.

15,280. Chairman: The Board of Control in Scotland can, of course, if it pleases, invoke two independent medical men to make an examination at once in such a case?—Yes, we do that very frequently.

15,281. There is still a gap?—Excuse me. May I further amplify that by saying that the only time the patient can see his certificates is after he has been in an asylum, and has been discharged; then he has a statutory right to a copy of the certificate.

15,282. Sir David Drummond: It has been suggested to us that the patient should have conveyed to him the contents of the certificate, should see the certificate before it is presented, as it were?—I am afraid it would be a very difficult proceeding. I do not believe in subterfuge of any kind, but very often they have, in cases of religion especially, to use subterfuge and say the patient is not suffering from delusions when he is suffering from delusions.

15,283. Chairman: The kind of thing that has been suggested to us is this, that the doctor might include among "facts learned from others" a particular fact that might sound rather fantastic, and upon which he might have proceeded as part of the evidence; but the patient might have said it actually happened, and be able to prove that it did happen, so that the thing that was taken as symptomatic of the condition was in point of fact historically true. It was thought that the patient, if he had access to the documents, might be able to put his finger on one or two things and say, "You are quite mistaken about those things; those are things which happened, and are not delusions at all"?—I think these difficulties could be got rid of by limiting certification of patients actually to those cases to be certified for social and legal purposes, that is to say, a danger to themselves or a danger to others, or who had peculiarities that made them anti-social. In the other cases I see no reason why they should not be admitted to institutions as voluntary inmates.

15,284. That may be the solution of the difficulty. With regard to any case which is really appropriate for certification it would be undesirable probably to let them see the certificate?—I think it would be very dangerous to some of those people that they had delusions about.

15,285. On the other hand, with regard to the cases where the person is, although possibly deluded, reasonably intelligent in other matters and interested actually in his own case, these cases may be possibly dealt with under the other expedient of observation wards and provisional detention, and so on?—Yes.

15,286. But there is one gap in the procedure. You say that the patient may after admission address a letter to you which would be followed by action: but how will he know he may address a letter to you? Is there provision made to inform the patient that he may write?—There is no definite provision made, but all the patients are informed of their privileges as far as the Board is concerned.

15,287. Earl Russell: By whom, and in what manner?—In the institution, by the superintendent.

15,288. By a written notice?—No, we have no notice.

15,289. By verbal communication?—Verbal communication.

15,290. Chairman: He cannot give a verbal communication of much value to a person in a state of melancholic stupor?—If a person protests against his being there, it is the superintendent's duty at once to inform the patient how he has a remedy, if he himself has come to the conclusion that the patient should be detained. There are some cases the superintendent will not detain.

15,291. It has occurred to us, Dr. Marr (and perhaps Sir Arthur might consider this too), that the Lunacy code is so very complicated that the ordinary layman cannot readily grasp the various rights which a patient has and which the relatives have. Just as in the case of, let us say, the Savings Bank, and so on, the elaborate regulations are boiled down into leaflets for the comprehension of the public, so also when a patient is taken to an asylum under certification it might be useful if the relatives were furnished, and the patients were furnished, with some simple précis of the situation, explaining in simple and non-legal language that the patient may write letters and see doctors, and the rights he possesses, and the relatives' rights of visiting, and so on, because members of the public do not have access to Acts of Parliament?—(Sir Arthur Rose): It is well worth considering; we have had a similar point in view.

Sir H. ARTHUR ROSE, D.S.O., and Dr. HAMILTON C. MARR.

15,292. Earl Russell: What do you do about notices in the wards as to their right to write letters?—We have no notices.

15,293. So it is a mere accident that a person knows he has this statutory right?—(Dr. Marr): The only instance is where a patient on admission states he has been illegally sent into the institution. A medical man is always there admitting and receiving the patients.

15,294. Chairman: But he has no statutory duty to tell him?—No.

15,295. Earl Russell: But the patient has a statutory right to write to you, as in England, but he has no notice of that in the wards?—There is no notice in the wards.

15,296. Have you not considered putting up notices telling him about his rights?—I do not think it is desirable to put up notices in wards.

15,297. But there are notices put up in English asylums?—They usually do not read them.

15,298. Chairman: Under the Scottish method they like to have as few notices about the place as possible, but in England this notice is a statutory requirement; at any rate where there are private patients there must be a notice posted in the ward informing the patients of their right to send letters unopened to certain mentioned officials; and we have also heard a good deal about the desirability of having post boxes in the wards into which the patients can drop their letters and correspondence, without it having to pass through the hands of nurses?—(Dr. Marr): We have that in several of our asylums.

15,299. Do you approve of that?—In some cases, of course, letters necessarily reach a destination that might be annoyed by them, but I think in general it works there.

Earl Russell: But that is not the point. It is not that the letters should necessarily leave the asylum, it is that they should reach somebody in a superior position without being handled by the attendants in the ward.

15,300. Chairman: We do not suggest that the letter of a patient who posts half his dinner in an envelope should go; but a patient who writes a letter wants to have the solace of feeling that his letter is not passing through the hands of subordinate persons, and will reach a superior authority, and that the superior authority will of course deal with the matter properly.—Yes. Of course as a rule in Scotland we do not trouble so much with the letters, because we like to have as many patients as possible on parole, and these patients can post letters for others. As a matter of fact during the war, although the soldier patients were not certified, there was a hospital at Crookston for 350 cases of mentally afflicted soldiers: 150 of these soldiers every Friday went into Glasgow unattended by orderlies. They were all uncertified, but all mental cases who would have been certified but for the war. They were in a mental hospital, not in a neurasthenic hospital, and 150 out of 350 went into Glasgow every Friday and they sent letters. Of course they were sending them to Mr. Lloyd George and some of these people, but I never interfered because I knew the patients, and it would have deprived them of liberty if they had been stopped. I preferred that they should post the letters. I do not think there is any objection to that course so long as they are really not dangerous to others.

15,301. I have been rather attracted personally by the idea of telling the relatives, and possibly the patient, if he is capable of understanding, a little about his rights and his privileges when he enters an institution. When we ourselves go to an hotel we like to have a few directions about it; and more especially when we go to an institution where one may be for some time, we want to know a little about how it is managed; and those intelligent patients who, after all, constitute a large part of the asylums seem to me to be entitled to know a little of the régime under which they are living?—Undoubtedly.

15,302. Earl Russell: Many of those we have seen complain of the secrecy and absence of knowledge—a sort of helpless feeling they have?—I do not know whether it is due to a natural proclivity, but a Scotsman or Scotswoman who is interned in an asylum usually assert their independence and want to know why they have been put there, and the superintendent tells them they can appeal to the Board, and we get letters frequently. I have no objection to your suggestion or anything that would help a patient in any way.

15,303. Mr. Snell: Would Dr. Marr think that the writing of as many letters as a patient wants to write is of any therapeutic value—does it help him at all?—Yes, I think so. It is a safety valve.

15,304. It helps him and does not over-excite him?—That is so, just as an interview with an official often helps the staff.

15,305. Chairman: It is an unburdening of themselves?—Yes.

15,306. Mr. Snell: I was wondering whether the depression following writing would be a greater evil than not writing at all?—I think if you took writing away from some patients you would deprive them of all that made life valuable. (Sir Arthur Rose): I should say that, from the quite considerable number of letters one does receive, this privilege is pretty well understood.

15,307. Chairman: There are people even in other capacities who have received such letters in considerable volume. Now I do not think we need deal with the criminal lunatics, or the lunatic soldiers and sailors to which you allude in your précis. I think we might pass at once to the voluntary boarders in the asylum. For the admission of a person as a voluntary boarder, I understand that in Scotland no formality is required except merely a written application to the superintendent of an institution for admission?—That is so.

15,308. That is all that is required in the first instance, and then I understand that the superintendent must communicate with your Board to get your sanction to his remaining on?—Yes.

15,309. And that you are apprised that there is in that institution a voluntary boarder named so-and-so who has been received there on a certain day?—Quite.

15,310. Can the superintendent detain that voluntary boarder for any period against his will?—Not for more than three days.

15,311. So that it is a 72 hours' period, which we find in Lord Onslow's Bill, which is the rule in Scotland?—Apparently.

15,312. Are there any regulations made with regard to voluntary boarders in Scotland?—(Dr. Marr): No regulations.

15,313. Where do we find the provision, for instance, that he may be detained for three days?—You will find the provision in Section 15 of the Act of 1866, and you also find it as altered in the Mental Deficiency Act.

15,314. I think Section 59 also of the 1913 Act deals with it?—That is so.

15,315. "If a person desires to submit himself to treatment in an asylum as a voluntary boarder under the provisions of Section 15 of the Act of 1866, it shall, notwithstanding anything contained in that Section, be lawful for the superintendent to receive such person on his written application to that effect, provided that such person shall forthwith make written application to the Board, or to one of the Commissioners as required by the said Section, and that such person shall not be detained for more than three days from the date of reception without the assent in writing of one of the Commissioners." That is the whole machinery that exists?—That is so.

15,316. But he may be detained for three days against his will?—Yes.

15,317. Earl Russell: Does that three days apply to when he first comes in?—After giving notice, if he gives notice.

Chairman: Let us look at the language. Lord Russell is right, I think—"and that such person shall not be detained for more than three days from the date of reception without the assent in writing of one of the Commissioners."

Earl Russell: That seems to me to be merely the ordinary three days' period.

Chairman: First of all, we get him on his own application entering the place; then, being in the place, he may be detained up to three days.

Mr. Micklem: No, he must get further leave within three days from the Commissioners.

15,318. Earl Russell: But that is not the three days' notice?—No.

15,319. Where is the three days' notice—what Act is that in?—It is in Section 15 of the Act of 1866.

15,320. Mr. Micklem: In Scotland if you can ever persuade a man to go into an asylum you never need certify him?—(Sir Arthur Rose): Not as long as he does not give notice that he wishes to come out. (Dr. Marr): It is over 50 per cent. of the registered patients.

15,321. Chairman: The only thing that occurs to one is this: I do not know whether these two Sections relate to each other, but under the 15th Section of the Act of 1866 it is provided as follows: "It shall be lawful for the superintendent of any asylum, with the previous assent in writing of one of the Commissioners"—now the previous assent is no longer required. The subsequent assent is sufficient?—That is so.

15,322. —"which assent shall not be given without written application by the patient"?—The patient always sends a letter.

15,323. Then observe the qualification: "to entertain and keep in such asylum, as a boarder, any person who is desirous of submitting himself to treatment, but whose mental condition is not such as to render it legal to grant certificates of insanity in his case." So that under the 1866 Act he must not be a certifiable person.

Earl Russell: No, he must be technically uncertifiable.

15,324. Chairman: Yes, but Section 59 says: "If a person desires to submit himself to treatment in an asylum as a voluntary boarder under the provisions of Section 15 of the Act of 1866, it shall, notwithstanding anything contained in that section, be lawful for the superintendent to receive such person on his written application"—which rather looks as if under Section 59 of the Act of 1913, a person, even although his condition might be such as to render it legal to grant a certificate of insanity, may come in as a voluntary boarder. I do not know whether that is so regarded in practice or not. Under the Act of 1866 it is contemplated that voluntary boarders should be persons in whose case it would not be legal to grant a certificate of insanity?—Yes, quite.

15,325. Earl Russell: That is non-certifiable persons?—Yes.

15,326. Chairman: Can a certifiable person in Scotland now become without certification an inmate of an asylum as a voluntary boarder?—Yes. That was the object of this amendment in the 1913 Act.

15,327. Earl Russell: But we still have not got the three days' notice under which he can be discharged?—(Sir Arthur Rose): If you read a little further, it is in the 1866 Act. Shall I read it?

15,328. Chairman: Please, Sir Arthur?—"Provided always that every such boarder shall be produced to the Commissioners at each of their visits to such asylum, that no boarder shall be detained for more than three days after having given notice of his intention or desire to leave such asylum, unless on certificates of insanity and an order by the Sheriff."

15,329. Mr. Micklem: Which Act is that?—That is the 1866 Act. There is this peculiar point of the mental condition of a voluntary boarder, as to whether now a person who could be certified can come in as a voluntary boarder. To us lay members of the Board, this question does give a certain amount of trouble, because the question arises if a person is certifiable is he fit to express voluntarily a desire to enter an asylum?

Chairman: I appreciate that from the legal point of view also; it is very difficult.

15,330. Earl Russell: That trouble would be removed by the provision in Lord Onslow's Bill as to the people who are not in a position to give consent, although the words they use are "persons of no volition"?—It does not entirely meet the case, I think. One cannot help having at the back of one's mind the question as to whether a voluntary inmate is not a compulsory voluntary inmate if I might say so. If you are not prepared to be a voluntary inmate, the only alternative would be to have you certified.

15,331. True; but even so, one is very anxious to get them in on a voluntary footing if one can, for the sake of their after life and their reputation, if they are likely to recover?—I was thinking of it from the point of view of the patient. Is he there as a voluntary patient—if he is there under a threat?

Chairman: It is very difficult; I have felt it very much myself from the legal point of view. If a person is a voluntary boarder, that is to say, has gone there of his own free will, that assumes he has a free will to exercise, and therefore that he is not insane; but that is a very crude and lawyer-like way, if I may say so, of putting things, because we are dealing here with a pathological state and a person may not be certifiable.

Earl Russell: I think the doctor will tell us that many a certifiable person has what they call pretty considerable freewill.

15,332. Chairman: Yes?—In Scotland a certified lunatic can, in certain cases, make a legal will.

15,333. Sir David Drummond: As a matter of fact, is it not true that quite a number of people are admitted as voluntary patients who are not capable of offering any opinion upon the question themselves?—(Dr. Marr): I do not think so. At our inspection voluntary patients are produced to us, and we ask them "Are you here of your own free will?" If we come to the conclusion that they are not properly voluntary patients, we suggest they might be certified.

15,334. In other words, people are admitted who are certifiable, and are really not capable of discussing the question; they do not quite know where they are?—I do not think we have had much experience of that type of case.

15,335. Chairman: Is that necessarily so? I mean I could conceive quite well a person who to the medical mind might be a certifiable case, and yet who could say "I have quite sufficient intelligence to realise that the best thing I can do is to get into this institution and to get treatment there." There may be a pathological state affecting some part of his mind, and yet he might be able to appreciate the disability of his condition, and would say "I should like to be in this institution, and I wish to come there." The question of assessing the value of his volition is a very difficult thing; it is a psychological problem?—Very difficult. Take a case where you get a person maniacal perhaps every two or three or six months, and in the intervals they are quite as normal as any person possibly could be. They come often voluntarily and beg to be admitted to the asylum.

15,336. Of course, what we are all concerned with is, on the one hand to preserve that very desirable feature, and on the other hand to protect the case which is, or ought to be, a voluntary one from becoming an involuntary one; in short, to preserve the truth of the voluntary status, and to prevent it being really a cover for involuntary detention. There have been cases you know in which voluntary patients have complained that while they went in voluntarily, they found themselves compulsorily detained. I do not say these are Scotch cases, but such cases have come under one's notice?—(Sir Arthur Rose): I would not like it to be felt that I was taking any general objections to the system; I was merely rather trying to look for possible loopholes, because the voluntary system with us in the case of the majority of the patients is an enormous boon—there is no question about that.

15,337. There must be some practical device whereby the difficulty could be overcome, but it is not easy to see?—Not at all easy.

15,338. I am not at all sure that I like the provision in Lord Onslow's Bill of the substitution of volition of other people.

15,339. Mr. Micklem: When you say a great boon you mean because they are not certified?—Yes, because they are not certified. The great majority of them are fully cognisant of the type of institution they are going into, and why they are going into it, and they obtain a great deal of benefit from that voluntary admission.

Chairman: A voluntary patient is prepared to go at the incipient stage of the disease when the treatment may be preventive and beneficial, instead of waiting for a ticket of admission for achieved insanity.

15,340. Sir David Drummond: The professional impression in this country is that certifiable patients are admitted to Scotch asylums at a time when they are absolutely incapable of offering an opinion upon the question of voluntary admission?—(Dr. Marr): I would say you are correct as far as certifiable patients being admitted as voluntary patients are concerned, but otherwise I say it is quite erroneous. They write a letter asking to be admitted and give every indication that they are quite competent to manage and deal with their own affairs, and have really not been compelled to go in.

15,341. Chairman: You have seen a great deal of these voluntary patients. Just tell us of their appreciation of their position; do they realise that they are there voluntarily, and do they appreciate the fact that they are there in that capacity and not as certified patients?—Undoubtedly. If their mental condition has been so bad we would say "This is not a case for a voluntary boarder, give your notice to the medical superintendent."

15,342. Do they realise their privileges and their freedom?—Undoubtedly; they would not be there unless they realised that; they have to write the letters.

15,343. Sir David Drummond: Do you mean before their admission?—Before their admission.

15,344. Surely you are not telling us that that occurs in every case?

Chairman: They must.

Sir David Drummond: Dr. Robertson will tell us something different.

15,345. Sir Ernest Hiley: Does the patient write the letter himself, or is it put before him and he has to sign it?—In some cases it is signed, in other cases where he is delirious or something—

15,346. It is a genuine letter, not a printed form?—No; they write the letter.

15,347. Expressed in their own language?—Yes.

15,348. Earl Russell: It is an individual letter?—Undoubtedly.

15,349. I suppose these patients may differ from all others in that when you go round they never ask to be released?—If they get worse and have no conception of their idea of being voluntary patients and say "Why am I detained here?" we explain to them that they can give three days' notice to the superintendent, or we suggest this patient is no longer really in the category of a voluntary patient and must be certified.

15,350. Chairman: The précis before us rather suggests, you know, that the voluntary boarder in Scotland is a person whose state is not such as to render it legal to certify him?—I think we are going beyond that, and we recognise that it would be a misfortune for some of the people if they could not get in on their own.

15,351. I think the essence of the idea is the avoidance of certification: whether they are in a condition reasonably to appreciate their own situation and voluntarily to subject themselves to treatment, without really the necessity of any examination as to whether they are certifiable or not certifiable?—Quite. There is a very interesting point that may answer Sir David Drummond's question. There are so many admissions, say, 50 admissions of voluntary patients during a certain period of inspection; you will find that probably the whole 50 have disappeared when the next six months' inspection takes place—that is to say, that they have been discharged either as recovered or greatly improved, and you have a new set of voluntary patients in practically every six months.

Sir David Drummond: I am altogether in favour of the Chairman's view of it. We want to avoid certification, and I do not at all object to the certifiable patient being admitted as a voluntary patient; but my contention is that some of them are not capable at the time they are admitted of writing a letter and requesting to be admitted.

15,352. Chairman: I think that probably the Scottish procedure Sir David may have in mind is the provision under which, without any certification whatever, persons who are in a doubtful state of mind may be boarded for six months. That is another procedure altogether?—That is in a private house where they have to fill in a form G, a copy of which is not sent to us.

Sir David Drummond: We are probably at cross purposes.

Chairman: You will hear about that from Dr. Robertson, but for the moment we are really on the voluntary boarder system in relation to the asylums.

Sir David Drummond: You must not take what I have said as applying to your answer. Your answer is probably perfectly correct.

15,353. Chairman: For the moment we are dealing with the voluntary boarder question in relation to asylums, how they get in there, what are their rights there, and how they may leave. What has always struck one as a practical problem in that context is this. A person enters the institution as a voluntary patient—all the procedure is correct. Unfortunately the disease in his case proves progressive, and he becomes thoroughly insane. Now what happens in that case? He has ceased to be voluntary because the conception of being a voluntary patient is that the volition continues; it is a continuous act of will to remain on in the place. That is destroyed of course by the complete absence of reason. In such a case is the patient certified in the asylum?—In many cases he is certified in the asylum, but in general it is recommended that he should go to some other institution—that is to say, discharged as a voluntary patient from that institution, lest it might be considered that the voluntary admission was merely just a sort of step whereby patients were admitted into the institution for the purpose of certification.

15,354. That is exactly the point; one wants to avoid the idea that a voluntary patient will find himself becoming an involuntary patient, and he feels "If I go in there, the same thing will happen to me as happened to my friend."—Of course there are no legal objections to that course, but in general we suggest the alternative course I have indicated.

15,355. Earl Russell: As against that, what effect has the change of surroundings on the patient's own health?—Very often it is an improvement, a change to another institution often does a great deal of good.

15,356. Mr. Snell: What happens to your voluntary patient who becomes worse and wants to leave?—All he has to do is to give three days' notice.

15,357. And then, however ill he is, he may leave?—The superintendent is bound to discharge him.

15,358. Chairman: If he is in the condition Mr. Snell figures, then the three days' interval is really utilised for the purpose of getting him certified?—Very often the friends are informed that he wishes to leave; and if the superintendent thinks he is not in a suitable condition for leaving and might be in danger, then he notifies the relatives that they should have him certified.

15,359. The three days' interval is just intended as a protection against the possibility of the man going out in a state not fit to be at large?—Yes.

15,360. Mr. Snell: The friends take the initiative?—Yes.

15,361. Suppose he has no friends, the institution itself would not take those steps?—No.

15,362. Chairman: In Scotland every case of certification must proceed upon a petition by some individual?—That is so.

Mr. Snell: Suppose a person has no friends or relatives, and as such gets worse and wants to leave, what happens to him? Is he just turned adrift until he commits suicide?

15,363. Chairman: He might present himself at the door of one of your institutions. He might say "I have got £50—will you take me in"?—of course you would, I have no doubt?—Yes.

15,364. He would write the necessary letter to the Board of Control?—Yes.

15,365. The superintendent would house him there. But then, to take Mr. Snell's case; suppose he proceeded to get very much worse, who is to have the carriage of the necessary proceedings for the certification?

From a monetary point of view and the difficulty of arranging his affairs, a curator must be appointed in the first instance.

15,366. A voluntary boarder need not be a person of any means, because he may become a voluntary boarder at the instance of his parish council?—No, the parish councils do not adopt it, because they lose the Government grant.

15,367. But I understand from some information I have read in these papers before me that some parish councils are taking a more generous view of the situation?—Yes, ten of the poorest parishes in Argyllshire have decided to do away with the Government grant, in order to allow patients to be treated at the early stages of their disease, and they send them in chargeable to the parish wholly, without any relief from the guardians. The Lunacy grant unfortunately is distributed on a basis of certification only, to certified pauper lunatics.

15,368. Mr. Snell: So that the pauper case must really wait for treatment until his disease is of certifiable intensity?—That is so; if the inspector of poor does not want to lose his Government grant which I think, of course, is a mistake.

15,369. Earl Russell: Suppose this man has come here with his £50, and he has given notice to leave, and, at the end of the second day, there is nobody to present a petition, what are they going to do—will they communicate with the inspector of poor to get him certified?—Yes.

15,370. Mr. Snell: The institution would take that step?—Yes, they would take that step. In fact I have had a case, not when I was a Commissioner but Superintendent of an asylum, when a patient came out with his own certificate and walked all the way to Glasgow—went and got hold of the inspector of the poor, got the certificate filled up and went to the Sheriff and paid the Sheriff's fee. I cannot say whether he was an Englishman, but he was in Scotland.

15,371. Earl Russell: Before we leave the voluntary boarder, I want to ask this, because I think it is rather a material question. You find in Scotland that all he has to do is to go in on his own requisition, and then give notice to the Board of Control; do you think that that is ample protection for the public?—(Sir Arthur Rose): He does not give notice to the Board of Control—the superintendent does.

15,372. What I mean is he goes in simply on his application then and there, and the only formality necessary is the subsequent notice to the Board of Control?—Yes. I think I can say that our experience so far has been that there was sufficient protection.

15,373. The reason I am asking is because there are very elaborate safeguards in Lord Onslow's Bill, which I daresay you are aware of?—Yes. I do not think our experience has been that there has been any abuse of this system.

15,374. Nor really can there be if you are there to enquire at once?—Almost at once.

15,375. Chairman: It is very attractive as a solution of the whole thing.

Earl Russell: It seems to me that the provisions in Lord Onslow's Bill would put any one off. You have read them, and they are very severe?—Yes.

15,376. Chairman: I thought we might pick up at this stage the points which always interest us, namely, the opportunities for communication between inmates of institutions and the outside world, the points of contact which are provided for. You have explained the visits of the Commissioners. Then I think there is also provision made, is there not, for the Sheriff himself inspecting an asylum at any time he pleases?—(Dr. Marr): Yes, he has the right to inspect an asylum.

15,377. Then, I think, three justices of the peace may inspect?—(Sir Arthur Rose): Yes.

15,378. Then, I think, also representatives of the Poor Law authority—guardians, as they call them in England, parish councillors in Scotland—may also go and see their patients in the institution?—Their own patients.

15,379. Then you have told us about the facilities for writing letters. Do you think that these various provisions for inspection, and for communication with the outside world give the patient a feeling that he has means of getting in touch with outside authorities to an adequate extent?—Generally speaking, I think, yes. Of course you do get the sad case of patients who think everything is against them; you cannot help that. (Dr. Marr): I think you might add as a means of helping them a condition of affairs which we are encouraging very much. Sir Arthur is quite cognisant of them. There are a great many visitors to patients at institutions, and these visitors sometimes come long distances, and it was found there were no places provided where the visitors could take their friends and have a cup of tea, and so on. Now in several of our institutions they have what is called the village shop, the institution shop, where the patient's visitors can come, buy little things, sweets and flowers, and there is a room set apart where they can have a cup of tea and light refreshments. Of course they pay for these at cost price. The patient goes in there, and they have quite ample means of freedom and talking to each other. In Bangour again, one of the Edinburgh District Asylums, the question of letters has been dealt with to this extent, that they have a room set apart, also like a shop, where they can go and write their letters, and which also forms a library and reading room, and the patients can go in there and write their letters.

15,380. Not so much like a shop as like a club reading room?—That is so.

15,381. There is special statutory provision made for any patient being visited by his minister, or by his relatives, and then Section 61 of the 1913 Act further extends the right of visitation by relatives and others?—Yes. If a visitation by relatives is refused to any patient it must be recorded in a book, the reason for refusing the visit, and I may say that we have no such record in any of our public asylums—that is to say, visitation has never been refused.

15,382. Earl Russell: The book is blank?—Yes.

15,383. Chairman: I was also struck with the provision which seems to me to be very useful in Section 48 of the Act of 1857: "It shall be lawful for the Board at any time to give an order in writing for the admission to any patient confined in any house or asylum of any relation or friend of such patient (or of any medical or other person whom any relation or friend of such patient shall desire to be admitted to him), and such order of admission may be either for a single admission, or for an admission for any limited number of times, or for admission generally at all reasonable times, and either with or without any restriction, as to such admission or admissions being in the presence of a keeper or not, or otherwise." Then if admission is refused to a person holding such an order, it is made an offence. So that actually enables the friend of any patient who is in an institution to get an order for a medical man of his own selection to have access regularly to the patient?—That is so. (Sir Arthur Rose): I think we can say that has not been taken advantage of, or very seldom.

15,384. The value of many of these powers is not so much the fact of their being exercised, as the fact that they exist?—(Dr. Marr): That is so.

Sir David Drummond: Would that order be available all through the patient's stay in the asylum, or would it require to be renewed?

Earl Russell: You see they may make it in general terms if they like.

15,385. Chairman: Now let us turn to the question of discharge. What is the normal method of discharge of patients from institutions in Scotland, Sir Arthur?—(Sir Arthur Rose): The superintendent of the asylum recommends the discharge. He says that the patient is fit for discharge either as cured or under various other categories, and the effective act is a minute by the parish council, I think it is. (Dr. Marr): The superintendent discharges on his own authority as recovered. Where the patient has not recovered, in the case of pauper patients, they require what is known as a minute of the parish council authorising a discharge.

15,386. Pause a moment there. If the patient has recovered, does the medical superintendent discharge at his own hand?—Yes, straight away. (Sir Arthur Rose): Yes, I was wrong there. (Dr. Marr): Of course, if the patient has no friends, he informs the inspector of poor he wants his discharge so that arrangements may be made.

15,387. But in the case of the recovered patient, the discharging authority is the superintendent himself?—Yes.

15,388. Earl Russell: Your District Board is like our visiting committee I said just now, but I am not sure that it is. Does it visit the asylums?—It is practically an ad hoc Board.

15,389. Chairman: Does it visit officially?—Yes; it has its meetings frequently at the asylum.

15,390. Earl Russell: Does it control such things as the catering, and that sort of thing?—Yes, everything in connection with the asylum.

15,391. Chairman: But, on the other hand, it is not a discharging authority apparently?—No. The discharging authority of patients not recovered is the parish council at whose instance the patients are sent in; and, in the case of the private patient, the petitioner.

15,392. Sir Ernest Hiley: Can a District Board of Control visit the private patients in private houses?—No. The private patients in private houses, in licensed houses, are visited by the Commissioners, or Deputy Commissioners.

15,393. Chairman: The District Boards' functions, I understand, are confined to the District Asylums?—Yes, and boarded-out cases from the District Asylums.

15,394. Mrs. Mathew: The medical superintendents have definite powers to discharge?—Yes; they discharge all patients as recovered who can be discharged as recovered; they simply send them away.

15,395. Chairman: No judicial step of any kind whatever?—None whatever. As soon as they notify the patient has been discharged as recovered, a patient can go at any time.

15,396. Earl Russell: Is a boarded-out case still carried on the books of the asylum?—No, it is cut off from the asylum. The only types of patients carried on the books of the asylum are two classes, one on pass and one on probation. The pass indicates a 28 days' leave practically, often given to allow the patient to go home and see friends, or a little holiday to the patient. Probation implies that the superintendent is not quite clear that the patient's recovery is going to be a permanent one; he thinks that the patient might perhaps become ill again; he hopes that the patient will remain well, and he sends the patient out on probation for a year or less.

15,397. You do not do as we do in England, send him out for a month?—28 days' pass.

15,398. Chairman: That is parole really, is it not?—Yes.

15,399. Earl Russell: The usual trial in England is a month?—We do not call it "trial." We do not think 28 days would be long enough for a trial. We call it "probation," where it is longer than 28 days.

15,400. Chairman: And it may be as long as a year?—It may be as long as a year, and it can be renewed.

15,401. The normal case of the recovered patient in Scotland is this, that when he recovers in the opinion of the medical superintendent, he is there and then released?—That is so.

15,402. Now if, on the other hand, he has not recovered but has improved, and has ceased to be a danger either to himself or to the public, and is therefore safe to be released from the institution, that is done in the case of the private patient by the petitioner, and in the case of a pauper patient by the parish council?—Through the inspector of poor.

15,403. Who, after all, was the petitioner who put him in?—That is so.

15,404. Then there are other ways, are there not, whereby a patient may be discharged: the Board has itself power, has it not, to discharge in Scotland?—We have power to investigate and see cases, and if we think they no longer require asylum care we can discharge. At one time we had only power to discharge recovered cases, but now, in addition, we have power in the case of patients no longer requiring asylum care to order two medical men to examine these patients, and, if so resolved on, the Board can discharge those patients.

15,405. Is that resorted to much in practice?—Recently a number of cases have turned up; I would not say there are many cases.

15,406. That is a case of direct discharge by the Board on report to the Board by two medical men?—Yes. (Sir Arthur Rose): We have a good many applications for the appointment of two medical men. In many cases the patient is so well known to our Medical Commissioner and, in some cases, to ourselves, as to make it quite apparent that the appointment of two outside medical men is useless. If there is the least doubt in our minds at all, then we do not hesitate to employ the two additional outside medical men.

15,407. Are these two outside men paid from public funds?—As a rule they are paid for by the patients' relatives. We have a small grant, I think it amounts to about £30 a year, for this purpose; but even that would not delay us for a moment. I think we would stand the row with the Treasury if there was any question about it.

15,408. Does that apply equally to private patient as to pauper patient?—All classes of patients are alike in that respect.

15,409. Are these the main methods by which patients may be discharged: either on recovery by the medical superintendent, or by the Board itself on report from two independent medical men appointed for the purpose, or, in the case of patients not recovered, but relieved and safe for release, on the application of a petitioner in the case of the private patient, or of the inspector of poor in the case of the pauper patient?—Yes.

15,410. Do these exhaust the normal methods?—(Dr. Marr): These are the normal methods. There is another method of discharge where a lunatic patient escapes and is absent for what is known as the statutory period of 28 days—his name is then automatically removed from the register, and, in the case of mentally defective cases, it is three months.

15,411. Earl Russell: I see here from your précis that in the case of a dangerous patient, a private patient whom it is desired to discharge, instead of a barring certificate of the superintendent which we have in England, you have to have a rather elaborate proceeding by the Procurator-Fiscal to stop it?—Yes.

15,412. In this country the superintendent can give a barring certificate and say he does not consider it safe to discharge?—The superintendent can only discharge the person if he is cured.

15,413. But the petitioner who desires to remove a private patient can always do so unless he is dangerous?—Yes, that is so.

15,414. But if he is dangerous in Scotland you have to bring in the Procurator-Fiscal?—The superintendent has to notify that he is not prepared to discharge him on account of his danger.

15,415. Would it not be better for the superintendent to give a barring certificate of his own motion?—That only refers to criminal cases sent in at the instance of the Procurator-Fiscal. It does not refer to dangerous lunatics.

15,416. Take your second paragraph on page 8. I do not know if that refers to criminal lunatics, it does not say so—the paragraph beginning: “If the discharge is desired of a private patient not detained as a dangerous lunatic”?—(Sir Arthur Rose): Yes, but then he has not been brought in as a dangerous lunatic.

15,417. That is what I say, but still the superintendent cannot give a barring certificate; apparently only the Procurator-Fiscal after some proceedings can stop the discharge?—Yes. (Dr. Marr): As a matter of fact, no case has arisen where a superintendent has done so.

15,418. Chairman: But is the procedure this, that if the petitioner wanted a private patient out, and the superintendent said, “But to let that person out will be a very dangerous thing to the lieges or to himself,” and the petitioner nevertheless insists and says, “I do not care, I want my relative out,”—in Scotland is the only way of protecting the patient to go to the Procurator-Fiscal?—That is so.

15,419. In England you can get what Lord Russell has alluded to, a barring certificate. The medical superintendent can say “I do not propose to let this man out,” and then there is an appeal from him to the Board of Control.—The only method we have is to report the case to the Procurator-Fiscal, and he takes action or not, according to his discretion.

15,420. That is an outside authority?—That is so.

15,421. Now I think we may pass on a little more rapidly to the next category. What you have been telling us hitherto as to admission and discharge has been applicable to the Royal Hospitals and to the District Hospitals?—Yes.

15,422. Now we may pass to the other category, the lunatic wards of poor-houses. In their case is a licence by your Board essential before any pauper lunatic can be received?—Yes, and renewed annually.

Sir David Drummond: Before you pass from that, I am not quite clear about the top of page 9, “This provision applies to all paupers.”

Chairman: That is in the case of paupers being removed to England and Ireland.

Sir Ernest Hiley: Then it goes on, “and when a pauper who is a lunatic is to be removed, his presence in Court is required.”

Sir David Drummond: That is the point.

15,423. Chairman: That is only transfer to England and Ireland?—That is so.

15,424. Is that not dealt with in the 1913 Act?—He does not need to appear now, under the amendment.

Earl Russell: But still it says in the précis that he is.

15,425. Chairman: Yes. Section 63 of the Act of 1913 says: “Notwithstanding any enactment to the contrary, a Sheriff to whom application is made for warrant for the removal of a pauper lunatic from Scotland shall be entitled to dispense with such pauper being brought before him.” You are a little out of date in regard to that question?—(Sir Arthur Rose): Yes; I am sorry.

15,426. Now in the case of these licensed wards of poorhouses, are the patients received there without any order from the Sheriff?—Yes, one certificate.

15,427. And what is required for the admission of a patient into one of those lunatic wards?—(Dr. Marr): A definite form with one certificate stating that the person is a fit and proper case for the lunatic ward of a poorhouse—that is to say, no longer requires asylum care.

15,428. Can a person not go there direct?—Some are sent direct on this one certificate.

15,429. On the application of the inspector of poor?—On the application of the inspector of poor to our Board.

15,430. Earl Russell: It involves deprivation of liberty, of course?—Yes.

15,431. Chairman: It is detention in the fullest sense of the term?—Yes.

15,432. Earl Russell: Does notice of these have to be given to your Board?—We have to sign the permission for the patient to be admitted to the wards. (Sir Arthur Rose): We really are the detaining authority.

15,433. Sir Ernest Hiley: There is no Sheriff in this case?—No.

15,434. You act?—Yes.

15,435. Chairman: How is it decided in the case of an individual whether he should be dealt with by an ordinary petition by the inspector of poor to the Sheriff, and then relegated to an institution by the Sheriff, or, on the other hand, sent under this procedure to the lunatic ward of a poorhouse, taking a pauper case?—(Dr. Marr): In many of the cases they are simply transferred from the asylum on a transfer certificate.

15,436. That is probably a very useful thing, because it enables you to pass out from the asylum the cases which are really harmless, though still lunatic, and put them in the lunatic wards; but take a case that is destined for the lunatic ward from the beginning, and which goes there without passing through an asylum first. In whose discretion would it be to decide whether this patient's destination should be an asylum or should be a lunatic ward of a poorhouse?—The inspector of poor.

15,437. I suppose he would be guided a good deal by the class of the case?—That is so.

15,438. If it was just a harmless old lunatic who was not obviously likely to recover, I suppose the lunatic ward would be his destination?—That is so. (Sir Arthur Rose): It initiates with this officer, but we have finally to decide that it is a suitable case.

15,439. The responsibility really rests with you?—Yes. (Dr. Marr): We inspect these cases just in the same way as we inspect the other institutions.

15,440. Earl Russell: It is, in effect, a classification by you?—Yes.

15,441. Chairman: What is striking about it is that there is no order of any kind whatsoever, and one medical certificate is enough?—Except, of course, where they transfer, then the existing order stands; they are still certified.

15,442. But for direct admission to lunatic wards of a poorhouse nothing is required but the application of the inspector of poor fortified by one medical certificate, and sanction by the Board?—That is so.

15,443. Mr. Micklem: And that patient could subsequently be transferred to an asylum if he required certification?—Yes.

15,444. Chairman: The patients in the lunatic wards admitted on this basis are not certified patients?—That is so.

15,445. But are they included in your register of lunatics?—It is a point whether we have really any power to detain these people. That is a point that has emerged. According to our Acts, they can only detain a person sent on the Sheriff's order. In the case of lunatic wards, if a man is admitted only on the one certificate, I do not think we have legal power to detain that person.

15,446. Earl Russell: What the Act says is, it shall be lawful to sanction their reception?—That is so.

15,447. Sir Humphry Rolleston: In point of fact they do not leave, do they?—No; they are usually what we call the chronic type of case, cases that are not capable of recovery. Those that have a chance of recovery are certified and sent to the asylum.

15,448. Mr. Micklem: Would you not send to the wards those who were incipient cases, which might get better?—No; we keep them in special observation wards. These wards are more for chronic hopeless cases that do not require the expensive treatment of asylums, and they are welcomed often in poorhouses because they are such active workers as a rule, some of them, willing to help and anxious to do so.

15,449. Earl Russell: This seems rather curious: I see in this case you do not require a resident medical officer unless there are more than 100 patients there—is that so?—Generally in a poorhouse there is a resident medical officer; but if there is no resident medical officer, there is a visiting medical officer who is within call.

15,450. It is merely the fact that he does not live in the building, you mean?—Yes.

15,451. Chairman: A curious point arises on this. The power to receive these persons into lunatic wards is expressed thus in Section 4 of the Act of 1862: "It shall be lawful for the Board to sanction the reception of pauper lunatics into lunatic wards of poorhouses without the order of the Sheriff, according to forms and subject to regulations approved of by the Board." What strikes one about that is this: that the persons who may be received are pauper lunatics?—Yes.

15,452. Then when you turn to the definition of "lunatic" you find a lunatic is a person certified by two doctors?—That is so.

15,453. I do not quite understand how one reconciles those two ideas?—It has been a difficulty.

15,454. Earl Russell: Where indeed do you get your one medical certificate—is that from your own regulation?—No.

15,455. It is in the Act, is it?—Yes.

15,456. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Does not the definition of "pauper lunatic" cover the Chairman's point?—A lunatic is defined in one of the Acts as a person certified by two medical men.

15,457. Chairman: "Lunatic" has one definition, but "pauper lunatic" has got another?—You will find it is a difficulty that you may have. If these people walk out of the place we have no power to detain them.

15,458. It looks to me rather like a flaw in the legislation?—Undoubtedly. We have no power to keep a person by regulation.

15,459. Where do we find the one medical certificate being sufficient for this purpose, do you know?—I think you will find it in the regulations of the Board.

Earl Russell: That is what I put to you just now—it is in the regulations.

Chairman: I have got in front of me one of your forms. It is Form C., entitled "Application to the General Board of Control to sanction the reception of a pauper lunatic into the lunatic wards of a 'poorhouse.'" It begins: "As it appears from the sub-joined statements (and accompanying medical certificates) that . . . a pauper lunatic of the Parish of . . . is of unsound mind, is not dangerous, does not require curative treatment, and is a proper person to be placed in the Lunatic Wards of the . . . Poorhouse. May it therefore please your Honourable Board to sanction his admission." The pre-requisites are then, unsoundness of mind, not dangerous, does not require curative treatment, and a proper person to go to the ward.

Mr. Micklem: Apparently two certificates are required?

Chairman: Yes. On the printed form I have in front of me there is provision made for a statement by the inspector of poor, and a statement by the medical officer, and then it goes on to give two medical certificates—not one. Then it says: "The following medical certificates are not required in the case of a registered insane person who at the time of application is a duly certified inmate of the Lunatic Wards of a Poorhouse."

15,460. Sir Ernest Hiley: What is a "registered insane person"?—A person who has been certified by two medical men under a Sheriff's order. We have registered all the patients in the lunatic wards.

15,461. Chairman: Just look at that a moment. It struck me when looking at the form that two medical certificates must be appended. Is something wrong with the form?—No, that is quite right.

15,462. You have not got my point. You have just told us that the reception of a pauper lunatic into the lunatic wards of a poorhouse may be effected on one medical certificate—is not that so?—I see. I was taking the licensed house. No, it is on the two certificates, two medical certificates for a lunatic ward of a poorhouse.

Mr. Micklem: In the case of interim detention one is enough, as you will see on the next page.

Chairman: The précis says "one," you know.

Earl Russell: The top of page 10 says: "If he is not already a certified lunatic a second medical certificate is required."

15,463. Chairman: That is probably the answer?—I beg your pardon; I was confusing it with the licensed house.

15,464. If the person is going for the first time direct to the lunatic ward of a poorhouse, in that case two medical certificates are required?—That is so.

15,465. Coupled with a statement about the person, and the inspector of poor's statement also that he is of unsound mind, and suitable for this place—that is to say, does not require curative treatment, and so on. If, on the other hand, he is passing from an asylum, where he is already a registered lunatic, to the lunatic ward of a poorhouse, he does not require to have two medical certificates. He is already a certified person, but one certificate is necessary for that step?—The transfer certificate. Most of the cases going there are really transferred from asylums.

15,466. In the case of the discharge of patients from lunatic wards of poorhouses is the procedure just the same?—Yes. The cases that are sent in are not recoverable cases. They are discharged usually by minute of the parish council, if they are discharged at all, or returned often to the asylum.

15,467. Do you find these lunatic wards of the poorhouses are satisfactory institutions?—Very satisfactory, for a certain type of patient.

15,468. And do you find that you can give to the chronic type of patient a comfortable shelter and home in such places?—In some of the poorhouses the lunatic wards are very well equipped in every respect, and the patients are well fed.

15,469. And does the sending of the patients to these institutions have the effect of relieving the asylums of their presence, and so enabling the asylums to be devoted to the more directly proper task of dealing with the curable patients?—Yes, curing; and teaching of patients, too, educational work, which has also a good deal to do with the curing and helping of patients.

15,470. It appears that in England there is a comparable power of moving patients from asylums to Poor Law institutions, but it is not very much used, as far as I can gather. Is the corresponding power in Scotland largely taken advantage of?—Yes; the lunatic wards are usually well filled. Some of them—the majority belong to a combination of parishes. Sometimes they have a difficulty in filling them up. Perhaps the medical superintendent does not like to send cases because he may be dispensing with a good worker, but, generally speaking, they are very well supplied with patients from the asylums.

17 April, 1925.]

Sir H. ARTHUR ROSE, D.S.O., and Dr. HAMILTON C. MARR.

15,471. It is not a question of discharging; it is merely a question of whether a patient should be in one institution or another?—Yes, no longer requiring asylum care—that is the point.

15,472. Now I would like you to tell us something about the utilisation of private houses for the insane in Scotland. First of all, can a single insane person be received in any dwelling-house in Scotland?—Yes.

15,473. Does it require no form of licence or sanction?—Yes, if there is only one.

15,474. Earl Russell: He may be received for profit?—He may be received for profit. We do not require to license the house receiving that case.

15,475. Chairman: What control have you over such cases—are they notified to you?—They are notified to us if they are certified cases, and we visit them.

15,476. Then may a certified case be by order of the Sheriff sent to a house as a single patient?—There are some certified cases sent, but they are not sent directly by order of the Sheriff. They may land ultimately in a certified house, but they are not sent directly there.

15,477. How are these places selected for the purpose?—We keep a list of houses that are considered suitable, perhaps doctors or other people who are quite willing often to take patients for gain, and, if they keep more than one patient, we can give them a licence to keep up to four patients.

15,478. They may take one without a licence, but with notification?—Any more than one we can license, up to four, and do license up to four in the case of boarded-out patients, that is to say, patients who have been sent from an asylum.

15,479. Sir David Drummond: May the patient remain in his own house certified?—No; no certified patients can remain in their own house unless they are under guardianship. We have a number of lunatic patients in their own houses.

15,480. Chairman: Of course a lunatic may remain in his own house uncertified?—But certified often for the parish—that is to say, they participate in the grant.

15,481. But take the case of an ordinary person at home whose mind has unfortunately gone—then, unless they have to be subjected to some form of restraint, or unless they are being illtreated, they may remain indefinitely in their own homes uncertified?—Yes; they are not under our cognisance at all.

15,482. On the other hand, if a person keeps even one of their own relatives in their own home, subjecting him to restraint for more than six months, then you have to intervene?—We can only intervene under Section 57. (Sir Arthur Rose): That is one of the weaknesses, that we do not of necessity know of the detention.

15,483. I am thinking of Section 57 of the Act of 1913.

15,484. Earl Russell: But if a man's wife kept him in his own home when he was not insane, and kept him home and exercised restraint over him, could you interfere with that, even if you did know?—(Dr. Marr): The Act provides that we have powers of inspection, but these powers do not apply to persons living at home—not unless they were certified; and we have power of inspection.

15,485. Chairman: Under Section 57 if it comes to your knowledge that any person in a private house is being detained there and subjected to restraint or coercion or is being subjected to harsh or cruel treatment, then you can inquire into the case, “and if on such inquiry it shall appear that such person is a lunatic and has been so for a space exceeding six months and that compulsory confinement to the house or restraint or coercion of any kind has been resorted to” then you may require the removal of such person to any asylum?—That is so; we have to make an application to the Sheriff.

15,486. Earl Russell: So you could interfere in the case of husband and wife, in that case, without ill-treatment?—Yes.

15,487. Chairman: In fact if a man locked his wife up for six months in a room—if that came to your knowledge—you could set up an inquiry and have her sent to an asylum?—That would be seclusion.

15,488. I am interested in this question of the single house where a patient may be received. To what extent is that utilised—the single house, as apart from the licensed house?—We cannot tell you that, because the cases may be admitted for six months. These cases have to sign what is known as Form G.

15,489. I am thinking of the certified patient in a private dwelling?—I beg your pardon.

15,490. The certified patient in a private dwelling is either in a dwelling which has not been licensed, or in a dwelling which has been licensed, because he may be one of a number up to four?—That is so.

15,491. Who sends them to these dwelling-houses?—There may be an application from friends; they do not want to send their relative to an asylum, and they may ask the names from the Board of certain qualified guardians, and if they are prepared to pay, these names are supplied to them, and a friend is often admitted there, not certified.

15,492. But a certified case may be sent to a single house, may it not?—Yes, but it has usually been in an asylum before.

15,493. Are lists of those houses in your hands as a Board?—Yes.

15,494. And do you make the selection for the particular patient?—We inspect them. We keep a list of a number of houses to which they can go. We ask them to make their own selection.

15,495. When you come to license a house for the reception of patients up to the number of four, do you inspect the house before it is licensed?—Yes, and then the licence is granted by the Board; and when the patients are admitted there they are inspected, generally by our Deputy Commissioners, twice yearly.

15,496. Is that the protection the patient has there?—Yes.

15,497. Inspection by your Deputy Commissioner?—Yes; and then the patient must be visited four times a year at least by a medical man in the neighbourhood.

15,498. Earl Russell: Whom does he represent—you?—No; the patient.

15,499. But you say he has to be visited by a medical man in the neighbourhood?—With regard to the parish council boarding patients, the medical man of the village is appointed to visit. Where it is a private case, they make their own arrangements with the practitioner in the neighbourhood to visit.

15,500. You require them to make an arrangement with some medical man in the neighbourhood?—Yes.

15,501. Chairman: So that the case really has a medical attendant?—Yes.

15,502. Earl Russell: Twice visited by the Deputy Commissioner and four times by the medical attendant?—Yes.

15,503. Mr. Mickle: The private patients there are not certified at all, are they—only the pauper patients?—Yes. Private patients usually go without a certificate, unless they come from an asylum.

15,504. Sir David Drummond: May they be detained in a private house like that, certified?—Yes, they may be detained in a private house, certified.

15,505. Mr. Mickle: May a private patient be detained if he wants to leave?—(Sir Arthur Rose): I think the point is a little confused. I think you are discussing what we commonly call the boarded out case, which applies strictly and solely to pauper patients. The true boarded out case, which is the big thing in Scotland, applies to a pauper lunatic alone.

17 April, 1925.]

Sir H. ARTHUR ROSE, D.S.O., and Dr. HAMILTON C. MARR.

It is the District Board of Control who send him to this private house, and it is they who arrange for the local doctor to look after their own particular patients, in the interests of the patients, but this system, strictly speaking, does not apply to private patients at all. You can do it, but the whole of the legislation is really drawn up for the pauper patient. (Dr. Marr): But we have private patients in these circumstances.

Earl Russell: It is the boarding out system we want to know about.

15,506. Chairman: In the case of private patients, you had 74 of them in private dwellings on the 1st January, 1924?—Yes.

15,507. The rest, 1789, are pauper patients?—Yes.

15,508. Apparently there are a few cases of private patients in private dwelling houses?—Yes.

15,509. And they will be found either as single patients or as one of a group of up to four in a licensed house?—Yes.

15,510. Mr. Micklem: But uncertified?—(Sir Arthur Rose): No, all certified. (Dr. Marr): They are mostly curatory cases, that is to say, cases that have curators. We visit, even where they are not certified, all cases of curatory, to see that the patients' means are properly expended on them, and these are the cases that (I may have misunderstood you, Mr. Chairman) I referred to as single private patients in these cases, who do not require to be licensed, if there is only one patient.

15,511. Chairman: And such private patients in such private dwelling houses may or may not be certified?—They may or may not be certified. Many of them may be certified, but they may not be certified; they may be only curatory cases.

15,512. The 74 are certified cases?—Yes.

15,513. But there may be some others under curatory which are not certified?—Quite.

15,514. If they are certified cases and relegated to a single house, are they detainable against their will?—If there is a Sheriff's order. We hold that they can be detained under that.

15,515. Sir Ernest Hiley: That is when they are certified?—Yes.

15,516. Supposing they are not certified?—I do not think we have any powers to detain them.

15,517. Chairman: They are merely boarders, then?—That is so.

15,518. Being under curatory does not necessarily mean at all that they are insane?—It means that they have had two certificates from doctors stating that they are incapable of attending to their own affairs. Many of them are insane, of course, but they have not been certified as insane.

15,519. It is very common in the case of senile patients?—Yes; many are with their own relatives, and others are boarded with guardians.

15,520. Apparently in Scotland, then, you may arrange to have your insane relative housed in a private house?—Yes.

15,521. And that person may be housed there either certified or uncertified, as the case may be?—That is so.

15,522. The certified cases are under your direct control and charge, because they are registered lunatics?—Yes.

15,523. Those who are not certified are really just boarders in a private dwellinghouse of that sort?—That is so.

15,524. Mr. Micklem: But they cannot get there without your order?—If they are uncertified.

15,525. Chairman: If they are uncertified, they go there irrespective of you, but if they are certified they must be notified to you?—Yes.

15,526. Mr. Micklem: Would you mind looking at the bottom of page 10 of the précis: "Private patients. Insane persons may be kept for gain, that is, as boarders, in private dwellings singly, under an order of the Sheriff, in accordance with the forms and procedure required in the case of ordinary committal to asylums, or they may be kept in such houses, without an order of the Sheriff, singly or to a number not exceeding four, with the sanction of the Board after application made on a form prescribed by the Board"?—Yes.

15,527. Now the form prescribed by the Board is here. There has to be a statement and a medical certificate, and then the Board sanctions the patient being put away?—Yes.

15,528. Those patients are not certified, are they?—They are not certified; they are placed under definite regulations of the Board.

15,529. They are still under your control to some extent?—I do not think we could keep them.

15,530. But are not you responsible for them? You let them go there; you sanctioned their going. Have you no responsibility?—I do not think we have any compulsory powers, though it has never been tested in practice. (Sir Arthur Rose): But we inspect.

15,531. You visit them?—Yes. (Dr. Marr): I think the point was, how could we keep them if they wanted to go away?

15,532. Chairman: I think perhaps I caused a little confusion myself. Are any of the persons whom you find in private dwellings in Scotland persons who have been the subject of an order by the Sheriff?—Yes, some are, but the majority are not.

15,533. Then those are not notified to you in any way, are they?—If the person has many of the boarded out cases there on the one certificate, they are all notified to us, and they are placed in a licensed house. They are certified in accordance with the form you read out.

15,534. Mr. Micklem: But they are not lunatics, according to the definition?—No.

15,535. They are uncertified lunatics in these private houses?—Yes, and they are on our registers, too.

15,536. Chairman: They seem to occupy rather an anomalous position. I do not quite understand where we are?—They are there by regulation, to some extent, and by law.

15,537. Mr. Micklem: It is a method of getting them taken care of as lunatics without certification?—Yes.

15,538. Miss Symons: Are those 1863 which you gave us in your list of figures all under the Sheriff's order and the two certificates?—Many of them are under two certificates; others again are sent on the one certificate. (Sir Arthur Rose): I think the Chairman quite appreciates the fact that there is a very curious legal point there with regard to the one certificate and the two certificates. We have been very much worried about it lately, as a matter of fact. It is a method that has worked, and we do not see any good reason for disturbing it until we know actually where we are, and we hope that in the meantime the Royal Commission will give us some guidance.

15,539. Chairman: We do not extend to Scotland, you know?—But it will be a repercussive effect. (Dr. Marr): It only refers really to the question of compulsory detention. I question very much if we can compel these patients to stay, if they simply said, "We are going to go away."

15,540. Does it apply only to the uncertified patient? Suppose the patient has been first of all certified by the Sheriff, has been in an asylum, and is then sent to a private dwelling?—That is all right; the Sheriff's order still obtains. But I am referring to cases where patients are sent on one certificate, with the sanction of the Board, to a private dwellinghouse.

15,541. Earl Russell: You think probably that that is a usurpation of power?—No; I think we are quite justified in law in dealing with those cases, but I do not know that we have compulsory powers to detain them.

15,542. Mr. Micklem: The law creates a separate class?—Yes.

15,543. Chairman: The only question is, what is the measure of the powers you possess?—That is so. (Sir Arthur Rose): If you look at these forms, generally the forms are that we give permission for certain people to receive them.

17 April, 1925.]

Sir H. ARTHUR ROSE, D.S.O., and Dr. HAMILTON C. MARR.

15,544. We need not explore that, but is this the means that is used for working the boarding out system, Sir Arthur?—That is the method.

15,545. Now we wish to hear very much from you about the boarding out system in Scotland, and how it is worked?—Generally speaking, it is a provision for placing in suitable homes, very largely of the type of small farms, and crofts, even, the type of patient who does no longer require any material medical attention, and for whom a country life under circumstances to which he is used is probably the best condition into which he can be put. The numbers have been indicated to you already. It was a more popular method in Scotland a while ago. There has been a peculiar variation in the numbers boarded out.

15,546. Can we have some statistics of these, please?—In 1880, which is the first figure I have, the number of lunatics under private care was 1,415; that gradually increased until the year 1910, when the apex was reached, amounting to 2,843; since then there has been a decline, and on the 1st January, 1924, the numbers dropped to 1,789. Of course, that is partly accounted for by the fact that in the larger figures there were in all probability a considerable number of patients who would now be classified as mental defectives, but at the same time the use of this system has declined, for a variety of reasons. I am inclined to state as one reason the fact of the provision of farms in the various asylums, and a quite natural temptation to a medical superintendent to keep a good farm worker to give a hand in the ordinary work of the farm, where otherwise this man would have been a very typical and suitable case for boarding out, if he had not had a farm to work on in the institution.

15,547. That is understandable?—I think it is human nature. On the other hand, I suppose there are a number of other reasons why this system has not been so much taken advantage of, although in certain districts it is rather remarkable that the figures have remained pretty well constant. The most remarkable case I think we have is in the case of Moray, where in 1923 we had 156 pauper lunatics. Of those, 33 were in private dwellings which made 21.2 per cent. Comparing that with the 1909 figure, the percentage is identical. In practically every other district in Scotland the percentage has dropped 50.

15,548. It still remains true that at 1st January, 1924, practically one in ten of your registered lunatics is in a private dwelling?—Yes, that will be about the proportion.

15,549. What is the system on which you set about it? Do you select the private dwellings?—We have, as Dr. Marr explained, a complete list of guardians. It is quite a tradition in some families in Scotland—.

15,550. Earl Russell: By "guardians" you mean the farmers?—Yes, the householders. It has been rather a fine tradition amongst a number of families in Scotland always to take in a few cases of this sort. It has a certain advantage, because these people do a good deal of work about the small farms. On the other hand, they live simply as members of the family. I think we practically find no distinction between the treatment of the patients and the treatment of the members of the family. (Dr. Marr): We do not allow any distinction. They have to share in the life entirely, no matter how humble the home, or how wealthy the home.

15,551. Chairman: What is the inducement offered to a householder to take in a patient?—It is a practical motive. In some cases the patient is of value, and in other cases the work is of value.

15,552. Earl Russell: But he gets a servant for whom he receives payment instead of paying, to some extent?—Very often.

15,553. Are these nearly all single patients in single houses?—Up to four.

15,554. Are there many fours in a house?—No, they are mostly single patients.

15,555. What sort of sum per week would he receive for these people?—It varies very markedly, but on an average about 12s. a week.

15,556. That would represent in Scotland rather less than the cost of the man's additional food?—(Sir Arthur Rose): On a farm, yes.

15,557. Sir David Drummond: Is it necessary in these houses to engage any staff to look after these patients?—(Dr. Marr): No; they do it all themselves.

15,558. Chairman: Who looks after the clothing?—The clothing is provided by the inspector of poor. He is supposed to visit twice a year, and the medical officer of the parish in which the patient is boarded makes arrangements; he should visit four times a year.

15,559. Do they get any pocket-money or wages for what they do?—That varies, according to the home. Some homes are very kind to them. Some farmers will take them for nothing; it depends upon the individual; but the main point we insist upon with regard to boarding out is that the patient in that home shall share all the advantages of the home life.

15,560. Earl Russell: Is the patient not in any sense an imbecile? Is he quite sufficiently master of himself to know if he is being put upon in any way?—In some cases, but generally the cases which are boarded out are those that require no longer asylum care. A good many of them are defectives.

15,561. Chairman: Suppose the man fell into hands that were unsatisfactory; suppose that the man was being overworked and under-fed, let us say?—We have our Deputy Commissioners visiting twice a year, and they make reports on these cases.

Sir Ernest Hiley: That does not answer Lord Russell's question.

15,562. Earl Russell: I do not see how your Deputy Commissioner can possibly know. He may not know whether a man has been made to work 15 hours a day or not?—He sees the conditions under which he lives.

15,563. Chairman: All the patients dealt with in this way are patients whose intelligence is such that they could assert themselves if they were being put upon, or could communicate with you?—No, I would not say so.

15,564. Then what protection have they really against being put upon, as Lord Russell says?—We appeal to the humanity of the person; and in many cases of simple means, the minimum that we suggest has often, instead of lowering the tone in the village, raised the tone of the neighbours' houses.

15,565. We are not thinking so much of how it works in practice; it may be that the foster parents treat them well. One is thinking rather of the safeguards that may exist against abuse. This person is sent away from asylum care and committed to the care of persons who are not professional doctors and who may vary very much in their temperaments.

15,566. Chairman: And who have a motive to get as much work out of them as they can and a motive to spend as little upon them as they can?—Such cases have a reason, and usually we have been dependent to some extent upon some neighbours who are always very willing to give information. The boarded out cases are scattered throughout the whole of Scotland.

15,567. Earl Russell: A good many places in Scotland are so isolated that the neighbours would not know what is going on?—No place is so isolated that it has not a neighbour of acute observation, particularly in the Highlands. (Sir Arthur Rose): I think you have to admit Lord Russell's point, that there is a possibility of a pauper patient being boarded out who is not fit to stand up for himself and who may be put upon. On the other hand, as Dr. Marr says, our information is very good from neighbours. I often hear gossip as I go about the country; but, on the other hand, I do not believe it possible that a farmer could for any length of time take advantage of a man without its being spotted; because if he is going to have heavy work and is not going to be adequately fed, our medical Deputy Commissioners are going to detect that at once. They give us definite reports on the physical condition of the patients. They do not hesitate to take off his clothes, and to see that he is adequately clothed. I believe the examination to be of a very inquisitorial nature. I think the safeguards are very complete. (Dr. Marr): There are two specific cases which meet your point, where a young girl, boarded out in Peebles, was considered to be overworked. The Deputy Commissioner's attention was specially called to that. He went down and investigated the conditions and questioned the neighbours, and went into the whole condition of affairs, and instructions were given that this patient was not to work the number of hours the farmer had been working her, and it was pointed out that any work the patient did was entirely of a voluntary nature and that she was not bound to work for the farmer at all; if she said she did not want to work, the farmer was bound to leave her alone.

15,568. Suppose one of these boarded out patients did not choose to get up at the time in the morning that the men started work, I suppose the farmer would return him to the asylum?—Yes, in a case of that kind he would report it; but he dare not insist that a person should work; he is not allowed to use force of any kind.

15,569. Of course, we realise that reasonable work is good for patients?—Extremely good.

15,570. Chairman: There is also this safeguard: you select the houses to which patients may be sent?—The guardians are known to us.

15,571. And they are very largely among the peasant class in Scotland?—Yes.

15,572. I should imagine that selected households of that class in Scotland, in the rural districts of Scotland, are for the most part very decent people?—One guardian died in Fife who had been a guardian for 40 years and had different patients under her care. Any change in the mental condition or physical condition of the patients or the comforts of the patients in any way are all noted down and reported upon, and they of course are seen by myself at the Board, and if there is anything unusual at all, it is very carefully noted.

15,573. But I was rather thinking of this: are you not rather fortunate in being able to find in the rural districts of Scotland a type of home life among the crofters and the small-holders and so on which is peculiarly well suited for your purpose?—That is so. I do not think you would find the same thing in big populous districts, or even in some country districts.

15,574. The type of person whom you select by preference is the solid country-man?—Yes.

15,575. Earl Russell: A God-fearing, honest man, which you have in Scotland?—Yes, a crofter or a small farmer.

15,576. Chairman: One has seen the type of house in Scotland, of course, and the type of people is not the type of person who, in the general case, would be either unkind or over-exacting or untruthful?—On the contrary, I think they are specially kind, particularly with the defectives. I can give you many instances where they actually go out of their way to help them. In one case a young man of 30 was sent to a night school; he did not make any progress there, and they asked their eldest boy to teach him something; he could not teach him, but the man is now learning from a little girl of 10, the daughter of the house. There are numerous instances where the guardians go out of their way to try to help to make the life of the patient very happy.

15,577. One of the reasons why it is said not to have succeeded in England is the inability to supervise the cases adequately. It has been tried in Suffolk and Norfolk, and has been abandoned since. One of the difficulties suggested was the want of supervision. Do you find that your Deputy Commissioners, who are always en voyage all over the country, are able to overtake the work of supervision?—Yes, quite adequately.

Sir David Drummond: Might we hear something about the character of the patients?

15,578. Chairman: Yes. There is the very important question as to who selects the patients for boarding out. What is the characteristic of that type of patient?—Generally the patient is selected by the superintendent of the asylum. He reports to the inspector of poor, who says, "I have so many vacant houses; could you give me three or four patients," and the superintendent selects these three or four patients and sends them to the houses.

15,579. Earl Russell: Are they regarded as non-curative cases?—They are regarded usually as harmless, chronic cases, not likely to be improved.

15,580. Chairman: But not dangerous either to themselves or to others?—That is so—quite harmless cases. Naturally the objection which Sir Arthur has noted is that the superintendent does not like to send away a man whom he has taught to drive a horse and cart, or even to plough, though he may no longer require asylum care. But generally speaking, the asylum superintendent takes a longer view of that, and says, "If I keep this man driving this horse and cart, I know I have perhaps to employ and pay labour for another man to drive the horse and cart, or I may have to educate other patients to do this." Still, he recognises that the asylum care is an expensive care, and it is his duty to give two or three other men a chance to be able to drive a horse and cart, and he sends out the case that he has educated to be able to drive the horse and cart to be boarded out.

15,581. When a patient goes out to board in that fashion, is he taken off the books of the asylum?—Yes.

15,582. But does he remain on your books?—He remains registered on our books as a boarded out lunatic.

15,583. Sir David Drummond: Is he always certifiable at that time?—Generally, yes; I should say in almost every case. Some do recover from the boarding out, and then they are discharged as recovered, but in almost every case they are chronic, incurable cases.

15,584. Earl Russell: Can you tell me what the patients themselves think about it? Are many of them able to express opinions as to the change from the asylum to the farm?—Yes. Generally, they would not like to go back to the asylum; they often get into the village, and have little trips, and then they also have means of amusement. There is one man who attends all the funerals for miles round.

15,585. What about the trouble of breeding among these people when they go out—are they unrestrained, either the men or the women?—We have had a few accidents of that kind, but I should say that these sexual accidents are practically so few that they are almost negligible. (Sir Arthur Rose): A really sexual case would not be sent out. (Dr. Marr): They are so well chosen that the accidents that have taken place are really negligible.

15,586. Mr. Snell: Has there been any experience of these defective boarded out patients getting into trouble for little acts of larceny, or anything of that sort?—It is almost negligible, but of course they are very carefully selected.

15,587. Mr. Micklem: Is it a financial advantage to the parish?—It is a very marked economy; there is no providing account. The average sum of 12s. is the total cost, whereas in asylums you have the maintenance account and you have your providing account.

15,588. Earl Russell: What is roughly the asylum cost?—About 24s. or 25s.

15,589. Sir Ernest Hiley: Does that include clothing?—It includes everything.

15,590. For these boarded out patients the Poor Law authorities find the clothing and 12s.?—Yes, that is the average, including all clothing; the cost of the boarded out patient is 12s. 6d. That includes everything; it is the average cost I am taking.

15,591. Chairman: Is it an economic proposition; that is to say, does the local authority make a saving?—Yes, a distinct saving.

15,592. It would seem to have several advantages: it gives greater freedom to the patient, restoration to society within limitations, it effects an economy from the point of view of the local authority, and it enables the patient to do economic work on the farm where he may be?—Yes, up to a point.

17 April, 1925.]

Sir H. ARTHUR ROSE, D.S.O., and Dr. HAMILTON C. MARR.

15,593. And to contribute in that way to the general national output?—Quite.

15,594. Earl Russell: Are these farms very widely separated, or are they mostly clustered in one part? I am asking you from the point of view of visitation. —Some of the boarded out patients are really located in villages—we have aggregations, as we call them. In the village of Gartmore there would be 40 or 50 in one village street, and where they have a nice house they can keep 2, 3 or 4 patients, who have a good garden and a good deal of liberty.

15,595. But does it obtain all over Scotland? Would you find some of these people in every district in Scotland?—In every parish in Scotland. At one time we had two cases in the island of Foula, between Shetland and Orkney.

15,596. It means a good deal in the way of inspection, then?—Our Deputy Commissioners visit every parish in Scotland. (Sir Arthur Rose): It is an effort. We really could do with the other Deputy Commissioner, if it were not for the economy, because they are pretty hard put to it to get round all these places.

15,597. Chairman: On the whole, Sir Arthur, you have had two years' experience of this system: do you commend it to us as a useful adjunct of the lunacy system?—I do not know that I can go so far as that, because I really do not know the English rural conditions. As far as we in Scotland are concerned, it is undoubtedly a very, very useful part of our work.

15,598. Advantageous to the patients and economical to the public?—Yes.

15,599. Earl Russell: You would not like to give it up in Scotland?—We should be very unwilling to do so. (Dr. Marr): Sir Arthur has seen it himself in the Western Highlands.—(Sir Arthur Rose): Dr. Marr and I even visited the Island of Rona to see a boarded out case.

Earl Russell: Apart from anything else, it means a saving of 10 per cent. in the upkeep.

15,600. Chairman: And has it the advantage of relieving the pressure in the asylums?—Yes.

15,601. Sir David Drummond: Do they only take patients for serving?—(Dr. Marr): They naturally like a person who works, but if they can get one woman or two women to do a little housework they are quite willing to take some helpless old person as a third or fourth.

15,602. Chairman: When one searches for the official sanction for this method of disposal, is it really to be found in Section 95 of the Act of 1857, which provides that every pauper lunatic should be sent to the asylum for the district in which his settlement is: "Provided that under special circumstances it shall be lawful for the parochial board with consent of the Board to dispense with the removal of any pauper lunatic to such asylum and to provide for him in such other manner and under such regulations as to inspection and otherwise as shall be sanctioned by the Board."?—That is so.

15,603. That is really the provision under which you board out?—Yes.

15,604. Then you get the provision as to the private dwelling-house which may be used as the place to which such patients may be relegated, and in conjunction with that you get the necessary statutory power?—(Sir Arthur Rose): Quite.

15,605. Now I want to pass to another topic altogether. We have heard from time to time that in Scotland there is a method whereby incipient cases may at present be treated without certification; and your précis refers us to Section 41 of the Act of 1857, which starts with a negative enactment against the reception of lunatics for gain in private houses, but concludes with a proviso that "this enactment shall not apply to any cases where the party so received and kept has been sent to any such house for the purpose of temporary residence only, not exceeding six months, and under the certificate of a medical person, which certificate shall be in the form of Schedule G, hereunto annexed." Is the result of this that the proviso in effect authorises the reception and retention of cases in a house for a period not exceeding six months on a special certificate by a doctor?—Yes.

15,606. That is a feature which is quite foreign to the law of England?—Yes.

15,607. Is advantage taken of that provision?—(Dr. Marr): We do not know how far advantage is taken of that provision, which we as a Board regard as an excellent provision, because the Form G. on which the admission into a home of that patient is recorded is kept by the person who owns that home, and a copy of it is not sent to our Board; so that we have no notification of patients being admitted for gain into private houses. I think it would be an advantage from the point of view of those who are mentally afflicted, because I think I should be safe in saying that there are more cases of restraint and seclusion going on in these homes and outside asylums than there are in all the asylums.

15,608. The pre-requisite of that case is that the doctor should have certified that it is expedient with a view to the patient's recovery that he should be placed in such a house for temporary residence?—Yes.

15,609. And it also requires that he should state that the malady is not confirmed?—Yes.

15,610. Therefore we are really dealing with the case which is either incipient or as yet not fully diagnosed?—That is so.

15,611. And this seems to me to be the precursor of the idea of the observation ward or some such provisional place of detention?—Yes. Of course with a large parish like Glasgow, observation wards have been established under an arrangement with the Board of Health. At one time some of the patients admitted to the observation wards were only allowed to stay there for six weeks, but recently we have extended the time for a period of six months. We have no legal statutory powers over these patients, because they are not certified, and they are going into a Poor Law institution.

15,612. But the Schedule G. person?—No. Schedule G. is used there.

15,613. I was on the Schedule G. person for the moment. He is a person who, without any judicial order whatever, is received on a certificate by a doctor that the patient is afflicted: the certificate continues:—"state the nature of the disease"—"but that the malady is not confirmed, and I consider it expedient, with a view to his recovery, that he should be placed (specify the house in which the patient is to be kept) for a temporary residence of (specify a time not exceeding six months)." Then the patient may be kept for six months in a place without being subject to the penalties provided in Section 41?—That is so.

Earl Russell: Does it include the power of detention?

Chairman: I rather think it does. "Provided that this enactment shall not apply to any case where the party so received and kept has been sent to any such house for the purpose of temporary residence only, not exceeding six months, and under the certificate of a medical person, which certificate shall be in the form of Schedule G." The word "kept" is used.

15,614. Earl Russell: But "kept," I think, only means kept as you keep a boarding house. I do not see any power of detention here?—(Sir Arthur Rose): That is an open question; as a matter of fact, it is another of these legal troubles; we do not quite know where we are. We have had some very eminent legal opinions on this matter.

15,615. And do they differ, like doctors' opinions?—I believe they have, on occasions. But the position has to a certain extent been an open one. What my Board do feel they want is a compulsory notification of the reception of any of these cases. We welcome the system. We think it is a good thing when it is conducted by such an institution as the Royal Asylum at Morningside, who, in running this type of establishment, are not by law bound to advise us, but, in view of our relationship, do advise us of every case of this sort they get in, and solicit our inspection and co-operation. What we are afraid of is what may happen in private homes.

15,616. Chairman: Where your relations of mutual confidence are not the same?—That is so.

15,617. Earl Russell: Do you find patients are detained under this?—Yes. There is a question as to whether they can be detained or not, and there again Professor Robertson may slightly differ, but it is a very difficult point. (Dr. Marr): By Section 54 of the 1913 Act we have powers of visitation in these cases, but I may say that the Board have refrained from visiting these cases, except where they have notification from neighbours or people that restraint and seclusion are being applied to persons in certain houses; but we have never exercised the powers, because we do not know of the cases; the cases are not notified. We would need to go into all nursing homes, and the Board have no wish to do anything of that kind.

15,618. Chairman: There was a legal difficulty as to whether it was competent for the Royal Asylum in Edinburgh to have such homes, but that is a different question altogether?—Whether, having a home, that home became ipso facto an asylum?

15,619. Yes. I am rather considering this with you now: here are houses in which persons may be received who are obviously of a special class; they are persons who are suffering from the initial stages of mental disease, and it is thought that they have not reached the stage of certification. It rather strikes one as a kind of intelligent anticipation of what all people are now looking to, namely, some means of having a provisional period for observation; and six months was selected as the limiting period for such persons residing temporarily, until it should be seen whether the malady was confirmed or whether it would pass off. Now apart from the legal difficulties, which we are here rather to surmount, if we can, is the scheme one which has your approval, Sir Arthur?—(Sir Arthur Rose): Distinctly so.

15,620. What one is concerned with at the moment is the policy of the thing, of course?—Especially from the point of view of getting hold of these cases in an incipient condition; I think I can say that my Board, both the medical members and the lay members, are very strong upon that.

15,621. Mr. Micklem: But you want to add notification, do you not?—Yes, to prevent abuse.

15,622. Chairman: You contemplate with satisfaction the establishment of homes more analogous to the nursing home that one goes to for any of the ordinary ailments flesh is heir to, where patients might go in the incipient stages of mental disease, and where they might be detained for a limited time, provided that you were notified they were there, and had powers of inspection?—That is so.

15,623. That is simply another form of approach to the question of provisional detention till a case has been fully examined and its proper disposal decided upon, which you deal with also in your observation wards, and that is probably the last general topic we need discuss with you.

15,624. Sir David Drummond: How would you propose to get over the diagnostic difficulty in admitting these patients, say, between a case of neurasthenia and a mental case that had come under your observation?—(Dr. Marr): The doctor sends a certificate in special terms that the malady is not confirmed—the Form G. You mean in establishing homes?

15,625. Yes?—I would allow anyone who wishes to come in for the treatment of early mental symptoms at any time, and refrain from using these places as certifying places at all. I would not allow them to be certified, in fact, in these places under any circumstances.

15,626. Miss Symons: But you would advocate provisional powers of detention?—Not of detention at all.

15,627. Earl Russell: This form is no use without detention?—All I take it that the Board desire is that a copy of Form G. should be sent to us so that we may see that these patients are not ill-treated in any way.

15,628. Chairman: Yes, but follow me: I have in my mind really three classes of cases: first of all, there is the case which is a clearly defined case of insanity, and as to which there is no difficulty in certifying and in relegating to an asylum; then there is, on the other hand, the voluntary case, where the insanity is not declared, where the patient feels he would be the better for shelter and care, and of his own wish goes in; then I find the intermediate category, namely the person who may be insane, who is not a voluntary patient, but who ought to be detained for the time being for his own well-being, and who as a consequence of that detention may effect a complete recovery in a fortnight or so, and may escape certification altogether. That person at the present time has to be certified to get the benefit of any treatment. I want to provide for that person by having some provisional method whereby he may be detained. Take the case of transitory mania; you must have detention?—My point was that if a person came in, he should not be detained compulsorily. If he wishes to go, then he must go somewhere else. I would rather have that (because most cases come in of their own free will, and are delighted to stay there) than have the impression going abroad, "This is a place that invites us in, and when we get in we are going to be certified."

15,629. Earl Russell: But you are excluding the case the Chairman put to you of a person who may be more or less maniacal at the time?—Of course, these people are being acted for by their relatives. Delirious cases are the very cases you want to treat in these homes.

15,630. Chairman: But you must exercise restraint on them: you must hold the patient down in his bed?—These are the cases that do not require restraint. They require nursing, but they are incapable of exercising their own free will; they are most easily nursed.

15,631. Let me put again the kind of case I should like to deal with. I quite understand the case of the voluntary patient, but what are you going to do about the case which is for the moment quite insane, suffering from mania, let us say, or an alcoholic case, as to which you can say: "Well, in a fortnight that probably will have passed off completely." At the present moment you have got to have that patient certified to get him any form of treatment at all. A person might need to be put in seclusion or under severe restraint, very possibly. One is very anxious to see if there is not some means by which a person of that sort could be temporarily detained against his will, under restraint, but without certification, because the thing is recognised as transitory. Does not your provisional ward in Glasgow achieve that?—Yes, but we do not allow any restraint there.

Earl Russell: It seems to me you call it nursing.

15,632. Chairman: Can the person get up and walk out?—I do not see anything to hinder him.

15,633. Mr. Snell: Suppose he is known to have strong suicidal tendencies?—That would be a different matter. He would be certified in some other place. They are certified actually from the observation wards.

15,634. Chairman: I have this conception; I do not know whether it strikes you as a useful one or not; we have been deliberating upon it a good deal:—that there should intervene a stage before final certification, a stage in which the case is under observation. In England that is achieved rather indirectly by keeping the patient in the Poor Law infirmary for continued periods, and very often it results in the patients never becoming certified at all, and some statistics have very strikingly shown that the recovery rate is very high at the initial stage. One is anxious to save that person from certification, and anxious also that he should get the benefit which one gets from skilled handling and treatment, but which one cannot get at the moment until one goes into the asylum, and one cannot go into the asylum until one is certified?—You want some compulsory powers?

Sir H. ARTHUR ROSE, D.S.O., and Dr. HAMILTON C. MARR.

15,635. Some people have suggested a clearing house institution where they might be detained for a period.

Earl Russell: Detention under a provisional order, without ever certifying the man.

Sir David Drummond: That is rather a different question. The question which Dr. Marr is discussing now is the nursing home point, and the whole question would turn upon the point of diagnosis. The suitable case would go to a nursing home. A case that was not suitable would be certified.

15,636. Chairman: I follow. The only thing is this: what would happen if you found the case in the nursing home required restraint?—I have been accustomed to think that no restraint is necessary. Delirious cases are very easily treated without restraint. Restraint in my opinion is used where there is a scarcity of nurses. If a patient has an adequate number of nurses, and is delirious, then I do not think restraint is used at all. In some of our asylums we have never used restraint for 20 years.

15,637. You and I must be using the word "restraint" rather differently?—I limit the term "restraint" to something that restrains the movements of the person.

15,638. You are thinking of mechanical restraint?—Yes.

15,639. Seclusion in a padded room, or something of that sort?—Naturally we call that seclusion. Restraint, of course, is limiting the movement of a person by mechanical means.

15,640. You dare not even hold a person down in bed for his own good, without committing a technical assault upon him?—And yet it is done every day in general hospitals, of course.

15,641. I know it is, and very much for the good of the patients, but the difficulty one finds is this, that the patient in the nursing home, being mentally unbalanced but not necessarily quite insane, may wish to do very foolish things: for the good of the patient you may have to exercise moral suasion, but I should think sometimes you have to use physical suasion?—Nurses guide the movements.

15,642. But that must at the end of the day mean that you have to hold the patient down. That is what bothers me a bit—as to how you are going to justify the measures of physical interference with the actual liberty of the subject to do as he pleases, without some kind of legal warrant for it?—I see your point.

15,643. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Will not this question be settled to a certain extent by the observation of cases such as Dr. Comrie treated? Was there not a good deal of psychological restraint and tact?—It is used very much in those institutions I speak of, Stobhill and Duke Street, where patients are just admitted as into the ordinary wards of a hospital, and their mental condition treated as if they were suffering from an acute bodily condition. There are no special means of restraint or seclusion in any way.

15,644. Chairman: Of course the public have a misconception about insanity, and think that cases are all noisy and violent. Those are the rare cases, really, but at the same time they do occur, and you must have means of dealing with the person who for the time being is actually violent and who is prepared to assault any person who comes within his reach?—There are so few of that type who are really acutely insane. They are very easily nursed by people by simply being put to bed. They do not need to sit on them, if they are properly instructed.

15,645. Earl Russell: I do not want you to think that we like restraint for its own sake?—The public have an antipathy to going into an asylum or mental place of any kind; and these cases are so few that I would rather give up the compulsory powers, lest it might be said that these patients come in there and are certified from there, whereas they meant to use them only as nursing homes. That is my point.

Sir David Drummond: They cannot be detained in a nursing home if they become noisy. A nursing home is not suitable for that type of patient.

15,646. Chairman: And that patient would probably then be certified?—Yes, if they are homicidal they go somewhere else to be certified.

15,647. The problem may find its own solution. One had a kind of feeling that a patient in such a place might suddenly become violent, and say, "I want to get out." You would have a duty as a good citizen, apart from your duty as a doctor, to stop him. You must do something at your own hand?—Yes.

15,648. I should have thought that at any rate a power to require 24 hours' notice, or something of that sort, before leaving, so as to enable you to take steps for the protection of the patient, would at least be of some value?—Yes, on the same lines as a voluntary patient admitted to an asylum?

15,649. Yes. One looks very jealously at any interference with the liberty of the subject, and one has objections to starting institutions which are halfway-houses without being perfectly open about their powers; one would much rather state the powers candidly and frankly than let them be more or less concealed?—Certainly. (Sir Arthur Rose): Of course what would make a very big difference to me personally is the type of body responsible for running these homes. I might be quite prepared to agree to Form G. being made a compulsory form for six months. I am not at all sure that even with notification I should be quite happy with a strictly private asylum, which as you know we do not like in Scotland.

15,650. There is just one other matter I want to ask you a question about before we part, and that is with regard to the general compulsoriness you have for making your wishes effective on the districts under your charge. Is one of your important levers the fact that you have the distribution of the grant of £115,500?—That is so.

15,651. Can you in that way, in addition to your other powers, make your wishes effective by withholding your grant?—The power is there.

15,652. I am going to suggest that, rather than take you through them, we might simply incorporate in your evidence the enumeration of the various powers which you possess. The additional powers over and above those you have already alluded to in your evidence have been summarised so well at the end of your précis that I suggest we might append them to your evidence rather than go through them?—Certainly.

(The following is a summary of the additional powers referred to):

"(a) Powers enforced by application to and consent of judicial authorities: (1) In the case of any obstruction arising in the execution of the Act, or refusal or neglect of County Councils or Magistrates of Burghs to do what is required of them under the Act, the Board may apply by summary petition to the Court of Session. S. 72, 20 and 21 Vic., c. 71. (2) If a District Board of Control do not take steps to provide adequate accommodation the Board may, with the authority of the Secretary for Scotland, apply to the Court of Session, who may appoint a person at whose sight all powers and duties of the District Board may be performed at the expense of the District Board. S. 9, 25 and 26 Vic. c. 54. (3) If any asylum or house is certified by two medical persons to be unsuitable in respect of the provision which is made for lunatic patients, any of the Commissioners may apply to the Sheriff for an order to remove him to some other asylum or house. S. 91, 20 and 21 Vic., c. 71. (4) If an order or medical certificate on which a patient is received is found to be incorrect or defective and there is failure to amend it within twenty-one days, the Board may report such failure to the Sheriff, who

if satisfied that the order or medical certificates are incorrect or defective, may recall the order. S. 5, 29 and 30 Vic., c. 51. (b) Powers enforced by suing for penalties. (1) The Board may make rules and regulations in regard to books or minutes to be kept in all asylums or houses, and may enforce them by a penalty, for each infringement or violation, not exceeding £10. S. 9, 20 and 21 Vic., c. 71. S. 20, 29 and 30 Vic., c. 51. (2) At any enquiry which they hold, the Board may with the concurrence of the Lord Advocate compel witnesses to appear and give evidence before them under a penalty of £30. S. 11, 20 and 21 Vic., c. 71. (3) The Board can compel the licensing of asylums or houses kept for lunatics, and enforce observance of the law with regard to orders of reception, by a provision which prevents the sending of lunatics to unlicensed houses, or the sending of them to or keeping them in any asylum or house without an order, where an order is by the Act required, under a penalty not exceeding £100, or imprisonment for a time not exceeding 12 months. S. 39, 20 and 21 Vic., c. 71. (4) The Board may order the admission of a friend or relative or others to a patient confined in any house or asylum, and enforce their order under a penalty of £20. S. 48, 20 and 21 Vic., c. 71. (5) Any person wilfully making any false statement or return or report, or a false representation upon any plan or writing, or who shall refuse to give information required of him by the Act, or shall conceal or refuse to divulge any matter or thing as to which inquiry under the Act shall be made, shall be guilty of an offence and be liable to a penalty not exceeding £100 or imprisonment for a period not exceeding 12 months. S. 101, 20 and 21 Vic., c. 71. (6) An Inspector of Poor is liable in a penalty of £10 for failure to report cases of pauper lunacy occurring within the parish, as required by the Act. S. 112, 20 and 21 Vic., c. 71. (7) The Board can compel Inspectors of Poor to give particulars of the removal of pauper lunatics from asylums under a penalty of £10; and can, under a like penalty, compel the replacement in asylums of pauper lunatics so removed. S. 10, 29 and 30 Vic., c. 51. (8) The Board can compel a person who keeps any lunatic permanently for gain to obtain their sanction or the Sheriff's Order under a penalty of £20. S. 13, 29 and 30 Vic., c. 51. (9) Any medical person making a false entry of a medical visit under the Board's Regulations to a patient resident in a private dwelling under an Order of the Sheriff or sanction of the Board, or who makes such entry without having visited the patient within seven days of making it, is liable in a penalty of £10. S. 13, 29 and 30 Vic., c. 51. (c) Powers enforced by withholding or withdrawing licence or sanction. (1) The Board may make rules and regulations for the good order and management of Private, District, and Parochial Asylums and Lunatic Wards of Poorhouses, and may enforce such rules and regulations by forfeiture of licence. S. 9, 20 and 21 Vic., c. 71. S. 3-4, 25 and 26 Vic., c. 54. (The Board also make rules and regulations for District Asylums, but as they are not licensed this means of enforcement is not available in the case of such asylums.) (2) The approval of the Board must be obtained to the Plan, Specification, Estimate and Site of a District Asylum, and they may enforce their views by withholding approval as to these particulars. S. 52, 20 and 21 Vic., c. 71. (3) The Board enforce their views as to the rate of maintenance for pauper lunatics in District Asylums by withholding their approbation to a rate which they consider improper. S. 73, 20 and 21 Vic., c. 71. (4) Agreements or arrangements for the reception of pauper lunatics into asylums as boarders can only be made with the sanction of the Board, and private patients can only be received into District Asylums with their sanction. The Board can, by withholding sanction, prevent the reception of pauper lunatics from alien districts into District Asylums, or the reception into such asylums of lunatics not paupers, and they may withdraw sanction and require the removal of such patients.

S. 80, 20 and 21 Vic., c. 71; S. 8, 25 and 26 Vic., c. 54. (d) Powers of direct or independent action. (1) The Board may transfer a lunatic from a house where he is being improperly treated to another house or to an asylum at the cost of the lunatic's estate or of the party or parish liable for his maintenance. S. 42, 20 and 21 Vic., c. 71. S. 18, 29 and 30 Vic., c. 51. (2) The Board, on being satisfied by the certificate of two medical persons whom they may think fit to consult, may discharge any person confined as a lunatic, who has recovered or who can be set at large without risk of injury to the public or to the lunatic. S. 92, 20 and 21 Vic., c. 71. (3) If a Parish Council neglect to make provision for a pauper lunatic within twenty-one days after being called upon to do so, the Board may themselves take the necessary measures, and may recover expenses from the Parish Council. S. 18, 25 and 26 Vic., c. 54."

Chairman: Then so far as I am concerned it only remains for me to tender you our thanks for your most interesting and helpful evidence. Perhaps some of my colleagues may now wish to ask you further questions.

15,653. Miss Symons: I wonder whether Sir Arthur Rose or Dr. Marr could kindly tell us anything about after-care in Scotland, whether it differs from that in England, or whether it has been developed more fully?—(Sir Arthur Rose): There is a society which has been started on the same lines as Sir Leslie Scott's society—I call it Sir Leslie Scott's society because I think he originated it. This is a young and active body, and I think it is going ahead. We as members of the Board have done everything we can to support it. We have to stand aside a little bit to be able to criticise it, but we have got quite a reasonable Government grant, amounting, I think, to about £550. We have actually been able to provide accommodation for their secretary and organiser in our own office in Edinburgh, to prevent them being put to the cost of getting outside accommodation, and also because in that way we can keep in very close touch with what they are doing. It is going to take a little time to develop this after-care idea in the minds of the parish councils and of the local authorities.

15,654. You are hoping to see it developed all over Scotland?—We are hoping to see it developed. We all feel that it will be a valuable adjunct to the work, no matter if the Mental Deficiency Act is put fully into operation or not.

15,655. Mrs. Mathew: With regard to food, what are your powers of controlling it in the various asylums?—Might I say in regard to that, and generally with regard to our association with the local authorities, that the extraordinarily happy relationship between the local authorities and ourselves has been one of the great joys to me personally. We all look upon each other as colleagues engaged in one work, and if, which is very, very rare, there is any complaint about food, it generally comes through Dr. Marr or Dr. Sturrock, and the least hint in the reports of our Medical Commissioners simply causes the thing to be put right absolutely at once. I do not think, in regard to food, Dr. Marr, it has ever been necessary for you to make two observations in regard to the same thing?—(Dr. Marr): No. (Sir Arthur Rose): The food is very carefully tasted. It is always described in the reports we get from our medical colleagues. When the non-medical people go round the asylums they make a special point of looking at the food. The balance of the dietary is always carefully considered by our Medical Commissioners, and their criticisms are even sometimes hypercritical.

15,656. Chairman: Perhaps it is not unimportant to remember that Sir Arthur was Food Controller during the war.—For Scotland only.

15,657. Mrs. Mathew: Do you allow butter for your patients?—It is generally margarine. Of course, you have to consider the type of food the patients are used to in their own homes, and we try to improve upon that sufficiently to make it really curative. (Dr. Marr): In one of the institutions in Scotland they give butter, in a smaller institution; but in the larger institutions generally margarine is given. (Sir Arthur Rose): But you do not object to that from a medical point of view?—(Dr. Marr): No.

15,658. Sir David Drummond: I should like to have your opinion upon the functions of the superintendent of the asylum?—The functions of a superintendent are many, but I should say that his main work is the care and treatment of the patients, and anything that tends to do that in the best and most efficient manner and the most economical manner. I assume that you speak chiefly about administration?

15,659. Yes.—Superintendents are inclined to be led into administrative matters, and to neglect their medical work, but that is not necessarily a consequence of a medical superintendent being at the head of the institution. It is simply because the particular individual has not been capable of delegating his work to the proper party, that is to say, to the steward or to the farmer, all of whom ought to be competent men. The medical superintendent mainly, as I say, should concentrate his powers on the care and treatment of the patients. I do not think anyone but a medical man can be in charge of a large institution, because there is nothing that can be done in an asylum from an administrative point of view which has not some influence, directly or indirectly, on the care and treatment of the patients.

15,660. But you think he is able to delegate his subsidiary duties to others, so as to enable him to employ his time with the patients?—I think he ought to do so, because a farm naturally is better looked after by a farmer than by any medical superintendent.

15,661. I should like to know whether in Scotland the doctor is indemnified against a possible mistake he may have made in diagnosis in giving a certificate. What is his position?

15,662. Chairman: Perhaps I may answer that. There is a provision in the Scottish statutes as in the English statutes, that he is protected unless he has shown want of care.—That refers to certification?

15,663. Yes. He can be attacked on the ground of negligence, as in England. Just on that topic Sir David has raised, I would like your view, because you have been a medical superintendent yourself, although you are not one now. It is a burning question in lunacy administration as to whether the medical superintendent should not be entirely relieved of administrative duties so as to enable him to concentrate entirely upon his medical work. What do you say with regard to that?—I think it is impossible that he can do so with advantage to the institution. At the same time, if I may put it so, we had at our institution at Lenzie, which was one of the biggest asylums in Scotland, a reception house into which all new patients were admitted. I invariably saw all these new patients myself, though I had a big institution to administer. I left the administrative work to heads of departments, largely. I saw, of course, what was being done, but I certainly did not go in there proposing to be an expert. I simply got their reports.

15,664. In Scotland, as you tell us, the medical superintendent is the person to know whether or not his patients have recovered, and has the responsibility of discharging them if they have recovered?—That is so.

15,665. If his mind is taken up with farming affairs and so on, he will not be in a position to discharge that most vital duty?—I do not see why it should be taken up by those duties. Take, for instance, the work of the patients: they are not bound to work on the farm, but it is very important that they should be induced to work on the farm under certain circumstances, because the work is beneficial to their health.

15,666. Earl Russell: I meant to ask you that question before. Do you give them the same sort of inducement as in England—tea and tobacco—to make them work?—Some of the patients get extras. For instance, laundry workers and kitchen workers get extras; many of them get tobacco, and some of them get from the superintendent a day off, with 2s. 6d. or 3s. in their pockets.

15,667. Chairman: What I am thinking of is this: this branch of science is undoubtedly advancing; we hope it is; I mean the curative side of the treatment of the insane. That will involve on the part of medical superintendents even more study than in the past, greater technical knowledge, keeping abreast of the periodicals in their specialty, and interesting themselves in the pathological investigations and the great developments which we hope are on the horizon. Now a person who has not only to keep himself abreast of a very progressive and developing science, but also has charge of the medical condition of a large community under his hand, cannot, it seems to me, have very much time left to spare for the daily administration of the community. If he is not a person who is able to delegate these things to other people, may he not find himself absorbed in the administrative work to the detriment of the patients under his care?—That is true in some cases. I would rather have a bad head than a divided authority, because you must find someone on whom to put the blame. Any institutions we have had with lay superintendents have only been small institutions; but with one exception, and that exception still obtains, they have all been unsuccessful, and we have substituted in some of the small institutions for the lay superintendent a trained nurse, who has the medical interests of the patients and the care of the patients at heart, and that has been very successful in both Haddington District Asylum and in Elgin District Asylum.

Chairman: We will just have to balance these various views we have heard.

15,668. Sir David Drummond: Might we have your opinion on the question of female nurses?—I think that might be answered in some way by the answer I gave to a deputation of disabled soldiers who came to speak about female nursing in asylums. Their point was that they objected to female nurses, because they displaced male nurses in the asylums. I said to each of them, "You are all disabled soldiers. You have been in hospital during the war." They said "Yes." Then I said, "In hospital you had nurses to look after you, and you had orderlies to look after you," and they said, "Yes." Then I said: "Which of these did you prefer?" The whole of them said they preferred the nurses. Then I said, "If you, being sick in body, prefer the nurse, why do you deny your fellow man, who is sick in mind, the privilege of having a nurse to look after him?"

15,669. Chairman: I gather that you are an advocate of women nurses for mental cases?—Entirely. It was introduced in Scottish asylums more than 25 years ago—getting on for 30 years ago. The experience I had of it was that at first it was not successful, but we found that that was due to the head nurse not being the proper person. Once we had a good head nurse the thing went on in such a way that we should never think of turning back and nursing hospital cases with men.

15,670. I will ask Sir Arthur Rose to supplement what you have said. It has been, has it not, Sir Arthur, the considered policy of the Board in Scotland to foster the movement for women nurses in attendance on not only the women's side but the men's side in asylums?—(Sir Arthur Rose): In the hospital part of the asylums, not in the ordinary wards, for physical nursing as well as mental nursing.

15,671. Does that coincide with your view, Dr. Marr. (Dr. Marr): Yes.

15,672. Sir David Drummond: Were you speaking only of the hospital?—I was speaking of the hospital, but generally we have some senile cases under nurses. We require male nurses for patients going out to work, but these male nurses must have hospital experience; so I think, while it is necessary to have the attendants in male hospitals, they should be there in the capacity of orderlies—in a subordinate capacity.

15,673. Sir Ernest Hiley: I should like to ask Sir Arthur whether he has had any complaint from the local authorities as to the amount of the grants.

17 April, 1925.]

Sir H. ARTHUR ROSE, D.S.O., and Dr. HAMILTON C. MARR.

I see your grant works out at about 3s. per week, as compared with 4s. in England?—(Sir Arthur Rose): Yes, we have a continual grumble about it. It is repeatedly stated that Scotland is not quite fairly treated in this respect, but I think we have almost accepted it as a thing that cannot very well be helped.

15,674. Have you had any difficulty with the Poor Law authorities with regard to your very extensive powers over the licensed wards of all workhouses?—No.

15,675. Your powers in Scotland are unique; they are not possessed by the Board of Control in England. Have you had any difficulty with the Poor Law authorities over them?—With one exception, I think I can say the Poor Law authorities are just as anxious to co-operate with us in the care of these particular patients as the District Boards of Control. You do get an occasional cantankerous person in every walk of life.

15,676. But speaking as the Chairman of the Board of Control, you value those powers over the workhouses?—I think it is essential we should have the powers, and having them there we do not exercise them. The whole thing is done by a system of co-operation.

15,677. Could you just tell me this. The inspector of poor is an official peculiar to Scotland?—Yes.

15,678. Have we got anything in the English Poor Law system quite like the inspector of poor?—I should doubt if you have, because he is an official of the parish council, but he has certain statutory powers of his own, and he cannot be dismissed by the parish council without the sanction of the Board of Health.

15,679. I take it he is more than the relieving officer?—I am not sure enough of your conditions to be able to say that.

15,680. He has very wide powers indeed; he acts, as it were, as the petitioner with regard to all these pauper patients?—That is so.

15,681. I was wondering whether we had in our Poor Law system any officer who embodied the same functions as the inspector of poor does in Scotland?—The answer to that would be a question. Have you anybody in the service of the English Poor Law authorities who cannot be dismissed by the Poor Law authorities?

15,682. We have; only the relieving officer is a relatively subordinate functionary in the English system?—Yes.

15,683. Your inspector of poor is almost the clerk to the board?—That is so. He often is. (Dr. Marr): He is clerk to the board.

Chairman: We are very much obliged to you.

(The Witnesses withdrew.)

TWENTY-EIGHTH DAY.

Saturday, 18th April, 1925.

MEMBERS PRESENT :

THE RT. HON. H. P. MACMILLAN, K.C. (Chairman).

THE EARL RUSSELL.

SIR ERNEST HILEY, K.B.E.

SIR DAVID DRUMMOND, C.B.E., M.D.

MR. NATHANIEL MICKLEM, K.C.

MR. H. SNELL, M.P.

MRS. C. J. MATHEW.

MISS MADELEINE SYMONS.

MR. P. BARTER (Secretary).

MR. W. FAIRLEY (Assistant Secretary).

Professor GEORGE M. ROBERTSON, M.D., F.R.C.P. (EDIN.), called and examined.

15,684. Chairman: We have with us this morning Dr. George M. Robertson, M.D., F.R.C.P. (Edin.), who is Professor of Psychiatry at the University of Edinburgh; Physician Superintendent of the Royal Hospital at Morningside, Edinburgh; and Physician-Consultant to the Royal Infirmary, Edinburgh.

Dr. Robertson, in addition to your present offices, were you formerly Lecturer on Mental Diseases at the Royal Colleges School of Medicine?—I was.

15,685. And you have been Medical Superintendent of the Stirling District Asylum, and Medical Superintendent of the Perth District Asylum in succession?—Yes.

18 April, 1925.]

Professor GEORGE M. ROERTSON, M.D., F.R.C.P.

15,686. And at one time you were President of the Medico-Psychological Association of Great Britain and Ireland?—Yes.

15,687. Before we invite you to assist us upon some of the more detailed matters, I think it would be of interest to have from you a short account of the Royal Asylum of Morningside, as being a type of institution of which we have not heard much hitherto. I think that your institution is one of the seven public asylums, as they are called, in the statutory language in Scotland?—That is so.

15,688. Is it a hospital founded by Royal Charter and endowed with funds by philanthropic persons?—Yes, that is so.

15,689. It was founded, I think, so long ago as 1813?—It was opened in the year 1813.

15,690. At its present site?—No. The building that was opened at that time has been removed. It is practically the same site, the neighbouring site.

15,691. Then the leading feature from the financial point of view is that the institution is carried on not for the purposes of gain?—That is so.

15,692. And are you bound to receive persons who are directed to your institution?—I do not think we are bound to receive all persons. I think the managers have an option, but we are bound to receive the parochial patients from the district which we serve.

15,693. And in that way, therefore, you answer the statutory definition of a public asylum in the Scottish Acts?—Yes.

15,694. Then a few statistics about your population. You had, I think, at the 31st December, 1924, 829 patients in all on your register?—Yes.

15,695. Could you tell us how many of those were private patients, and how many were pauper patients, or rate-aided patients?—I can tell you, not for the present year—for the year before.

15,696. That will do equally well?—Yes, it is very nearly the same. There were 661 private patients, and the remainder were pauper patients.

15,697. What in that year was the total number?—The total number was 804.

15,698. So that the great bulk of your patients are private patients?—The great bulk of them, yes.

15,699. Have you a tariff for your patients, varying with the accommodation that you give them?—That is so.

15,700. I suppose the facilities for treatment are available to all alike?—The medical treatment is the same for every person.

15,701. But the tariff varies according to the accommodation afforded?—The accommodation, the food, and the number of nurses and attendants.

15,702. What is the lowest charge you make for a private patient?—£58 a year.

15,703. And I suppose it runs up to practically whatever the patient desires?—Yes, depending upon the accommodation, up to nearly £2,000.

15,704. Do the receipts from those private patients enable you, with the revenues from your endowments, to provide for the pauper patients?—No, the parishes are charged for the maintenance of the pauper patients.

15,705. The parishes will necessarily pay for their accommodation, but do they get something rather more than they would get as ordinary pauper patients?—No, I would not say that. I think the parochial patients in Scotland are all treated alike, but the parishes pay for the full amount, for the cost of the patient.

15,706. What is the figure paid?—£60 a year.

15,707. Then if you make any profit on the private patients where does the profit go?—The institution is divided into two portions, one for private patients paying higher rates of board, and another for lower rates of board. The division of the institution for those paying higher rates of board is in debt at the present time to the extent of about £30,000, and any surplus that is over is placed towards the extinguishing of the debt. Then in the other division we wiped out our debt for the first time in 80 years last year. The money is available from the one to the other.

15,708. These are Craig House and West House?—Yes.

15,709. It is Craig House that is entirely used for private patients, is it not?—Yes.

15,710. Do you have any private patients in West House?—Yes, a large number of private patients in West House, about 400.

15,711. But no rate-aided patients in Craig House?—No.

15,712. Of course they are all within one enclosure?—No, separate enclosures. There is Craig House public road dividing the two, but they are under the same administration.

15,713. And Craig House and West House, of course, are quite distinct from those nursing homes of which we shall hear from you in a little?—The legal status is quite distinct, but they are under the same management.

15,714. Then, I think, an important feature of your institution has been its association throughout with the University of Edinburgh?—Yes, that is so.

15,715. Your last report, I see, at page 20, draws attention to that very close association; I see that for 46 years the institution has been connected with the University of Edinburgh?—That is so, yes.

15,716. Since the time when Sir Thomas Clouston was appointed Lecturer in Mental Diseases?—Yes.

15,717. And recently your relations have been drawn even closer with the University by the appointment of Dr. McAlister as Lecturer in Psychiatry by the University Court and by the selection of Dr. Susman, assistant to the Professor of Pathology, as part-time Pathologist to the institution?—Yes.

15,718. Are both those gentlemen, Dr. McAlister and Dr. Susman, on your staff?—Yes, they are on my staff. Then, of course, the institution founded the Chair of Psychiatry in the University of Edinburgh.

Earl Russell: To whom is this report made—to a body of trustees?

15,719. Chairman: The administration of the institution is in the hands of Governors?—Yes.

15,720. Who are appointed under the Charter?—Yes.

15,721. They are representative persons elected by various bodies in Edinburgh?—Yes.

15,722. And is your annual report made to the Governors of the Institution?—Yes. I did not wish to send too much literature, but I could send an annual report containing the names of all the Governors.

15,723. You perhaps might hand me in a copy of that, for my own information?—Yes.

15,724. Before we pass to other matters, I would like to know from you to what extent teaching is given in the University of Edinburgh in psychiatry, which is your own subject?—Yes. I give 30 lectures every year to the students.

15,725. Is that called a half-course?—No, that is a full course in psychiatry. I am only allowed by the arrangements of the University to give 20 lectures, but I manage to put in another 10.

15,726. Do all students for graduation have to attend those lectures?—All the students for graduation have to attend.

15,727. Is there a separate examination on your subject, or is it included among other subjects?—It is just included in the ordinary subjects in medicine. It does not have a special examination.

15,728. Do you see the papers, and set some questions in your own department?—I have the right to examine for the final examination in medicine. I do not do it, but I have the right to examine.

15,729. What we are interested in is to know to what extent the young medical man launched into the world from Edinburgh University has had both theoretical and clinical teaching in insanity. To what extent do you think young doctors who leave Edinburgh University are equipped in this branch of their profession?—They have a knowledge of the principles of the subject. It is far too vast a subject for any student to grasp thoroughly, but they do have a knowledge of the principles, and have seen the most important types of cases; they have more tuition in Edinburgh than in any other medical school, I believe, in the world. They have these 30 lectures, of which half are clinical and the others systematic. Then there is an optional course of 20 lectures on medical psychology given by Dr. Drever, the Reader in psychology, and, in addition to that, the ward in the Royal Infirmary, Ward 3, over which Dr. Comrie has charge, is also available for teaching purposes, as well as the patients I have at the West House.

15,730. One quite recognises that in these days of specialisation it is not possible within the curriculum to make every student a specialist, but do you think the students get a good general grounding in the subject?—Yes, I think he gets a good general idea of the subject. With regard to the question of entering it as a subject for the final examination, I feel sorry for the medical student, as at the present time our curriculum is so overcrowded, that I always tell my class at the beginning of my course that so long as they attend regularly, and show that they are interested in the lectures, and do well in my class examination, then so long I will not press to have a professional examination on the subject, but if I thought there was any failure in attention or interest, then I would make it a professional subject.

15,731. Sir David Drummond: Dr. Robertson refers to Edinburgh as the leading University so far as this subject is concerned. I think there are others in this country where the same thing occurs?—Sir George Newman gave a description of a model medical course which was published about a couple of years ago, and the requirements there for instruction in this model course were less than what the students in Edinburgh University are receiving at the present time.

15,732. Chairman: Are there any facilities for post-graduate work in your subject?—There is a diploma in psychiatry, and a certain number of the graduates have taken that; but the diploma is such a severe one in Edinburgh that it entails full time work for 6 months. It is impossible to get the diploma without all that time being devoted to the subject, and so we have not attracted very many yet to it.

15,733. Is that a University diploma?—Yes.

15,734. Granted after six months' study and writing a thesis, or something of that sort?—No, attending courses of instruction, and passing two examinations.

15,735. Earl Russell: But it ought to have a high level in the eyes of the public?—Yes. We are between two policies: whether to have a very stiff examination and develop a higher value, or an easier examination and a larger number of candidates; up to now the medical faculty have said "We will make it an honours examination."

15,736. Chairman: I observed you were in the room yesterday, and therefore you will have heard the evidence that Sir Arthur Rose gave on behalf of the Scottish Board of Control. I do not propose to take you over the formal part of the evidence, but I want particularly to elicit from you your views on certain subjects which you are specially conversant with. Now, first of all, let us consider the question of certification in Scotland. Is the outstanding difference, as was brought out yesterday, between the English and the Scottish methods that in Scotland there is no distinction made between rate-aided and private patients in the matter of certification?—Practically no difference; there are minor differences.

15,737. But, broadly, one may say they are treated alike?—Treated exactly alike.

15,738. And a feature in Scotland is that the Sheriff is the person who pronounces the order for detention, unlike the Justice of the Peace in England?—That is so.

15,739. I mean he must be a trained lawyer, holding an important office?—Yes.

15,740. On the other hand, is there no provision in Scotland for the Sheriff seeing the patient?—None.

15,741. And in practice he does not see him, I understand?—No.

15,742. Now, on that subject have you any views as to whether this legal person who places the imprimatur upon the order of detention should or should not see the patient?—I do not see what object is served by him seeing the patient, because I do not consider that he is competent by examination to tell whether the person is sane or insane.

15,743. You regard him as a person proceeding upon the evidence, expert testimony, contained in the affidavits or certificates of the medical man?—That is so, yes.

15,744. On the other hand, do you attach importance to his position in this aspect, that as a trained person accustomed to deal with evidence he can scrutinise the affidavits to see whether they contain adequate facts to justify what one may call the verdict of the doctor?—That is the case.

15,745. And also to see that all the formalities of the law have been fulfilled?—Yes.

15,746. I know you have views about the judicial intervention in the matter generally, but it does seem important that there should be someone who should see that all the formalities are fulfilled and the evidence is such as would satisfy a trained mind that the conclusion reached is a sound one?—Yes, that is so.

15,747. But you do not attach importance to him seeing the patient, for the reason that you think he is not competent to form an independent judgment upon the medical problem?—That is what I think, yes; and I may say that is a view taken, I believe, by the majority of those who sign these orders. There have been Sheriffs who have signed orders to whom it has been pointed out that the facts indicating insanity were insufficient.

15,748. From a medical point of view?—Yes, and who have refused to withdraw their order, because they were quite willing to accept the statement in the certificate by the medical men that in their opinion the patient is of unsound mind and fit to be placed in an asylum. That was quite sufficient.

15,749. We have had quite a large body of evidence in England to this effect. Sometimes the justice of the peace interests himself very much in the case; I mean he practically makes a layman's examination of the case; whereas others treat the matter in the perfectly formal way which you have described. There is certainly a feeling in some quarters that the presence of an independent layman is valuable as affording the patient some opportunity of putting his case, so to speak, to an independent person outside the purely medical view of the case; and I ventured to put yesterday to one of the witnesses an example of what I had in mind. For example, something might have been stated as a fact communicated to a doctor, which, on the face of it, seemed quite insane, and yet, so odd is human life, was a perfectly true statement; and the patient might have said, "Oh, if you are going to certify me insane upon that matter, insane as it looks, it was a perfectly sane thing and did occur." Now where would the patient be under the view that you advance later on that there should be no legal person intervening; where would the patient have the chance of putting that aspect of his case?—What I thought, if I may venture to say so, gave a wrong suggestion in your question, was this, that the doctor may have founded his views on the insanity of the patient upon 20 different observations, but he happened to put down the wrong one, one that was erroneous, and the mere fact that he put down an erroneous observation does not mean that the patient was sane, or that he had made a mistake in his diagnosis of the case.

Professor GEORGE M. ROBERTSON, M.D., F.R.C.P.

15,750. No, but the person examining the affidavits to see whether the affidavits bear out the conclusion would certainly be entitled to say, "Your conclusion may be sound, but your premises are inadequate?"—Yes. That would mean, of course, that every premise would require to be tested by the person examining the affidavits. I may say that all these certificates are exceedingly carefully scrutinised by the Boards of Control both in England and Scotland, and they are constantly sending back certificates to us which they consider are inadequate, or in which they think some error has been made. We have 21 days within which to have these things rectified, and very often the Sheriffs themselves will refuse to sign a certificate, if there is some error in it, till it has been amended, or they ask us to amend the error after they have signed it.

15,751. Earl Russell: I want to put on this very point a case that actually happened in London only a few weeks ago—it came out in a trial at law: a doctor had certified a patient insane, and the observation which he had made of him consisted in twice watching him in his shop while he was standing in the public street on the pavement. Now you know if that came before a judicial authority he might surely say he did not consider that examination sufficient, no matter what the doctor had put in his certificate?—Yes. With regard to that, I should say that that doctor had no right to sign a certificate of that kind.

15,752. But how would that fact become known unless the patient had a chance of telling the judicial authority, or somebody, that the doctor never came to see him. In this case it was the wife who deliberately put him away?—As a matter of fact, the public are entirely dependent upon the honourable character of the medical profession, and their honesty in these matters. If a medical man wished to make totally false statements with regard to any person and put them into a certificate, well, of course, that person would appear to be insane, and the wrong man would be put into an asylum.

15,753. Chairman: But observe the safeguard that exists at present. Suppose there was a faked certificate such as you suggest, and the patient is seen by a justice of the peace who has before him the faked certificate, and the patient appears to be a comparatively sane person—we are taking a case of wrongful certification—he would say to the justice of the peace, "This is all a mistake; you must not sign that order"; and the justice of the peace would say, "But I have got a certificate in front of me which tells me this, that and the other." "Oh, yes," the man might say, "but I will demonstrate that is all untrue," and you would hold your hand. If he had no access to the justice of the peace or the Sheriff, then the faked certificate would be taken at its face value, and the man would be removed to custody, but at least he would be detained for a time unlawfully. That is the kind of thing one has in one's mind?—Yes. Of course I admit that in a case going before a third person it is much more likely to get justice than if it has only been before two, especially if that third person looks at it from a different angle. But then you must also bear this in mind, that if this third person is the person to decide the matter, and he is an inexperienced person, how many times is he going to make errors which are going to cause a great deal of trouble?

15,754. That is the debit side of the account, and we have heard instances of justices of the peace whose examination is so perfunctory as to be of no value at all?—Yes.

15,755. Earl Russell: In this case the doctor honestly believed the patient was insane, but anybody representing the public would say that is not a sufficient examination?—I do not think that that doctor was justified in giving a certificate under these conditions, any more than in writing out a faked certificate.

15,756. But the trouble is the conditions would never have come out unless the patient had a chance of making his protest?—I think you depended upon the doctor, and the doctor made an error of judgment in what he did.

Sir David Drummond: Dr. Robertson says he had constantly to send certificates back.

15,757. Chairman: I was rather struck with that. (To the Witness): Do you constantly have to send back certificates for completion, or amendment?—I asked the messenger who goes to the Sheriff's court, and he thought one per cent. of the certificates were sent back by the Sheriff as a meagre certificate.

15,758. I would not call one per cent. "constantly"?—Perhaps I was wrong in that. Then from the Board of Control we have many more returned; perhaps we will have six or seven in the course of the year.

15,759. Even that is not a very large number, and it depends a good deal upon what they are sent back for. If they are sent back merely for some trivial informality, then it is not of much consequence on the merits?—As a general rule it is a trivial informality.

15,760. I would not like the impression to go out that in Scotland certificates are constantly being sent back because they are inaccurate or insufficient.—No. The commonest inaccuracy in a certificate is with regard to defining the patient, you have to give his name, designation and residence, and that very often is not done by the doctor.

15,761. That does not affect the merits of the thing at all?—No, it does not affect the merits of the thing.

15,762. But I was struck with this, that evidently the Sheriff is not merely a formal functionary, because you tell us he sends them back to you sometimes because the certificate is too meagre?—It depends upon the Sheriff. A Sheriff has got great powers of discretion; he can do what he pleases. If it is put before them as legally correct they sign the document. He may sign the document simply because the doctor says the person is of unsound mind. Of course I agree that some person must sign the order and see that the thing is properly drawn out. My opinion is it should be the Board of Control.

15,763. We will come to that later?—Yes.

Sir David Drummond: Can Dr. Robertson tell us to what extent there are serious errors in the diagnosis?

15,764. Chairman: How often do you find there is an error affecting the merits of the certificate in your judgment, an error by the certifying doctor, or an insufficiency in the evidence which he adduces in the certificate, which really affects the merits of the case as distinguished from the mere points of formality?—I think it is always faulty expression. The facts observed are badly expressed, so they do not convey conviction to the mind of the third person who does not see the patient. For instance, I give a special lecture on certification to my students and, amongst many other things, there are a great many "Don'ts." For instance, a doctor writes, "He says he hears a voice." I suppose the whole lot of you here are hearing a voice at the present time, but what the doctor means is: he hears an imaginary voice, which is an hallucination of the senses.

15,765. After all, that is a criticism of literal accuracy rather than merits?—It is almost entirely that. I have not known of any case in which there has really been a wrong opinion expressed.

15,766. That is what we really want to get at.

15,767. Sir David Drummond: We heard yesterday that it was considered important that the second doctor should be an expert; do you agree with that?—I think that it would save a good many patients from going to an asylum who might be treated outside, if there were an expert.

15,768. That is to say, if such means were provided?—Yes. For instance, sending a patient into an asylum with a temperature of 103 who is found to have pneumonia, and who is delirious. Such a case should never be sent to an asylum, but, of course, he is technically insane.

15,769. That would be the Professor of Medicine who was at fault in that case?—Yes.

15,770. Earl Russell: We are told these young doctors cannot have experience of insanity, but a newly-qualified doctor is supposed to be able to diagnose pneumonia, is he not?—Yes; but, unfortunately, when a case is complicated with mental symptoms very often that makes such an impression that he says, "I do not understand this," and he certifies the patient and sends the patient off. The same with typhoid, for example.

15,771. Chairman: Would you approve of the two certifying doctors being permitted to consult together?—Yes, certainly.

15,772. Both in England and in Scotland at present the requirement is that they shall see the patient independently and give their certificates independently, which seems to be possibly a relic of the time when it was thought that two doctors might be in collusion?—Yes, and in England the certificates are separate certificates, and on separate sheets of paper.

15,773. We have had evidence to this effect, and I would like to know whether you agree with it, that the opinion of two medical men given in consultation is more likely to be of value than the opinion of two medical men given separately?—Yes, that is quite true.

15,774. Do you think it better than one given separately, and that it is more likely to be accurate?—Most obviously, with the restrictions that are laid down in the English law against those who cannot give certificates, like a principal and his assistant.

15,775. But if you have two independent doctors do you regard the opinion which they arrive at in consultation as more likely to be accurate than the opinion they would arrive at separately?—Certainly.

15,776. Of course, in private practice the consultant doctor invariably confers with the doctor who calls him in?—Yes.

15,777. Mr. Snell: Suppose, doctor, there was any question at all of collusion: would not a second doctor, called in after a certificate had been signed by another doctor, be more likely to agree with the first on an expressed opinion than he would in consultation?—Well, I suppose one would say that is so. I mean to say, if you find your views are confirmed by another, or your observations are confirmed by another, it will strengthen them, but, as a matter of practice, I am perfectly certain it is not of the least importance.

15,778. Chairman: I think Mr. Snell's point is that if there is tendered to you an opinion by a brother professional man, you are inclined to approach it from the point of view that it is right rather than to approach the subject de novo?—Yes.

15,779. Mr. Snell: Whereas if you are called in to help him to form a diagnosis he has not yet pronounced an opinion?—Yes.

15,780. I was presuming that would be a safeguard?—Yes.

15,781. Chairman: There is something in that, Dr. Robertson.—If two people come together the whole case is started fair?

15,782. Yes.—I agree.

15,783. Whereas if one gives his opinion first he is committed, and the man who is committed to an opinion has to be dislodged from it by his confrère?—Yes.

15,784. I think Mr. Snell's point was really in fortification of that view?—Yes.

15,785. Earl Russell: Before we leave this question of some judicial officer seeing the patient, would you mind putting out of your head entirely the idea that he has to form an opinion as to his insanity or sanity. That is a technical question upon which the best justice of the peace, as such, is incompetent to pronounce; but can he not find out circumstances attending the certification which may caution him or make further enquiry desirable? Suppose a man's wife has an intrigue with a lover and wants to put her husband away for that reason; if the patient sees a justice, may he not say, "There are reasons for this certificate quite apart from my conduct," and so put the justice on his enquiry?—Yes, that is quite true, but the doctor, you must remember, has been seeing this patient probably for some time, and knows the circumstances and the details and the surroundings far better than the justice of the peace can from one interview. I do not say that cases may not arise where he may discover something, and the doctor has been hoodwinked; but I think, in the vast majority of cases, that a justice of the peace will be misled by the patient.

15,786. But you must not treat the doctor as if he is the family adviser who has been attending the case for years. He may have been called in by the relieving officer to a pauper patient; he may have seen him just once, as the justice has, and heard the rest of the story from the wife. He has had no more information than that. He has formed a perfectly honest opinion that the man is insane, but he has not known all the circumstances, and the man has not had a chance of stating the circumstances to any authority?—Well, of course, a rate-aided patient of that kind has had the chance of speaking to two doctors.

15,787. Well, he has not in England?—We believe that is wrong, of course.

15,788. Chairman: But take even one doctor?—I agree that a second person is an additional safeguard.

15,789. It is a large topic, this. It is really a question of the intervention of some independent person in the process of the making of an order which results in the deprivation of liberty. It is the main problem which affects this branch of medicine as distinct from any other branch of medicine; and one is a little alarmed at the suggestion that the deprivation of liberty is to be left entirely in the hands of the doctor, or in the hands of an official body without the intervention of any independent person. Of course we shall have to discuss that with you a little later on, but it is just that general feeling which the public have in the matter which we must concern ourselves with, naturally.—Yes.

15,790. Earl Russell: I am not suggesting there is more than one case in 10,000 that will happen.—Yes, but you know hard cases make bad law.

15,791. Chairman: But, on the other hand, adequate safeguards prevent abuses.—Yes.

15,792. The abuses do not occur because the law is there in the background always.—But in Scotland no Sheriff has ever seen a patient and we seem to have been remarkably free from abuses.

15,793. I understand there has never been a case in Scotland in which a Court has found that a patient has been unlawfully detained. Is not that so?—Yes, I believe that is so.

Earl Russell: We cannot unfortunately say as much here.

15,794. Chairman: Do you remember the case of Purvis some time ago?—Yes.

15,795. I forget what happened about that case.—What happened there was this: it was a case something like the one Lord Russell refers to. A lady doctor was attending the wife of the patient; the husband became insane, and this lady doctor called in a specialist to see the husband; he found the husband to be insane, and he made every attempt to treat the patient outside of an asylum; I think he sent him away for a fortnight somewhere or other; but in the end it was found he could not be treated out of an asylum and so he was certified by the consultant and by the lady doctor who was the wife's doctor, and he was sent into the asylum. He was ultimately discharged, and he brought an action against the authorities for having detained him there, and he lost his case because he was obviously insane. I believe that the medical profession protested against the case ever being brought into Court. It was one of these cases the Lord Advocate should have refused to allow to come into Court, there being no grounds to go upon. I think Mr. Ure was the Lord Advocate at the time, and the explanation he gave for allowing the case to proceed was that the patient's own doctor had not been called in to certify him.

Professor GEORGE M. ROBERTSON, M.D., F.R.C.P.

15,796. But in the result it was found that the man had been properly certified and was insane?—Yes.

15,797. Then in Scotland, I think, the order which is made by the Sheriff has a three years' endurance?—It has a three years' endurance, with the exception of those cases under the last Act which are transferred to private care. There the order is kept alive.

15,798. Has a report to be made year by year on the condition of the patient?—No, one certificate stating that the patient requires attention in the asylum has to be drawn out every year.

15,799. But at the end of three years does the virtue of the Sheriff's order expire?—Unless you sign the annual certificate.

Chairman: Now I want to draw Lord Russell's special attention to this matter because I have been looking at the continuation certificate in Scotland. We have heard in England that some of the medical superintendents, while quite convinced that it was for the welfare of the patient who was convalescing that he should remain under care, have some conscientious difficulty in signing a certificate that the patient was still of unsound mind; and I notice the statutory form of certificate in Scotland is rather to our address in this matter. "I hereby certify on soul and conscience that I have within a period not exceeding one month preceding the date of this certificate, carefully reviewed and considered the cases of the patients whose names are subjoined, and I am of opinion that their continued detention in the asylum is necessary and proper for their own welfare or for the public safety, as the case may be. Signed by the medical superintendent." What strikes one at once is that it does not contain any statement that the patient is of unsound mind.

Earl Russell: It is far more desirable than our form in that way.

Chairman: That has struck me very much, because I quite appreciate the difficulty that some medical superintendents felt in certifying a person who was not, at the moment of the certificate, certifiable, that is to say, of unsound mind, while their real conviction was that this person was recovering from a state of unsoundness of mind, and would be better for remaining another month or two before discharge. Your form in Scotland seems to me to meet that case, by not requiring a medical superintendent to certify more than that he is of opinion that the continued detention of the patient in the asylum is proper for his own welfare or for the public safety.

15,800. Sir David Drummond: Does that not imply that he is of unsound mind?—Yes. My own opinion is that those doctors who refuse to give that certificate are carrying their scruples too far. If the patient, even though he cannot be certified, is the better for treatment in the asylum, I should say that patient should continue in the asylum.

15,801. Earl Russell: That is quite true, but you do not like to certify that a man is of unsound mind if you do not think he is?—That may be so.

15,802. Chairman: On the other hand, the certificate implies that the person is still of unsound mind, because if he is not of unsound mind he ought instantly to be liberated?—Yes.

15,803. Mr. Snell: It would be used for every case, for a chronic case and other cases?—Yes, that is used for all cases, but I object to that certificate on two grounds: one is, that it does not carry on the conditions under which the patient was sent into the asylum; it is a new form altogether.

15,804. Chairman: It is very striking?—Yes, it is. The second point is: to say that it is necessary for the patient to be in the asylum is also wrong, I think, if you take that in a broad way, because if a person has abundant means it does not matter how insane he is, it is not necessary that he should be in an asylum.

15,805. Mr. Snell: What would you think of a certificate which allowed the doctor to say that "while this patient is improved, it is advisable still for his own good to detain him"?—Well, I think that is all right.

15,806. Chairman: I do not like certificates to be in a form which requires the certifier to do any violence to his sincerity. I think the certificate should be such that the person could sign it with perfect candour and should not have even to brace himself to sign it with a certain effort contrary to what his conscience says. One would like the forms which are used in your work to be forms which can be conscientiously observed; and I can conceive the case of a person of whom it could not be predicated that he or she is of unsound mind at the moment, but that they are convalescent from unsoundness of mind. Now the worst thing you can do is to send out a convalescent patient, whatever the disease, until he is fully re-established in health. Therefore I should have thought that there must be many instances where, as a medical superintendent, if you are asked "Is A.B. still of unsound mind?" you would say "I think not, but I cannot say the precise moment when he passes from one zone to another. If he has another month, I think he will be all right." That would probably be your state of mind in the case of many of your patients?—Yes, that is so. In many of the certificates of probation we say the patient is convalescing; we do not require to say he has either recovered or is insane.

15,807. Would you welcome some form which is applicable to such cases, possibly intermediate between the Scottish form and the English form, which brings you up to the point of saying he is still of unsound mind?—Yes, most certainly I would. I have protested against that certificate myself to the Board of Control.

15,808. Earl Russell: It is all very well to talk about a tender conscience, but you do not want a professional man engaged in this business to sign a certificate and for it to be put to him in the witness box afterwards and for him to be asked, "Is that certificate literally true"?—I quite agree there should be a certificate such as you suggest.

15,809. Chairman: One has heard of formulæ in matters of religion being signed with reservations, but I do not see them being signed with reservations in matters of medicine?—For instance, in cases that are placed under curatory, if a patient suddenly recovers, there is no Judge who will take that patient out of curatory until he is certain that the recovery is going to be permanent; so the patients are detained under curatory, even although they are perfectly sane, till the Judges are satisfied that the recovery is a permanent recovery.

15,810. The Judge requires in that case that the doctor should certify that he is so re-established that he is able to take charge of, or to give instructions for taking charge of, his affairs. The test there is rather a test of capacity to manage your affairs than a test of pathological condition of mind?—The patient may have an attack of acute mania and suddenly get well, and the next day he could manage his affairs, but no one would remove a curatory.

15,811. Earl Russell: But even in the case I put to you, the Judge might very well not be shocked because he would quite understand what the doctor had meant; but you give the public an opportunity of saying, "Here is a doctor who told a lie," and that is most undesirable?—It is, yes.

15,812. Chairman: Now with regard to the methods of admission to your Institution, I see that something like 90 to 95 per cent. of your patients enter the

Edinburgh Royal Hospital at Morningside without any judicial order at all?—Yes, that is so.

15,813. But of those, I take it, quite a number come in upon the Scottish medical certificate of emergency?—That is so.

15,814. That is a certificate by a single doctor?—Yes.

15,815. And an application to you to receive the patient?—Yes.

15,816. But that order has only a three days' duration, has it not?—That is so.

15,817. And it has to be confirmed within three days by a Sheriff's order?—That is so.

15,818. So that in point of fact the only period during which that class are in your Institution without judicial authority is a maximum period of three days?—Yes.

15,819. After that the position is put upon a legal basis by the Sheriff's order —Yes.

15,820. On the other hand, there is quite a substantial proportion of your patients who are not brought in on an emergency certificate, and with regard to whom no Sheriff's order is ever pronounced—I mean a class of voluntary patients?—That is so, yes.

15,821. Of course in England there is also the urgency order, and therefore all patients who are taken into an asylum in England under an urgency order equally enter upon medical authority alone; but again it requires the legal confirmation within the short period prescribed?—Yes.

15,822. On this question of the judicial intervention I observe that you have views which are, if I may say so, vigorously entertained, and I should like to hear your criticism upon the judicial aspect of certification and detention. Will you just tell us in your own way how you approach the problem?—I approach this problem from the point of view of my patients and their friends. They come to me greatly distressed because a relative has gone out of his mind, and I say, "Well, the only place you can send this patient to is an asylum." They cannot afford anything else perhaps. "Before the patient can come in there he has to be certified, and you have to get a Sheriff's order to place him in an asylum." They all jib at this going before a Sheriff—going before a Judge. Then afterwards, if that patient comes in and recovers, the most bitter recollection he has is that he has been branded a lunatic and sent by a Judge into the asylum.

15,823. In your experience have you found that that episode is distasteful to both patients and relatives?—Most distasteful. Get rid of it, get out of it, in any way you possibly can.

15,824. Is that because of the stigma of certification, or because of the distaste for a judicial procedure of any kind?—I think it is both; that the procedure is judicial, I think certainly enters into it.

15,825. I suppose in the minds certainly of people of humble rank the Sheriff is associated with the person who hands out sentences of imprisonment and fines—I mean there is that idea, if one may put it in colloquial language, of "going before the beak"?—Yes.

15,826. Do you find that people who are in these distressing circumstances, both patients and relatives, resent this form of procedure?—Some resent it. Now, for example, we had a patient that Dr. Comrie treated in Ward 3 in the Royal Infirmary, a woman suffering from puerperal insanity; she was there a certain length of time; she became more excited, and it was necessary to remove her from Ward 3 to the West House at Morningside. When the husband heard that before she could get proper treatment in the West House she had to go through this formality, he was a most indignant man. He said, "My wife has been treated all this time in Ward 3 by Dr. Comrie; why cannot you treat her in West House in exactly the same way?"

15,827. And you say, "The law prevents me"?—The law prevents me, and, of course, one cannot help sympathising with these people.

15,828. Of course, it is a feature of this malady, unlike any other malady, that the doctor is debarred from giving the specialised treatment that you can give in an asylum, until the law has intervened?—Yes.

15,829. But observe that the intervention of the law is not meaningless; the intervention of the law is to preserve the liberty of the subject because your treatment, unlike any other medical treatment, includes an invasion of the liberty of the subject?—I know, but there is far too much made of that. Why should Dr. Comrie be able to treat the patient in Ward 3 in the Infirmary, and why should I not be allowed to treat the patient in the same way in West House? We are both doctors. I have more means available than he has.

15,830. Earl Russell: But Dr. Comrie's patient can leave him at her own option—that is the difference?—The patient is delirious.

15,831. The patient regards that as a considerable difference?—But the patient's most bitter recollection after is not that she has been insane, but that she has been certified.

15,832. Mr. Mickle: But, Dr. Robertson, you suggest that instead of being certified by the Sheriff she should be certified by the Board of Control.—No, I would wish ordinary certification to be done away with.

15,833. Chairman: Altogether?—Yes, altogether.

15,834. Mr. Mickle: In all cases?—But a form, some substitute, for the certificate introduced.

15,835. Chairman: I see that your view is that insanity should be treated as a notifiable disease?—Yes.

15,836. That a case of insanity should be notified to the proper authorities, so that the authorities have some responsibility with regard to it?—Yes.

15,837. And your suggestion is that, instead of having the judicial procedure, either the English or the Scottish form, the patient should be treated medically, but that the fact that the patient is being treated in an institution should be notified to the central authority?—Yes.

15,838. Earl Russell: You see, as against that, that section of public opinion which is represented by the Lunacy Reform Society regards the Board of Control here as being, as they call it, in league with the doctor, and no protection; it may be absurd but you have to allow for the feeling?—Yes, I know.

15,839. Chairman: You have to regard these things from the point of view of all sections of the community. If you were in a perfect world it would be quite easy?—Yes, but the majority of people who find fault with these procedures are those who have nothing whatever to do with the care and treatment of these patients; and all those who have to do with them, including the relatives and the patients, the vast majority of them, at any rate, object to these present procedures.

15,840. One can well conceive that the patient himself and his relatives, whose only concern is that the patient should get the best possible treatment, may resent exceedingly having to go through formalities of any kind; but it may be necessary that formalities should exist, to satisfy the public conscience, and also to prevent the possibility of abuses, because in every profession there is a liability to error, and the existence of safeguards is consolatory to the public mind?—I quite agree with you that there must be safeguards, and the matter must be reported to the authorities. I am not seeking to do away with all these things. I would increase the amount of inspection in the matter.

15,841. Then would you consider that the public interest in the matter is sufficiently safeguarded (a) by notification of every case which is detained, every case in which the liberty of the person has for that person's own good to be interfered with, and (b) in spection and visitation on a more vigorous scale by the authority which has been notified?—Yes.

15,842. These two things together, in your mind, would give sufficient protection?—I think so.

15,843. Sir David Drummond: How would you deal with the question of compulsory detention? How would you compel the patients to remain in the asylum?—I would have authority for the patient who is notified. If two doctors certified that a patient needed the treatment in a special institution, that would be an authority for detaining the patient for a certain length of time.

15,844. That is the same as certification?—Yes, certification with a difference. I quite agree that two doctors have to come in, and the matter has to be reported to a third authority, but I would have everything different from what it is at the present time—the judicial authority, and the wording of the present certificates.

15,845. Chairman: Then the real authority for the detention of the patient on the system you figure would be two medical certificates that the patient is of unsound mind, and ought to be detained in your institution, coupled with the confirmation of that by the Board of Control after notification?—Yes.

15,846. Earl Russell: But you know what Sir David puts to you is quite right. The superintendent of any asylum would still have in his hands a document which would be an answer to a writ of habeas corpus. Whether you call it a certificate or anything else, it is something which deprives a man of his liberty?—Yes; I would call it something else.

15,847. Mr. Micklem: Do you not find in Scotland that a large number of patients think they have been wrongfully certified?—Yes.

15,848. And a great many think they are wrongfully detained?—Yes.

15,849. Do not you think it well that there should be some sort of public safeguard for them?—I quite think there should be a safeguard, and there are safeguards just now, and under the scheme I propose there are safeguards; but that will not convince them that they have not been wrongfully detained.

15,850. Chairman: But would not the warrant for detention have to be a statutory warrant of some sort, and would not that warrant be merely after all a certificate in another form?—Yes.

15,851. A rose by any other name, you know, would get as unpleasant an odour. Of course, I can see quite well that an enthusiast for the treatment of his patients who puts that, as he ought to do, in the very forefront, may feel embarrassed by legal formalities, but he may have to recognise that legal formalities must exist?—He has to recognise it, but every person is out to evade these formalities at the present time, and that in itself is an indication that the formalities are wrong. It is just like Prohibition in America; you introduce bootlegging. You have these formalities which people object to.

Earl Russell: You are entering on rather too large a subject there, Dr. Robertson.

15,852. Chairman: At the same time I think Dr. Robertson has this to say for himself, that when people, animated with a genuine desire to do good, find the straight waistcoat of the existing law too severe, and try to evade it, then the time has come when the law must be brought up to date, because the law always lags rather behind instructed public opinion, and the whole purpose of legislation is to bring the law up to date. Our function here is to survey the situation, and to hear from you in what respect the law is irksome to the patient and to the public. We have opportunities afforded us of making recommendations for bringing the law more into consonance with the general feeling upon the subject. It seems to be felt that the time has now come when the legislation ought to be reviewed again. Now your contribution to us, if I may say so, would be most useful in the direction of indicating where we may best ease the administration without the sacrifice of adequate safeguards. That is really the problem, as I conceive it?—That is so, and I may say I do not expect judicial orders will be abolished at the present time. They will some day.

15,853. Sir David Drummond: Is it your opinion that a great many cases are certified now which need not be certified?—Yes, certainly.

15,854. And that certification could be done away with?—If you afford facilities for treatment.

15,855. Earl Russell: Do you think we could meet your point to some extent partly by the voluntary system, and partly by some method of provisional detention, waiting for certification until it becomes essential?—Yes—what I call notification.

15,856. Chairman: If the resort to the extreme measure of certification were only the last resort, then you would probably recognise that it would be quite appropriate in such cases, where you are really going to pronounce formally upon that patient's condition, if you were to postpone necessity for that until every other means had been explored in the patient's interests?—Yes.

15,857. The expedients therefore to be explored, as it appears to me, are, firstly, the voluntary system, which we shall now ask you about, as one method whereby the patient without certification gets the benefit of the treatment and is not subjected to any judicial process, and, secondly, the method whereby there is in Scotland an experimental six months treatment permitted by law at the present time, also without certification?—Yes.

15,858. There is the further suggestion that patients, or at any rate patients as to whose condition there is doubt, should be provisionally dealt with, as Lord Russell has put it, and placed under observation for a time with safeguards, and with certain modified powers of detention until it is seen whether you require to resort to the final and definite step of certification?—Yes.

15,859. Therefore these three ways seem to me to be all things that we might explore for a moment with you as obviating the necessity of certification until the last moment?—Yes; these are the very methods I recommend.

15,860. Let us take, first of all, the voluntary method. I have read with great interest your last report on your own institution on the subject of voluntary patients, and you go to the length of saying that that method under recent legislation has so developed in your experience as practically to have brought about a revolutionary practice?—That is so.

15,861. The procedure in Scotland for the admission of voluntary patients is now very simple?—Very simple.

15,862. What does it consist in?—It consists in the patient writing a letter, or signing a letter only, to the Superintendent desiring to be admitted as a voluntary patient: "I desire to be admitted as a voluntary patient to the Royal Edinburgh Asylum," and then he has to write an identical letter to the Secretary of the Board of Control. He comes in, and he is admitted on his request to the Superintendent, and the other letter is sent to the Board of Control, and within three days we get their sanction to keep the patient.

15,863. Is that all?—That is all.

15,864. Sir David Drummond: Then the system of the voluntary patient is only available in the case of people who are able to write that letter?—Yes, they all have to sign that letter.

15,865. Chairman: You see the point?—I know that point.

15,866. A voluntary patient connotes to my legal mind that the patient has volition and has sufficient intelligence to appreciate the nature of the act?—Yes; I have gone into that matter very fully in one of my reports. I have been dealing with these matters for many years. My view is the legal view, the same view as you have in connection with a crime: that a person is responsible if he understands the nature and quality of the act and the results of it. Now I should say however insane a man is, if he understands what he is doing when he signs that letter, he should have the right to become a voluntary patient.

18 April, 1925.]

Professor GEORGE M. ROBERTSON, M.D., F.R.C.P.

15,867. Earl Russell: Of course, he may perfectly well not understand that, even if he is full of delusions?—Yes.

15,868. Chairman: One must disabuse one's mind of the idea that every person who is mentally afflicted has no intelligence; a residue of intelligence may remain unaffected, of course?—Yes.

15,869. But the difficulty is this, that you have ex hypothesi a mind which is to some extent disordered, that is to say, it is pathological to a greater or less degree, and yet it is the act of that mind (and that mind ex hypothesi an affected mind) which is necessary, as a preliminary to admission?—Yes.

15,870. I could conceive it to be very difficult to say at what stage that person has passed beyond the zone in which he could give a really voluntary assent?—I quite agree with you that there would be a difficulty in the matter of perfect accuracy, but although a person is very insane I think he can sign an application to be admitted as a voluntary patient, providing he possesses the same state of mind as a person who makes a will. An insane person may make a will, provided the provisions of the will are not affected by his mental disorder; and in the case of crime, too, if he understands the nature and quality of the act, he is held responsible for it. Therefore, I say, under similar circumstances, these are the appropriate conditions in which a person should sign a letter for admission, if he understands the nature of the act and his delusions do not affect the writing of the letter.

15,871. We are all familiar with the class of case where a person says, "Well, I think I would be the better for going into retreat for a time; I feel I am upset, and I should like the shelter and the rest, and the regimen of an institution such as you have." There are many people in that position. That class of case seems to me the ideal voluntary case; but I have more difficulty with cases where the patient has less powers, and where the disease may have made further progress. I find it difficult to judge at what stage the power to give a voluntary consent is lost. What criterion can you apply? Would you take, for instance, a letter signed by anybody that professed to want to come to you as a voluntary patient, even although your own opinion was that that person had really signed the letter without the least appreciation of what it meant?—I do at the present time, owing to the state of the laws. The friends of the patient do not want him certified. Every person wants him to have the treatment in as simple a way as possible. They come up to me with these letters signed, and I admit the patient.

15,872. Earl Russell: Is the letter presented to the patient ready written, and does he merely sign it, or might he write it himself and sign it?—His signature is all that is required.

15,873. I want to know what the practice is?—Sometimes one and sometimes another.

15,874. Chairman: I can well imagine the case of a relative saying to the patient, "Now here is a nice letter, will you just sign it; that is addressed to a great friend of mine who has a charming place out in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh, and you are going to stay there. Just you sign down there." That may well happen in real life you know. The person in that state of mind, possibly very pliable, just says, "All right, where do I sign?" That is handed to you, and that is represented to you as being the act of volition of the patient. I should doubt very much whether that is an act of his at all.—So should I.

15,875. Earl Russell: If it had been a promissory note it would not do?—Yes, but I do not consider that in the slightest bit. Why should I? I have no responsibility in that. I have presented to me this letter signed by this patient, and after the patient comes he is a voluntary patient, and he can go by giving three days' notice.

15,876. Chairman: But I do not like the camouflage of suggesting that that is a voluntary patient. It is a patient who has gone in under the guise of being a voluntary patient, but in point of fact has had no volition in the matter at all?—That is being done at the present time, because of certification and orders which people are trying to evade. If you create laws which will enable a person to get this treatment simply and easily, there will not be any necessity to evade them.

15,877. That is just one of the things we wish to address ourselves to. I should like the true voluntary patient to be entitled, as hitherto, to have access to institutions. On the other hand, I should have liked the people who really are not capable of a voluntary act at all to have the benefit of escaping certification also, if their cases are fit for it; but I do not quite like the idea of their being described as voluntary patients when they have no adequate power of volition to appreciate what they are doing.—Neither do I. I think it is very wrong.

15,878. Sir David Drummond: Has it often come to your knowledge that people have declined to sign the letter?—Yes. For instance, many melancholic patients will refuse to do anything, even to take food; they will not sign a letter; and they would be very suitable patients to be voluntary patients. These people have to be certified then.

15,879. Chairman: How are we to avoid certification in their case?—By having what Lord Russell suggested just now, and what I suggest—that they should be notified. These are recoverable cases, and will probably get better within six months. Have them put in by some sort of modified doctor's certificate and notified to the Board of Control, and have them inspected, to see that there is nothing wrong going on.

15,880. An intermediate form of order?—Yes—what I call notification.

15,881. Earl Russell: It is still an observation certificate or a provisional certificate, but I dare say it may make a difference if you call it something else?—Yes, it will.

15,882. Chairman: And it would, of course, still necessitate detention against the will of the patient?—Yes.

15,883. Take the voluntary patient: of course the true voluntary patient, quite a large class of them, as we know, present really no difficulty, because they are all able to co-operate in their own treatment; they are like other persons who are in a general hospital?—Yes.

15,884. But do you find that the patients whom you have as voluntary patients appreciate that they are there subject to their own right to go away if they wish?—The vast majority of them do; there are some who are quite indifferent. As long as they are kindly treated and so on, they do not bother their heads about it. But the vast majority of them do know; and they are all told they are voluntary patients and that they have privileges; and the Commissioners, as they are going round ticking off the patients, very, very frequently say to the patient, "You know you are a voluntary patient?"

15,885. It has been suggested that a safeguard of some value might take this form: that the Commissioners on their visitation should see each voluntary patient and should make a return saying they have seen A.B., and they are satisfied they are there still of their own wish?—Well, of course, a test of some kind as to the volitional powers of the patient certainly would be the right procedure.

15,886. That would have the advantage of requiring the Commissioner actually to attend to the case, because if he has got to make a return about it, then he will have to consider it; and if he saw the patient and informed the patient again of what you have already informed him, and was able to assess whether he was still really in the category of a voluntary inmate in your Institution or not, it might be rather a useful safeguard, I think?—It would. You would have to increase the number of Commissioners of course.

Professor GEORGE M. ROBERTSON, M.D., F.R.C.P.

Chairman: We will come to that in a little.

15,887. Earl Russell: In this country the Board of Control have a way of saying to a superintendent of an asylum sometimes with regard to a voluntary patient: "We do not think that patient is a voluntary patient. If you keep him you must certify him." That is what they do say now?—Yes.

15,888. It is unfortunate they have to, but they rather feel they have to?—Yes. We have used every possible means in Scotland to avoid certification. For instance, you have strengthened us very greatly by your opinion that the Act of 1913 expresses that it is not only those who cannot be certified that may be voluntary patients. At the present time it is no one's business to see that the patient should be certified. The patient comes in to me; I receive a sanction from the Board of Control; I accept that; why should I go out of my way to certify the patient and earn the ill-will of the patient afterwards if he recovers? Then a voluntary patient very often pays for his own board, signs his cheques, and so on. He is not going to pay a doctor to certify him a lunatic when he does not want to be certified. The relations do not want him certified. If you call in any doctor, the important person to call in is the family doctor. You say: "This person is a voluntary patient, but he can be certified now." He says: "I will not certify him." They have great objection to certifying their patients at the present time. Two years ago a doctor came to me, to find another to certify his patient, because he said: "This is the first patient I ever had, and I do not like to certify him."

15,889. Chairman: Detention in the sense of interference with the liberty of the subject is just the other peril?—Yes. I do not think there is any medical certificate that can certify a voluntary patient, supposing he is insane but knows what he is doing, because every certificate under the Lunacy law is for a particular purpose. You talk generally about the lunacy certificate, but the person has to be not only of unsound mind but a fit and proper person to be detained in an asylum. You have the two conditions there. You ask the family doctor to go up and certify the patient. He says: "He is insane all right enough, but I will not say he is a fit and proper person to be detained in an asylum under a Sheriff's order." So, you see, even an insane person may not necessarily be certified by the family doctor.

15,890. Possibly the case might be met in this way: the voluntary patient might be admissible not merely on his own application, but with the accompaniment of a certificate from his usual medical attendant, because he has presumably had one in the great bulk of cases, or from a medical man, to the effect that he is satisfied that the patient is desirous of entering the institution and capable of forming an opinion upon it. I mean, one could devise a formula which would proceed upon a criterion such as you have in your mind?—Yes. A certificate of that kind was given when voluntary patients were first of all introduced into this country; that was in the Act of 1862.

15,891. It is a formality again, and you want rather to strip the thing of formalities; but a formality of that kind would not be a very rigorous one?—No. I think it is a very proper proceeding.

15,892. There are certain features in Lord Onslow's Bill which are open to criticism. It proposes to deal with people who are non-volitional; simply to be dealt with as parrels, so to speak. That is not my conception of a voluntary patient at all, to tell you the truth?—No.

15,893. I think that class of case, which for the time being has an absence of will-power, would be much better treated as a provisional case.—Yes.

15,894. Sir David Drummond: In your experience are a certain number of these voluntary patients certified eventually?—Yes.

15,895. On what ground?—Usually on the ground that they have given three days' notice to go.

15,896. Earl Russell: Do you agree with the view that Dr. Yellowlees took, that anybody who wished to leave the asylum must be insane?—No, I do not go quite so far as that. Another feature about voluntary patients is this: a patient comes in in the incipient stage of mental disorder; he has probably been ill before; and he says: "I want to come in as a voluntary patient; look after me." That patient at the end of a week becomes deliriously excited. What is to be done? That man has come to you as a voluntary patient. Are you to go and certify him? I think that would be hard on him. I have had a patient under my care for several years with recurring attacks; he resided in Craig House; he used to say to me when he was well: "Do not certify me however ill I get." I have got a melancholic lady just now whose great horror is that she will become so ill that I will certify her. These people have decided voluntarily to come for treatment, and then you go and certify them!

15,897. In recoverable cases, I wonder whether you could get over the difficulty of the three days notice by having some sort of provisional order for detention for three months, in the hope that at the end of that time the patient would be willing to be a voluntary patient again?—Yes; that comes in the group of cases the Chairman has suggested.

Chairman: I think the case you put just now is a very interesting one. A patient, who is quite able to appreciate that he has from time to time accessions of insanity, but has quite completely lucid intervals, and recognises that the onset of the disease is at hand, goes to you as his medical adviser and friend, and says: "Now I want to come into your institution for a time." That is a perfectly voluntary act on his part. His mind has not in the least passed beyond the zone of appreciating what he is doing. You say: "Certainly, come along." He has been there before, and he knows the place and all the rest of it; he is very glad to come to you, and you afford him all the means of treatment you have. Quite true, in about a week the illness is reaching its crisis, and he does become, if you please, acutely maniacal. At that moment, of course, he is not a voluntary patient, because the unhappy man is not able to have any will at that time. What are we to do with him? He has ceased in law to be a voluntary patient.

15,898. Earl Russell: Why cannot we regard his sane will as continuing over the crisis?—I think that is a most important thing. It was mentioned yesterday, for instance, that when they have to become certified, it has been recommended that they should go to another asylum.

15,899. Chairman: So that there should be no atmosphere of certification as a sequel to a voluntary entry?—Yes; if a man who is presumably sane selects a particular asylum because he prefers to go there, then after he has become insane and certifiable, why should he be removed from it? I do think that this continuing will is a most important matter. You see you are dealing with a patient personally; you have to look at these things from the personal, human point of view, and not from the point of view of the cold law. The next case is this: supposing a person has not gone to the asylum and applied to be a voluntary patient during the two or three days he had it in his power to do so, and he becomes maniacally excited; he has exactly the same symptoms as the other person who has taken the precaution—must you certify this man? Cannot you provide for him under this sort of temporary measure of notification?

15,900. Of course, the voluntary patient, who was capable of appreciating the situation and recognised for himself that for the next three months he would be unfit for ordinary life, might quite well agree to submit himself to treatment for three months. You might know the probable duration of the illness, and he might say: "I am prepared for three months" (or six months, as the case might be) "to submit myself to treatment in your institution, with the result that my liberty will be restrained whether I like it or not, because I recognise that there is a time coming when I shall not be able to express my will."

Professor GEORGE M. ROBERTSON, M.D., F.R.C.P.

15,901. Earl Russell: I think I am right in saying that we allow an inebriate to do it now for 12 months?—Yes. That is a very different thing; he is sane the whole time.

Mr. Snell: What do we do when we go into a general hospital, when we have to pass through an anæsthetic? We express our will for the coming event.

Chairman: We certainly do.

Sir Ernest Hiley: But the doctrine of the continuation of the sane will has a very limited duration. It is rather a difficult one.

15,902. Chairman: I think the problem is extremely difficult, because my sympathy is very largely with Dr. Robertson, that the main concern is the patient. No doubt you must surround the patient with the necessary legal safeguards, but the treatment of the patient is the main thing; of course, it ought to be?—Yes.

15,903. If you can get the patient treated and cured without certification, so much the better, but then even if the treatment of the patient involves interference with his liberty, what are you to do? That is just the difficulty; it is very complex.—It is very complicated. If a person in this condition determines to go, and expresses himself very strongly—the best test of that is, supposing he takes to his heels: that patient has to be certified, because we cannot keep him if he has expressed his intention to go. I may say another thing about these very excited patients: they lose their will altogether; they do not want either to go or to stay; they are quite indifferent.

15,904. They are neutral?—Yes. You leave the door open, and they have not the sense to go away.

15,905. Sir David Drummond: All through this discussion, not only to-day, but at earlier meetings, I have always had it in my mind that the great difficulty would be the very large proportion of patients who would decline to enter an asylum as voluntary patients?—Yes; many of them do.

15,906. We have been dealing with it as if the majority of them would present themselves voluntarily, if volition allowed it; but my impression is that there is a very large proportion of people who, although able to decide the question, would decline to do so?—No doubt a considerable number do decline; but a very large number, by far the majority, are quite prepared to do it.

15,907. Earl Russell: As a rule, when we certify them here, they are past the voluntary stage?—Yes.

15,908. Chairman: We should bring out at this stage this feature, which is very important. Dr. Robertson tells us that he finds that 40 per cent. of all the private patients entering the hospitals of Scotland do so as voluntary patients?—Yes.

15,909. Mr. Micklem: With regard to the voluntary patients in Scotland, suppose they want to leave, can you detain them for a single minute?—Yes, for three days.

15,910. Under what?—Under the law of voluntary admission.

15,911. Could you refer me to the law on the subject?—Yes. It is Section 15 of the Act of 1866.

15,912. Chairman: The voluntary system in Scotland has had full statutory recognition?—Yes, since 1866; and it introduced the system into the country. Prior to that, there existed what were called the voluntary boarders in England, but they were not really patients.

15,913. Then it has been reconsidered by the Legislature at intervals, and has been simplified from time to time, and is now in the very simple form which you described to start with, under the 1913 Act?—Yes.

15,914. And it has always been accompanied with this, that you might detain a person who came in as a voluntary patient for three days against the wishes of that patient after receipt of notice that the patient desired to leave?—Yes.

15,915. And those three days give you the opportunity of having the patient detained against his will by certification, if you conceive that it is necessary that that should be done in the interest of the patient, or in the interest of the public?—Yes. His friends at once, of course, are communicated with.

15,916. After all, the system is perfectly intelligible. One's only difficulty is how to judge if he is a voluntary patient or not?—He is a voluntary patient at present if he signs these forms.

Mr. Micklem: The Act of Parliament says "whose mental condition is not such as to render it legal to grant certificates of insanity."

Chairman: The 1913 Act has altered that, I think.

15,917. Sir Ernest Hiley: Both Acts speak of a written application. It is not a question of signing a form prepared by somebody else?—It usually is an application. There is no stress laid on that point one way or the other.

15,918. Chairman: I think the system is extremely valuable, because it achieves the treatment of the patient and it avoids the stigma of certification. In your experience, have you found that it has been liable to any abuse?—I think the friends have induced patients to sign the voluntary form rather than be certified. I think that has happened.

15,919. Earl Russell: When the patients have recovered, they do not regret having done so, do they?—No, they do not object; and, of course, they can leave at any time; it only lasts for three days.

15,920. Sir David Drummond: Has it crossed your mind that, instead of treating these patients in asylums, special hospitals might possibly be provided, apart from the asylums?—The well-managed asylums are by far the best places for the treatment of mental disorders; they have got far more wealth and far more facilities—far better surroundings.

15,921. But I am thinking of an institution which does not exist at all at present, apart entirely from public asylums?—A certain number of patients like to go into small houses and not to see other patients.

15,922. Chairman: At present you do not regard it as essential to the admission of a person as a voluntary patient that that patient should not be susceptible of certification at the moment?—I am not compelled by law to take any action in that matter at all, and if the person comes to me I admit him, if he has the sanction of the Board.

15,923. But in its inception the voluntary system in Scotland quite clearly was intended for cases which were not certifiable cases.—Possibly.

15,924. I think, historically, under the Act of 1866, it says so. It may be altered now; but the inception of the idea at any rate was that it was an expedient for persons who were not certifiable. It was assumed that all persons who were certifiable would be certified.—I think there is another way of looking at it, too. There has been a great deal of discussion over that word "but." It was possible that a person who was sane, but who required treatment and observation of some kind, might wish to go into an asylum. In the old days that person could not get treatment in an asylum.

15,925. If one may look at it historically, it strikes me in this way. First of all, the only ticket of admission to an asylum was a certificate. Then it was recognised that there were many people who would benefit by asylum treatment, but who were not qualified to get that ticket of admission. Therefore, the law provided that such persons could go in voluntarily without a certificate of admission. Then I think, the law, having got that length, is rather developing in this direction: that persons who, although they might be certified, are still capable of entering as voluntary patients should be permitted to do so, and so get the benefit of treatment, although certifiable, without certification?—Yes.

Professor GEORGE M. ROBERTSON, M.D., F.R.C.P.

15,926. One can trace it through three stages?—Yes.

15,927. The discussion has been very useful, but I think we are still left in some difficulty?—Yes. Before the stages you describe, the original voluntary patients had to be certified.

15,928. Sir Ernest Hiley: Do you find that this voluntary system you have been describing is in advance of public opinion in Scotland or is it abreast of public opinion?—I do not think it is in advance of public opinion.

15,929. It is supported?—It is supported, most decidedly.

15,930. Chairman: I think one may say this, that, so far as one is aware, there has been comparatively little agitation in Scotland with regard to the administration of the lunacy laws?—Practically none.

15,931. There is a general satisfaction with their administration?—Yes.

15,932. And there have been practically no cases in Court, so far as I know. I am probably as good a judge of that as you are, Doctor, but one knows that litigation relating to cases of insanity is exceedingly rare in Scotland.—Exceedingly rare.

15,933. Just as a matter of curiosity, have you yourself ever been sued in a case?—Never. I have been lucky perhaps.

15,934. I do not know about that. In the course of a somewhat extended experience I do not think I have ever had a case, or ever been consulted about a case involving a medical superintendent or a certifying doctor; I cannot recall one at the moment. I have had to deal with one or two questions about curatory, of course, where estates were involved.—Yes. One of the points is the case with which any mistake can be rectified by calling in two doctors from outside.

15,935. That is a very important safeguard which exists in Scotland, and it is taken advantage of, I understand?—Yes, greatly.

15,936. Now we have dealt with the voluntary patient at some length. Then the next question was the question of the provisional certificate which we have dealt with really incidentally. You think that some method of provisional certification would be an alleviation of the present system, and might be utilised for cases which were really likely to recover in a short time?—Yes.

15,937. Then may we have a word from you about the special provision (I think it is in Section 13 of the 1866 Act) under which there may be treatment of patients for six months without certification? I have used the word "treatment" advisedly to avoid the question of detention, as to which there is some little doubt. That is under Section 13, is it not, and the whole of that hangs upon a proviso in the section?—Yes.

15,938. Has the system of treating patients in houses without certification really been based upon that provision of the law?—Yes.

15,939. Now tell us a little bit about the development on those lines, because you have been, if I may say so, a pioneer in this work.—I found that insane persons were being kept in private houses, proprietary private houses, and I was not altogether satisfied with the treatment they received in these houses. Further, my Board permit me to do consulting practice and private work, and I did not like sending patients to private houses that were not under the Board; so on these two grounds I recommended that the Board should start private houses of their own which were nursing homes. I persuaded the Board they would be a good thing, that they would be a benefit to the public.

15,940. Mr. Micklem: You mean the Board of your hospital?—Yes, the Board of Managers. We bought two or three small houses. During the course of the war the War Office heard of this, and they got hold of these houses for insane officers, they sent insane officers to them in the first place. Then at the end of the war when the officers were removed, we received into these places private patients, and converted them into ordinary nursing homes where the patient could be treated without being sent to an asylum.

15,941. Chairman: And where they could be kept for six months, was it?—And where they could be kept for six months, yes.

15,942. Sir David Drummond: Had you nothing of the kind before the war?—We bought these houses during the war, but during the war we could not make use of them.

15,943. When did you commence this system?—I think we opened it for ordinary patients in 1918 or 1919.

15,944. Before the war how did you deal with those patients?—Before the war these patients were put into the nursing homes kept by any person, usually lodgings.

15,945. Outside your jurisdiction?—Yes.

15,946. Chairman: Let us follow the idea. In ordinary ailments the use of the nursing home, as we know, has become more and more common because of the advantage of the treatment and the observation that can be obtained?—Yes.

15,947. Your conception is that mental ailments should also have the advantage of treatment in nursing homes on analogous lines?—Yes.

15,948. In pursuance of your general idea that mental ailments ought to be treated like other ailments, so far as possible?—Yes.

15,949. Then you were confronted with a difficulty that such persons from time to time require restraint or require detention against their own wishes?—Yes.

15,950. Was it in that state of matters that you resorted to Section 41 of the Act, 20 and 21 Victoria, which, while preventing the reception of lunatics in private houses, has this important qualification that "the prohibition shall not apply to any case where the party so received and kept has been sent to any such house for the purpose of temporary residence only not exceeding six months, and under the certificate of a medical person, which certificate shall be in the form of Schedule G hereunto annexed."?—That section has been repealed, and there is a new section to take its place, 29 and 30 Victoria, Section 13.

15,951. By Section 13 of the Act, 29 & 30 Victoria, the section which I have just been quoting was repealed, and in lieu thereof it is provided that "no person shall receive or keep any person as a lunatic for gain without the order of the Sheriff, or the sanction of the Board." Then "any person who shall receive into or keep in his house any such person, or any person alleged to be a lunatic, shall, within 14 clear days thereafter make application for such order or sanction; provided always that when the lunatic is a pauper lunatic, such application shall be made by the Inspector of the Poor, and it shall be lawful in such case for the Sheriff to grant his order on one medical certificate." Then it goes on to provide for visitation, and then the proviso, which is very important is: "Provided that the enactments of this section shall not apply to any case where the person so received and kept has been sent to such house for the purpose of temporary residence only, not exceeding six months, and under the certificate of a medical person, which certificate shall be in the form of Schedule G to the first recited Act annexed."

Earl Russell: That is how the earlier Act gets incorporated?

Chairman: Yes.

15,952. Mr. Micklem: But it leaves it very much where it was under the proviso?—Yes.

15,953. Chairman: Now the result of this was, I take it, that being desirous of having nursing homes for mental patients, you have taken advantage of that proviso which provides that patients on one medical certificate in Form G may be kept (whatever that means) for six months' temporary residence in a private house?—Yes.

18 April, 1925.]

Professor GEORGE M. ROBERTSON, M.D., F.R.C.P.

15,954. Then you have established such private houses, and you house your patients there for six months on one medical certificate in Form G?—Yes.

15,955. Let us look at Form G for a moment, which you have quoted, I think, in your précis on page 5. The certificate is to the effect "That C.D. is afflicted (state the nature of the disease), but that the malady is not confirmed, and that I consider it expedient, with a view to his recovery that he should be placed (specify the House in which Patient is to be kept) for a temporary Residence of (Specify a time, not exceeding six months)." Now the pre-supposition of all that is this, that the case is not a confirmed case, and that there is a prospect of recovery if there is temporary residence in a home?—That is so.

15,956. Sir David Drummond: What is meant by "confirmed"?—I suppose it means it is not a chronic case.

15,957. Chairman: Not established?—Yes.

15,958. Sir David Drummond: Then all acute cases could be taken in?—Yes.

15,959. Is that not a confirmed case of its kind?—I think "confirmed" means irrecoverable in contrast to cases that can recover; I think it means the chronic case.

15,960. Chairman: The words rather suggest that the contrast is between "not confirmed" and "with a view to his recovery"?—Yes.

15,961. Now this method of treatment has worked out, has it not, very well in your experience?—Exceedingly well.

15,962. And do you find that the six months' patient does recover in your houses within that period?—The majority of the patients recover within that time.

15,963. What happens if the six months elapse and the patient has not recovered?—Then if he remains in the home he has to be put under the previous portion of that section; he has to be certified, and he is treated as a boarded-out patient in the house.

15,964. Earl Russell: You can do that without going to the Sheriff, simply by the sanction of the Board of Control, without a judicial order?—Yes, I have given a form showing how it can be done. To prevent misconception, I may say that a great number of patients are also treated in those homes who come in voluntarily, not under Schedule G at all. Schedule G only applies in the case of those persons who do not come in voluntarily.

15,965. Chairman: Now do you conceive yourself, under that section with its proviso, and under Schedule G certificate, entitled to detain a person against his wish?—I do, yes. The purport of the opinion that we have taken has been to that effect,—that we have the power. But the Board of Managers of the Institution have instructed me that if I take in any patient under Schedule G, I have to get a letter of indemnification from the relatives of the patient against any action for damages against the matron or myself or the Board of Managers.

15,966. That is because of the possible doubt as to whether that section entitles you to detain the patient against his will?—Yes, just so.

15,967. It is noteworthy that that section is apart from the sections dealing with voluntary patients?—Yes.

15,968. And therefore seems rather to be upon a different basis?—Quite; there were no voluntary patients at the time Schedule G was passed.

15,969. In 1857?—Yes.

15,970. However, the fact is interesting to the lawyer, but the practice which you are pursuing is to treat patients in these homes, and to detain them if necessary against their will, for a period of six months?—Yes.

15,971. Earl Russell: Do such voluntary patients as come there come on the same terms as they come to an asylum?—No. It is not an asylum; it is a private house.

15,972. You have not got the three days power of detention?—No. They are strictly voluntary. As a matter of fact, legally there is no notification to the Board of Control of these patients at all, and there are no instructions given as to what is to be done with Schedule G.

15,973. You mean when the certificate is completed, nobody knows who is to have it?—No, but there ought to be notification, and, as a matter of fact, we do notify them.

15,974. Chairman: But that is a matter of practice rather than of regulation?—Yes.

15,975. Sir Ernest Hiley: But, in effect, on the certificate of one doctor you can detain one of these patients, in your view, for six months?—Yes.

15,976. Without any Sheriff's order, or any other procedure?—Yes.

15,977. Earl Russell: And without the Board of Control ever hearing about it?—Yes.

Sir David Drummond: What accommodation have you?

15,978. Chairman: There are four houses in all, I think, are there not?—There are four houses containing about 40 beds, and a country house containing about 15; that makes 55. Then we have got another big house which holds 20.

15,979. 60 or 70 altogether?—Yes; about 40 patients on an average we have. Of course, these cases should be notified to the Board of Control; every one realises it. It must be an error in the law.

15,980. Earl Russell: You have got everything you want there?—Yes.

15,981. No public authority?—No.

15,982. Chairman: I notice you say this in your last report: "In these homes the family physician can treat his own patients exactly as he does in nursing homes for other diseases"?—Yes.

15,983. So that the family doctor continues to attend the case, does he?—Yes. There are many patients in these homes that are sent in by their own doctor. For instance, Dr. Comrie puts a patient in one of these homes and treats him himself.

15,984. Then you go on to say: "The managers really provide the properly equipped home, and the necessary staff under the direction of an experienced matron, where early and mild cases of nervous breakdown may receive appropriate nursing and care. These homes are useful also for patients suffering from the mental breakdown that accompanies old age. Such cases are often very difficult to care for at home, yet no one likes to send an aged parent or relative in this condition to a mental hospital. There were 111 patients admitted into these homes during the year 1924, and the total number under treatment in them was 145"?—Yes.

15,985. Sir David Drummond: What view do the Board of Control take if one of these patients commits suicide?—That is just the whole point. These homes are created for the very purpose of treating these patients properly, who might possibly commit suicide.

15,986. Mr. Snell: Do you never have accidents of that kind?—There have not been any accidents of that kind so far, but we take the necessary precautions and know what to do, and everything is done properly.

15,987. Miss Madeleine Symons: They are all private patients, I suppose?—Yes, these are all private patients.

15,988. Sir David Drummond: Suicide may occur, of course, in the best conducted asylum in the country?—Yes.

15,989. Mr. Snell: Would it not be the fact that in proportion as patients were allowed liberty there would be danger of accidents of that kind?—Yes.

18 April, 1925.]

Professor GEORGE M. ROBERTSON, M.D., F.R.C.P.

15,990. Is it not true, for instance, that at Maudsley they take those risks, and the rate of accidents is probably a little higher in consequence?—Yes. I quite agree with you that there is a danger of being too strict, but it is a very serious danger to be too lax. For instance, patients who commit suicide are almost invariably cases suffering from melancholia, and melancholia is almost always recovered from, if safeguarded.

15,991. Earl Russell: Would you have suicidal cases in these homes?—Yes, any kind of case.

15,992. Mr. Micklem: At the end of six months supposing the patient has not recovered, you get an order from the Board of Control?—Yes.

15,993. To what effect is that order?—A sanction.

15,994. A sanction to continue the treatment of the patient indefinitely?—Yes, till the patient's friends remove the patient, or the patient recovers. You have a sample of the order on one of the white sheets.

15,995. Earl Russell: Is this a case where the escape for 28 days would apply?—No.

15,996. I mean discharge by operation of law?—Yes; this is not an asylum.

15,997. And therefore it does not apply. They cannot escape from these places?—They can escape, yes.

15,998. Chairman: Are the houses really in a sense part of the system of boarding-out in Scotland?—Yes.

15,999. Are the patients in these places treated as boarded-out patients?—They are technically regarded as boarded-out patients under the law.

16,000. But one moment. The boarded-out patient is a patient who has been insane, but who may be with safety allowed to reside out of an institution?—Yes.

16,001. But the people you deal with in your nursing homes are people who have never been certified at all. Would they not fall into a different category from the boarded-out patients so-called?—They are under different sections of the law. A person can be boarded out without ever having been sent to an asylum. A person who becomes ill in a private house can be boarded out.

16,002. Earl Russell: Surely you are wrong in saying these are boarded-out cases?—They are described as boarded-out cases, under a separate section of the law.

16,003. Sir Ernest Hiley: I understood yesterday that boarded-out cases were registered by the Board of Control and periodically visited?—Yes.

16,004. Chairman: Surely this is different because you may have these patients there for six months; during that six months they are not registered, are not certified; they are merely private patients residing in a private nursing home, and they are not notified to the Board of Control. Now, on the other hand, when you proceed to obtain a sanction from the Board of Control, or an order from the Sheriff, you are then taking the first formal step with regard to these persons apart from the certificate, Schedule G, which you have got before. Then you go to the Board of Control, and you get from them a sanction, and that sanction does seem rather to correspond with an authority to board out a patient?—Although the patients are treated differently, and they are a different class of patients, they are described (Ninth Annual Report, 1866, page 25) under the heading of Boarded-out Patients, although, of course, they are not what we usually regard as boarded-out patients.

16,005. Now this method of treatment is, of course, not applicable to the pauper patients at all?—No.

16,006. These are all patients who pay for themselves?—Yes.

16,007. With regard to rate-aided patients, how far is the voluntary system available for them? The trouble arises in this way, that if the patient goes in voluntarily then there is no grant for that case?—That is so.

16,008. Therefore, if a local authority sends any of its afflicted rate-aided patients into an asylum on a voluntary basis, they must bear the whole cost themselves on their own assessment?—Yes.

16,009. Have some of the local authorities been doing that in Scotland?—Yes, they have, particularly the smaller parishes in Argyllshire; and that point is interesting because in these small country parishes everyone knows everyone else, and they co-operate to avoid certification, and the Sheriff's order; and so in these small parishes they allow them to go in as voluntary patients. In some of the big parishes, such as Edinburgh, and, of course, in Glasgow, they have adopted the principle of wards, which were originally started by Dr. Carswell, and afterwards extended; practically, these supply that provision for voluntary patients.

16,010. One of the curious things seems to be this, that the patients and relatives all seem not to want certification, while the public seem to insist upon it?—It is curious.

16,011. On the other hand, we are assured by very vigilant persons that there should be certification?—Yes. Someone wrote to the "Times" three weeks ago pointing out that the people of the country can be put into these two groups, and, as a matter of fact, those who want certification are the more vocal of the two, and you hear more about it.

16,012. Mr. Micklem: May I ask a further question about these nursing homes? Is it the fact that in Scotland any private person may, for gain, open a nursing home, and get lunatics on a medical certificate and detain them for six months without the Board of Control knowing anything about it?—Yes, that is so. With regard to that, of course, we have been trying to get the law altered for a long time.

16,013. Earl Russell: You do not think that desirable, of course?—It is most undesirable; we all think it is most undesirable.

16,014. Chairman: You desire disinterested management?—Yes. I want disinterested management, but I certainly think that any person who goes into a home of that kind should be notified at once to the Board of Control, and the home should be notified and inspected.

16,015. Mr. Micklem: At the present time there is no inspection?—The Board of Control is entitled to visit any place where a lunatic is being kept.

16,016. Chairman: If they know about it?—If they know about it.

16,017. But there is no method of notification?—No, there is not. The Board of Control have complained about the absence of facilities for knowing what is going on. We sadly need an Act to put that matter right, because now it is becoming so extensive.

16,018. Mr. Micklem: And yet there has been no complaint of illegal detention in Scotland in homes of this sort?—No, there has not been any complaint.

16,019. Sir David Drummond: Have any accidents occurred? Have they been brought under the notice of the Board of Control?—Accidents have occurred, and if they are fatal accidents they are investigated by the Procurator-Fiscal, and I suppose they are brought to the notice of the Board of Control.

16,020. Mr. Snell: In paragraph 1 of your précis you speak of there being only one proprietary asylum in Scotland?—Yes.

16,021. These homes are in a quite different category, presumably?—The homes I am talking about, Morningside, are in a different category. They are under the Board of Management of the Royal Asylum, but there are a great number of nursing homes in the country who will take in insane patients.

16,022. Chairman: Though they are not licensed?—No.

18 April, 1925.]

Professor GEORGE M. ROBERTSON, M.D., F.R.C.P.

Earl Russell: These homes of which Dr. Robertson is speaking correspond to our licensed houses, except that they are not licensed.

Chairman: And they are not carried on for gain.

16,023. Earl Russell: The ones he is speaking of are carried on for gain?—But they are not under the lunacy laws.

Earl Russell: I am speaking of the other homes, those run by private enterprise. They correspond really to our licensed houses without our licensed houses precautions.

16,024. Chairman: And the period is limited to six months?—Yes.

16,025. Mrs. Mathew: Are the numbers limited?—No. They are not lunatics in the eyes of the law during these six months.

16,026. Chairman: It is a curious position?—Most anomalous. This is the only form in the lunacy laws of England and Scotland, a copy of which has not to be sent to the Board of Control.

16,027. Mr. Micklem: It seems to have worked well?—It has worked very well.

16,028. Chairman: As we are reviewing the system, we are well advised to take hints from our witnesses if a system has worked well outside the law, or, at least, without, shall we say, rigid observance of the law; it might be desirable to institute such places and bring them within the law, if they supply a felt want?—Yes.

16,029. And it is quite manifest in your view that some form of nursing homes with notification and inspection supply a felt want?—Yes, undoubtedly.

16,030. And are beneficial both to the patient and the patient's relatives, and are sufficiently safe from the public point of view?—It is the only provision in the lunacy law for which I have known patients feel grateful; the others they complain about; but for a provision of this kind any number of patients have expressed their utmost gratitude to me.

16,031. Miss Madeleine Symons: You would prefer all such homes to be under disinterested management, would you?—I think it is much safer, and there is less possibility of many dangers; but the great Lord Shaftesbury expressed the opinion that proprietary institutions really did good because there was more personal interest taken in them, and therefore the management was improved by the personal interest taken.

Earl Russell: That may be true of the founder of such an institution but not necessarily of his successor.

16,032. Chairman: There is one thing you might just explain. In the forms you have been good enough to supply us with, I am struck with this, that in the case of the Form of Application to the General Board of Control to sanction to reception of a private patient into a private dwelling, apparently one medical certificate is required; that is Form F.2. I turn to Form D., which is the Form of Application to the General Board of Control for Scotland to grant sanction for the residence of a pauper lunatic in a private dwelling specially licensed or otherwise, and there I find that two medical certificates are required. So that a private patient may be received into a private dwelling with the sanction of one medical certificate, while a pauper patient can be received in private dwelling with the sanction of two medical certificates. What is the reason of that?—The reason is that there are three different ways in which a rate-aided patient may be boarded out. He may be boarded out on an order by the Sheriff with two certificates, or on the sanction by the Board of Control on two certificates, or else he can be transferred; that is a new arrangement under the 1913 Act; he can be transferred from an asylum to a private dwelling. There is, however, a fourth way, under this section which you have just referred to, by which one certificate only is required, in exactly the same form as is used for a private patient, but as a matter of practice they never do adopt that plan. There are three other ways of doing it, and the other ways are the ones that are always adopted; but there is nothing to prevent them printing a form relating to pauper patients in exactly the same way as they printed a form relating to private patients; you will see it in the first portion of Section 13.

16,033. Sir Ernest Hiley: Is there any obligation at all to use Form F.1? The title indicates that it is an application to the Board for sanction, and, according to what Dr. Robertson says, there is no necessity to notify the Board, and presumably not to apply for sanction?—It is used after six months.

16,034. Chairman: This does not apply to the reception of people into these nursing homes for six months at all?—No, not at all. After six months you have to use one of those forms.

16,035. Or these may also be used for the initial reception of a patient into a private dwelling under the other provisions of the Act?—Yes.

16,036. Now there are one or two other matters on which I think you can make a contribution to our deliberations. I should like very much to have your views on the question of the employment of female nurses in institutions, because I know you have both experience and views upon that matter. Will you just tell us quite shortly in what the advantages in your view of the employment of female nurses consist and to what extent it has been adopted?—Yes. I have employed them now for nearly thirty years, and the system has been pretty generally employed in Scotland for about 20 to 25 years. In the first place, you are able to get trained hospital nurses, many of them educated women, who also take nursing certificates. You have these people to act as matrons of your asylums, and they introduce medical methods and hospital nursing of the best quality into the asylums.

16,037. Your policy has been to have women matrons at the head of the whole institution, male and female sides alike?—Yes. I first of all started with the female side; now it applies to the whole asylum.

16,038. Is she chief officer, so to speak, under you?—Yes; she is the head of the whole nursing staff, and the domestic staff.

16,039. Male and female?—Yes.

16,040. Is that the case in many of the asylums in Scotland?—Yes, in about half of them.

16,041. Half of them have a lady matron in charge of the whole nursing staff, male and female?—Yes.

16,042. Do you find it desirable also to have assistant matrons under her?—Yes. Then the next step, for the purposes of description, not chronologically, was to have a large number of educated women, with the hospital training and the mental training, in charge of the wards and groups of wards. This is entirely a new class that was not in vogue before at all. For instance, I have 15 of these at Morningside. I introduced them afresh and put them in charge of all these departments, to see that medical ideals and high nursing ideals were carried out.

16,043. These have all had medical training?—Yes.

16,044. Earl Russell: Is that too expensive for English rate-aided institutions?—No, because you are paying the nurses more than we are paying them. Hospital nurses are not paid so much as mental nurses are paid. It is the one reform in mental work which has not added to expense.

16,045. Chairman: Now what about the actual nurses themselves?—After that you have got the mental nurses, the ordinary probationers, and those with certificates; they get promoted to be in charge of wards.

16,046. They do not happen to have had general hospital training?—No.

16,047. They have begun in this career?—Yes. First of all, women were employed in the hospital wards, and, of course, there is no comparison between the nursing done by a woman and that done by a man, especially if the nursing is under skilled direction of a person who has been trained in the best voluntary hospitals. The nursing in our Scottish mental hospitals is just as good as it is in the voluntary hospitals. They were first all put into the hospital wards, and then they were afterwards transferred into other wards, a certain number into other wards, because it was found that a woman had an extraordinary power even over excited patients. An excited man might be very pugnacious and combative with the male attendants; but, with a woman, he had a totally different attitude towards her altogether. An excited patient might be rushing about a room, taking off his coat and throwing it about, and if an attendant said to him, "Put on your coat," he would refuse, and then there might be an attempt to put it on, and there would be a struggle. On the other hand, the nurse would say in a quiet way, "Put on your coat," and the thing is done. It is found that in the case of very excited patients, women have a wonderful control over them, which means that although a man is deranged in mind, it does not necessarily mean that he loses all his faculties and all his intelligence. Then the presence of these women reduces the tendency to roughness. On the female side the female patient usually uses her tongue; but on the male side sometimes there is a tendency to strike, or something of that kind; but the presence of women has reduced this tendency, and it has introduced a totally different atmosphere in the place; and, what is more, a woman can decorate a ward and attend to the comforts of the patients in a way that a man cannot do. It has made asylums totally different places.

16,048. We heard yesterday that the Board of Control for Scotland was certainly in favour of women nurses in what they call the hospital side of institutions?—Yes.

16,049. You go much further. You would have them not only in the hospital department of asylums, but in charge of the ordinary day and night wards?—Yes, and other parts besides the hospital. As a matter of fact, the vast majority of asylums in Scotland carry out the same practice that I have. That was the one piece of evidence that Sir Arthur Rose gave with which I did not altogether agree. I think that the Board of Control approve of women being employed to the utmost extent.

16,050. Earl Russell: There was just one thing that struck me in the order you were giving us. Does not that system close the posts to the ward nurses, if these matrons and assistant matrons all have hospital experience?—No. She can go to a hospital and get her hospital training. The first point is that we are out to benefit our patients, not to benefit the staff.

16,051. That is perfectly true, but obviously if you prevent the opportunity of promotion arising, you do not get the best class of nurse?—That is so.

16,052. Sir David Drummond: Do you select the wards in which the women are nursing?—Every one of my wards has got a woman at the head of it. In the hospital ward they have almost sole charge, with one or two men perhaps to help them.

16,053. But there are certain wards which you would not put into the care of women alone, are there not?—There is no ward in the charge of women absolutely alone; there is always a man there, an attendant; one attendant is quite enough in most of the places.

16,054. Mr. Snell: There is no serious proportion of regrettable incidents?—No, very few.

16,055. It has its influence, even on that side?—It has its influence. Of course there are some patients you cannot possibly put under the charge of women.

(After a short adjournment.)

16,056. Chairman: On the subject of the employment of women, Dr. Robertson, as nurses in asylums, one knows that objections have been taken on various grounds to such employment, perhaps most prominently that much of the nursing is unsuitable to women. On that subject I think you hold the view that women who are doing their work as professional work approach their attendance on the patients from an entirely professional point of view, and that these elements which the layman is apt to dwell upon do not really bulk in their minds?—That is so.

16,057. Do you find that the vocational aspect of it appeals very much to the women's minds?—It does, especially when they are supervised, and the system is originated under the superintendence of hospital nurses who have been accustomed to working amongst male patients.

16,058. Then the class of objection that the work may be unpleasant, or even indecent, does not really appeal to your mind?—No. Arrangements can be made by which that can be minimised in exactly the same way as in the nursing of male patients in a general hospital.

16,059. There are some cases, I suppose, particularly cases of sexual perversion and so on, which may be undesirable for women to handle?—There are undoubtedly cases of that kind, but there is no difficulty whatever in separating that class of case, and having them looked after in other wards.

16,060. And is the value of women's nursing in the case of the great majority of the patients conspicuous in its therapeutic value?—It is most conspicuous.

16,061. Then do you really advocate the introduction of nursing by women as what one might call the general system of nursing in all asylums, treating the nursing by male attendants as really a special provision for particular types of cases? Do you go so far as that?—No, I would not go quite so far as that.

16,062. I would just like to know where you pause in your extension of the system?—One group of cases that for convenience sake is very much better looked after by men—male attendants—are those patients who are able-bodied and able to work; it is much better that they should be looked after by the same attendants who go outside into the gardens and grounds and farm and work with them.

16,063. They are more like foremen in the work?—Yes.

16,064. Earl Russell: Working parties?—Yes; but that class of patient I think might be left to be looked after by male attendants; but in connection with their amusements and entertainments these can still be supervised by women. I think that a woman should be the head of a department that looks after that class. Then there are other wards where the patients are more uncertain, they may perhaps at times be excited, or perhaps impulsively do some act of violence; in these wards there should always be attendants; the majority of them should be male attendants; but even there I think that a woman should be the head of the ward, to see that there is no harshness or roughness of any kind. I think women should be present in every ward, but they are most suitable in the hospital wards, the wards where there are infirm patients, weak-minded patients, quiet patients, or melancholic patients, for instance.

16,065. Can you tell me how in practice men like having a woman over them; do they not resent it at all?—When the system is introduced for the first time the men do not take to it well, especially if they have not been accustomed to it, but after a time it works very successfully. The women who are placed in charge are selected women, and the men treat them with a remarkable degree of respect. I was very much afraid myself, when I first of all introduced a matron on the male side of an asylum, as to how the men would receive her, and I wrote to the Commissioners on the subject, asking whether they thought it was an experiment I might try, and they said, "Yes, try it," and there was no official I ever appointed who was better received than that particular woman, because of herself; she was a tactful woman, and they respected her. The men get accustomed to it in exactly the same way as a woman of means who has a house and has a chauffeur and other men under her.

Professor GEORGE M. ROBERTSON, M.D., F.R.C.P.

16,066. They recognise her competence, too, I suppose?—Yes, they recognise her competence.

16,067. Chairman: Of course, during the war, and indeed I suppose in military hospitals generally, you had the nursing sisters and you had the male orderlies?—Yes.

16,068. And that system seems to work very well?—Yes.

16,069. Earl Russell: Do you allow your men and women patients to associate together for recreation?—There is a weekly dance in practically all asylums.

16,070. I mean in the evenings, to walk about the grounds, to play bridge, and so on?—We have bridge parties. They are allowed to invite patients to one another's wards.

16,071. And you find that has a good effect?—Yes, but they do not mix at large.

16,072. Chairman: It seems to be the consensus of opinion among the resident medical officers of asylums in Scotland that the employment of female nurses is beneficial, because appended to your article from the Edinburgh Medical Journal of March, 1916, of which you have favoured us with a reprint, there is a memorial sent on the 8th March, 1920, to the General Board of Control, which says this: "We, the undersigned, being members of the medical profession, engaged in the care and treatment of the insane in the asylums of Scotland, consider it our duty to bring to the notice of the General Board of Control, the District Boards of Control, and the Boards of the Royal Asylums, our opinion that the nursing and care of male patients, especially of those who are sick and infirm, by female nurses is primarily and essentially a medical question, and that the declared policy of the Union officials to get rid of nurses so employed and replace them by male attendants is a retrograde step against the best interests of the patients, and an interference with the discretionary powers of asylum medical officers. Should any action be taken by the Executive of the Union to give effect to above policy, as has already been done in England, it is our earnest hope that it will be firmly opposed by all authorities responsible under the lunacy laws for the care and treatment of the insane in Scotland." That memorial apparently was signed by 65 persons representing all the resident medical officers of asylums in Scotland?—That is so, yes.

16,073. This project of the increasing employment of women has been opposed, has it not, by the Union of Asylum Workers?—Yes, it is one of the planks in their programme.

16,074. One can appreciate why—because of course the introduction of women will ultimately mean the displacement of a considerable amount of male labour, will it not?—That is one of the reasons, yes.

16,075. Earl Russell: Is it not the only reason?—No. I think one of the reasons they stated was that women make bad trade unionists. Then, of course, they assert that it is improper work for a woman to do. It all depends how it is done. The attempt to introduce women on the male side for nursing purposes has been tried for about 80 years, and for many, many, years the attempt failed, owing to the difficulties; but then the mere fact that the attempt was made over and over again showed that there was some principle underlying it which forced people to attempt it, and in the end the happy solution as to how it should be done was found in Scotland.

16,076. Chairman: Of course, if the interest of the patients, in the opinion of the medical profession, is best subserved by female nursing rather than male nursing, I imagine that no interests of trade unions or anybody else should be permitted to stand in its way, if that be the true view?—That is so. The Board of Management of the Morningside Asylum offered to recognise the union. Our Board is a very strong legal board; there are three K.C.'s on it. We had Sir John Rankine, a professor of law, also a member, and he said: "Trade unions are perfectly legal; in fact, they are encouraged by the Government, therefore we should recognise these trade unions," but the Union stated that they regarded this question not as a medical question, but as an economic one, and that we should put it down. My Board said that they would recognise the union if it did not interfere with female nursing, that that was to be put into the category of medical treatment, and that broke up the union. Then the Union also, I think, saw the District Boards of Control of all the district asylums that had recognised the Union, and put their case before them, but in Scotland the benefits of female nursing are so thoroughly recognised that the District Boards of Control refused to depart from their practice.

16,077. Miss Madeleine Symons: I suppose the women are paid considerably less than the men—which may be one cause for apprehension?—Yes, they are paid slightly less than the men, according to the proportion that the Asylum-Workers' Union recommends itself; but there is really no saving made by the introduction of these methods, because you have a larger number of women, and in Scotland we have introduced a much larger number of hospital nurses, and also a larger night staff. The whole hospital idea which accompanies the introduction of women has entailed a certain increase of expenditure.

16,078. Earl Russell: Is this also true with regard to rate-aided institutions?—Yes.

16,079. They also have larger staffs?—Yes, practically the same.

16,080. Mrs. Mathew: Might we know what is the proportion of nurses to patients?—That varies a very great deal. For instance, at Craig House, amongst private patients there are two nurses to every three patients; and in the nursing homes there are twice as many nurses as there are patients; but among the poorer class of patients there is about one nurse to every eight or so.

16,081. Chairman: Then as to the medical staff at Morningside, how many doctors have you altogether?—There are really altogether, including myself, seven doctors attached to the institution; one of these is a pathologist, and one of these is my deputy.

16,082. Then you have seven doctors there for 800 patients?—Yes.

16,083. It would appear then that both on the medical side and on the nursing side you are very much more amply staffed than the institutions we have been hearing about here?—Yes. Then, in addition to that, I have unpaid medical men who are gaining experience—whom we call clinical assistants; usually two qualified doctors and two unqualified doctors in addition.

16,084. Earl Russell: But they are not actually of much assistance in running the establishment, are they?—They are not much use for the first six weeks, but after that they are of use, and they can do a great many routine medical duties, such as the physical examination of patients, and so on.

16,085. Chairman: You have a couple of young residents, I suppose, just as the doctors in the general infirmary have?—Practically that is so. We have got two, and in recent years a considerable number of these have been women. Women have had great difficulty in getting posts, and they have begged to be taken on, and we have always had several qualified women remaining while they learn the work, and then that enables them to get appointments in other asylums. Of course, there is a great advantage in being so close to a University like Edinburgh.

16,086. Did you find you had actually to displace any of your male nurses who were earning wages with you?—I have never displaced a single person in an asylum to introduce a new method. For instance, just now only one half of the asylums have matrons over both sides; that is because they are waiting till the head attendants on the male side resign.

PROFESSOR GEORGE M. ROBERTSON, M.D., F.R.C.P.

16,087. I could see, of course, that there would be very natural objection to the displacing of male attendants in favour of female attendants, but has the practice been to await resignations or deaths before substituting women?—Yes, the practice has been to await resignations.

16,088. So it has not been a case of individual hardship in any instance; but it is the general principle that you advocate?—Yes, that is so. I have not asked a single person to resign his post.

16,089. I suppose in the end of the day it just comes down to this, that the special qualities of women's natures suit them for the work of nursing in a way which occurs only rarely in a male?—Yes, they must have some fundamental advantage which enables them to do the work better than men.

16,090. And just as most women, I understand, prefer to be treated by male doctors—that has been rather one's experience—so on the other hand every man would rather be nursed by a woman?—Yes, of course that is quite true. Long before female nurses were introduced generally, it was found that occasionally male patients who refused to take their food would take their food from a woman, and a woman would be brought over from the female side to feed the particular patient; in the same way as a female patient will take her food from an assistant doctor when she will not take it from one of the nurses.

16,091. Now let us pass to another matter. You have favoured us also with a pamphlet which contains three papers by you: One on "The Hospitalisation of the Scottish Asylum System"; one on the "Treatment of Mental Excitement in Asylums"; and another on "The Use of Padded Rooms and the Practice of Locking-up Patients by Day in Single Rooms." The question of nursing by women, which you have been dealing with, is of course closely associated with the hospitalisation idea?—Very closely associated.

16,092. Your idea is as far as possible to remove the conception of a place of detention and to substitute the idea of a place of cure?—Yes, to try to introduce the hospital idea, like the great voluntary hospitals, and there is no better way of doing it than by introducing female nurses.

16,093. Not only by reason of the fact of their sympathetic attitude, but also because of the influence which they bring and which permeates the whole establishment?—Yes.

16,094. Which makes it seem less official, I suppose?—More domestic and homely, yes.

16,095. Then certain other features are alluded to by you as indicating progress in the hospitalisation idea. In Scotland I think what is known as an airing court—something like the prison yard in prisons—has been entirely abolished, has it not?—Practically abolished.

16,096. How has it been possible to do that?—Well, the ideal was to have the asylum as little like a prison as possible, and it was discovered first of all by Sir John Sibbald, when he was at the Argyll and Bute Asylum. When one of the walls of his airing court was being taken down for extension, his patients did not escape, and he thought how much better it would be if the patients were not confined in the airing court, but were allowed to walk about the estate in walking parties; and therefore he introduced that system, removed all his airing courts, and since then in practically all the asylums of Scotland there are no airing courts built, but the patients walk about the grounds.

16,097. Attended?—Always attended, except those on parole.

16,098. In that way again you give a greater sense of freedom, of course?—Yes.

16,099. Mr. Mickle: Have you not a number of refractory patients who must get some exercise, and yet cannot be kept in the general grounds?—That, of course, is a question one is asked constantly. I was asked it a fortnight ago by a deputation from England.

16,100. Chairman: And what is the answer?—Well, we are able to take very nearly all the patients out into the grounds. These refractory patients seem to be fewer with us than they are elsewhere, and I attribute that in part to the treatment that they receive.

16,101. Earl Russell: A really refractory and noisy patient you keep in bed as a rule, do you not?—Yes, but we have them in bed usually in the open air, on verandahs.

16,102. Chairman: Does it come to this, that you can give exercise to all the patients in your establishment who require exercise in the grounds at large, with proper supervision and attendance?—Yes, but there are some very acute cases with whom it would be a perpetual struggle to take them round the grounds.

16,103. But you would not have taken these round the airing court either?—No.

16,104. Mr. Mickle: You would not have allowed them out in the airing court?—They are outside in bed, on a verandah. The verandah system, the open-air treatment of the insane, is adopted to a very, very large extent, and the first thing that is done to all our patients is to put them out in the open air. I think that very few people become insane, however strong their hereditary predisposition is, provided that their general health is good. The result is that even if they are subjected to very severe strains, if their general physical health is good they stand it, but if their general physical health is not good, then they break down mentally. They come to us, and we put them out in the open air, which is the best tonic you can have, and the cheapest tonic; and that is the first step to recovery.

16,105. Sir David Drummond: Have you many epileptics?—No, we have very few epileptics in Scotland.

16,106. Can you account for that?—As you go southwards the number of epileptics increases. You have not so many in the North of England as you have in the South.

Earl Russell: Is it a diet question, do you think?

16,107. Chairman: Or climatic?—I do not know what it is.

16,108. That point is important, because if you can do away with the feeling of constraint in the airing courts, and give the impression of liberty to go about in gardens and parks under attendants, you foster the idea of the place being a hospital rather than a place of detention?—Yes.

16,109. And it is a fact that all those patients who formerly would have been exercised in airing courts are now exercised in the open grounds of your institution?—Yes, practically all. There is some good in an airing court for particular cases, but the airing court system is a bad system.

16,110. As a system?—Yes.

16,111. Have you any airing court at all at Morningside?—I have one small piece of ground of about a quarter of an acre, which is enclosed, which might be regarded by some as an airing court.

16,112. Is it used to any extent by you?—It is very seldom used as an airing court. It has a verandah in it, and there are patients out in the air occasionally.

16,113. What type of patient do you put there?—They are restless and excited patients. For example, say it is a female patient; a patient who may suddenly denude herself and rush somewhere—this is a sort of enclosed space where no one would see that.

16,114. It really comes to this, then, that for the ordinary purposes of exercising patients there should not be airing courts at all?—That is so.

16,115. But you may need to have a part of your grounds set apart and enclosed for special cases which present difficulty?—Yes. The system is a bad one, although the individual airing court may be good.

18 April, 1925.]

Professor GEORGE M. ROBERTSON, M.D., F.R.C.P.

16,116. Then I think, further, another step in the same direction has been achieved in the introduction of the open-door system?—Yes.

16,117. Is that to free people from the sense of constraint by locked doors and keys?—Yes. Of course there also have been people who have tried to work the whole asylum without locked doors, but now the majority of doors are locked. There are, however, a certain number of convalescent wards and villas and so on which have no locked doors at all.

16,118. And is there promotion, in your establishment, from places of greater to places of less restraint?—Yes, and the patients get parole—freedom to walk about the grounds as they please, and then afterwards parole to go into the town.

16,119. But you cannot altogether dispense with some locked rooms or locked wards?—I think you cannot altogether, without putting a tremendous strain upon the staff. The doors would require to be watched to see that the patients did not go out of them, and I consider that that is an unnecessary thing to do; so that a certain number of the wards have locked doors; but there is no patient in the asylum locked up in a single room.

16,120. We will come to that later; but the open door system generally is the system which favours as much freedom as possible, and as little closing and locking of doors?—Yes.

16,121. Then another point is the practical abolition of the padded room and the solitary confinement room?—Yes.

16,122. Upon that I think your experience in Scotland, and particularly in your own institution seems very remarkable. I gather that you have not got any padded rooms at Morningside?—No. There is one room which has not been dismantled, which is full of old furniture and things of that kind.

16,123. But it is not in any use?—There is no place in use, no.

16,124. Have you none of those rooms, which all of us have seen in asylums, either a padded room or a room with nothing but a mattress on the floor of it, and a high-up window and a door that can be locked?—There are no rooms of that kind. There are rooms which a patient can be put into, and a shutter put up, but every one of the rooms has got a handle on the door inside, and they are not locked up in the room.

16,125. By day or by night?—By day or by night, yes.

16,126. So that may I take it in your institution no patient is ever locked in a room himself alone, either by day or by night?—There is no locked seclusion at all.

16,127. Earl Russell: What would you do with a patient who is extremely violent, and trying to knock her head about and likely to do herself a serious injury?—There is no person I have seen for the last twenty years who has been trying to do that, except for five minutes. I had a melancholic patient who ran his head against a stone wall and tried to batter down the wall. That was done impulsively, but it was done and over. I have, however, never seen a patient carry the thing on for any length of time. There are patients, of course, who say that they will commit suicide. These are looked after by the staff, as they are in all places. We have in Scotland a very large night staff, and these patients are put under special observation at night, perhaps with a special attendant.

16,128. That is rather the point I was coming to. You have to watch them all the time?—Yes, we do.

16,129. I am thinking of a patient I saw the other day, in a padded room, who was prepared to commit suicide if given the opportunity then and there, by jumping out of the window; that means a considerable increase in the number of attendants?—I would not say considerable, but it certainly means an increase in the number of attendants. The whole method of progress consists in this, and 100 years ago all the restraint that was employed was used because they had one attendant for from 30 to 50 patients; they had to tie up all the patients, use chains and lock them up; now we are gradually increasing the number of staff. Up till about 1837 very large numbers of patients were restrained in mechanical apparatus. They increased the staff and did away with the mechanical restraint, but Conolly, who was one of those who gave up restraint, introduced the secluded room. Now we have done away with the secluded room in Scotland by having some more staff, a still larger staff. Then we find that as you go on using these methods of care the patients gradually become quieter and quieter, and there is less and less of this sort of thing required.

16,130. Would you make the same objection to the use of hyoscine?—No. I would not. I would object to hyoscine being used continuously.

16,131. That is a form of chemical restraint, is it not?—Yes, it is. Hyoscine should never be used continuously, but it is exceedingly valuable in cases of emergency. Supposing a man has a tremendous outburst: you can give him an injection of hyoscine and control him, and then, if he is treated properly, two or three hours afterwards, when he begins to wake up, he is quite different. It overcomes an emergency.

16,132. You would not give him a daily dose or two doses a day for a week?—I would not say that in an exceptional case I would not do that, but I scarcely recollect having done it. I think that would be quite legitimate in certain cases.

16,133. Chairman: I think you put it in very well-considered language in one of the addresses I have here. It is on page 3 of the second paper, "Treatment of Mental Excitement." You say: "I intend, in the first place, to refer briefly to the treatment of mental excitement, which is a direct symptom of such diseases as acute mania, agitated melancholia, and delirious insanity. In these diseases sedative drugs are often employed, and as their use is condemned by some, the advantages and disadvantages of their employment may be mentioned. It is admitted by all that their employment is undesirable, and that when used for their sedative effects, it is on the principle of the choice of the lesser evil. It is also admitted that they are liable to abuse, that they should never be given at the will of nurses or attendants, and that their effects should always be supervised by medical men. They should never be administered in increasing doses with the object of completely controlling all signs of excitement, but they should be used merely to tone down the symptoms within manageable or safe limits, and they should only be administered for short periods to tide over a dangerous or acute exacerbation. With these precautions I have not hesitated to employ sedatives, but there are some who totally abstain from doing so. It appears to me that the toxic theory of the causation of insanity which is now being so widely accepted does not support a policy of abstention, for if there be a circulation in the blood of toxic agents acting injuriously on the brain, surely it is in accord with the fundamental principles and practice of medicine to administer an antidote, either chemical or pharmacological." I should think that that probably represents your considered opinion in the matter?—Yes.

16,134. Earl Russell: A sedative is not an antidote, surely, is it?—If the excitement is caused by poison in the blood, it is an antidote. For instance, if you have a person suffering from excitement caused by an overdose of strychnine, and has convulsions, you give him chloral.

16,135. What I expect you mean is that it is better to use even a strong sedative like hyoscine than to have anything like a physical wrestling with a patient?—Yes, but not to give that as a daily dose.

16,136. Not merely to give it in order to save trouble to the attendants?—No.

18 April, 1925.]

Professor GEORGE M. ROBERTSON, M.D., F.R.C.P.

16,137. Chairman: That is the proper use of drugs in the treatment of excitement. Do you also commend the use of baths as a calnative?—Yes.

16,138. And also rest in bed?—Yes. There was a great discussion about the usefulness of rest in bed about 30 years ago. It was really introduced by the French—"alitement," they call it. There was great opposition shown to it at first, but it is shown now that when a patient is put into bed he naturally becomes restful and quietened; he is without his clothes; he is not irritated; there are not people interfering with him, nor can he disturb others, so that it is a very useful method of treating a patient.

16,139. But coming back to the hospitalisation conception, of course the padded room and the secluded room are features quite foreign to the idea of a general hospital; you do not have them there at all. It is all in the same line of development, that you have succeeded in eliminating them from your mental hospitals?—Yes.

16,140. And you have been able to do that, as far as I can see, for two reasons: first of all by substituting attendance for seclusion—that is the first thing?—Yes.

16,141. And then by finding that when you did away with the seclusion and the restraint the occasion for it seemed also, oddly enough, to diminish?—Yes.

16,142. So that it does not mean you have the same volume of restlessness and the violence to contend with, because the very abolition of the means taker to restrain them seems to have reduced the occurrence of such symptoms?—Yes.

16,143. Earl Russell: To some extent you treat them on the same principle that a man gentles a horse?—Yes. Once a German came round the asylum at Stirling, and he asked me if I used baths for excited patients. In Germany they have a great number of baths, and pictures painted on the ceilings, so that patients can look at them. I said, "No, we use them very seldom." He went round the place, and he said, "I see now why you do not have baths. You have not got any excited patients."

16,144. Chairman: There is one sentence which seems to me to sum up this position in a word or two. It is in the paper on the "Treatment of Mental Excitement in Asylums," page 2: "There is no doubt that the better treatment given nowadays to cases of acute mania, as compared with the past, is the chief reason why the disease now appears to be of a milder type than in the past." You have found, have you, in your experience, that there is less excitement and less violence and less noise among the inmates of your institution as time has gone on, and these methods which you have mentioned have been adopted?—That has been my experience, and the experience of everyone, that the amount of excitement—acute excitement—is less than it used to be.

16,145. Now on that, in the second and third papers included in this pamphlet, you deal with the causation of irritation in mental cases. Is a great deal of the violence, where it does occur, due to the fact that the patient is suffering from some form of irritation?—Undoubtedly a great deal of the excitement is due to some cause.

16,146. It may be antipathy to a particular attendant, or it may be difficult to find what is the exciting cause, but I suppose when you have accessions of rage or noise or excitement on the part of the patient it must be attributable to some cause, if you can find it?—Yes, that is so. If you take the trouble to investigate—and it is not very difficult to investigate—you will probably find it traced to some cause. For instance, a female patient may be excited and angry because another has a new dress, and she has not got one.

16,147. Earl Russell: That which is insane is not necessarily causeless, for that reason?—No.

16,148. Chairman: Will you just develop that point, Dr. Robertson?—I think that a failure on the part of nurses and doctors as well in the past was that if a patient were excited they regarded that merely as a symptom of the disease, to be treated by drugs or in some such way. But after observation, I came to the conclusion that a great many of these cases of excitement were due to some form of irritation the patient had received—if one would only take the pains to find out what it was.

16,149. And they may be abnormally susceptible to trivial causes, which may cause excitement, just because they are in an abnormal condition?—Yes; many of these patients are excitable, and with quite innocent causes too,—things that any person might do without any intention of doing harm.

16,150. If you have sympathetic attendants and good medical men in charge, should it not be their business to try to find out in each case what is the cause of the disturbance, where disturbance takes place?—They do do it. Possibly they do not do it as much as they might, but certainly that should be a part of their duties, to try and find out and to remove all the causes of the excitement.

16,151. And in that way you would be able to eliminate the element of disturbance which you have at present in the asylums, or at least to modify it?—Yes.

16,152. I wish you would give us one or two illustrations within your experience of instances in which the cause of irritation has been discovered, and, when removed, the disturbance has ceased?—For example, one of my assistants found some three or four nurses holding a patient and struggling with her—struggling violently. He went up to find out exactly what was happening, and he was able to discover from the remarks the patient had made that she thought that the gas had been turned on—the gas taps in the house—and that there was a danger of an explosion.

16,153. That is what the patient imagined?—Yes, and the patient imagined that she was in her own house. The doctor very sensibly said, "I will take a look round and see the gas taps." He went away for a minute or two, and came back and told her the gas taps were all right; he had turned them all off. She at once got quiet and lay down, and there was no more trouble.

16,154. That was a method of humouring the case, whereas if you had simply contradicted her you might have got a further access of fury, I suppose?—Yes. Again there are persons who would say, "This is an insane idea which the woman has," or they might have gone on holding her, and she might have gone on struggling, and in some cases they might have put her in a padded room. That is a case where a little sympathy is better than using drugs and restraint.

16,155. Earl Russell: She was struggling for the perfectly rational reason that she thought she was going to be blown up?—Yes. It has been said, of course, that insanity is proper reasoning from false premises.

16,156. Chairman: Supposing a child said, there was a bogey coming in at the door: the mother would go and look; she probably would not smack the child; having looked, she would say, "It is all right," and the child would probably fall asleep?—Exactly. For instance, I remember that in the case of a demented patient it was discovered that her teeth were bad, and after investigation was made we found that the patient was excited and disturbed and irritable as a result of tooth-ache or neuralgia. The teeth were attended to, and this excited, troublesome patient, after that became perfectly quiet. I remember another instance in which a patient was very noisy at night, and the night superintendent went round one night—they usually go round with sweets and biscuits about them, to give to any patient—and she gave this patient a biscuit, and thought she ate it rather ravenously. She gave her some more, and the patient was quiet, and from that time onwards that patient got biscuits at night, and she was always quiet after that. Apparently for some reason she was hungry at night and restless and could not sleep.

16,157. These are instances of the study of the idiosyncrasies of the particular patients, humouring them, and so avoiding these scenes which one hears of at times?—Yes.

16,158. Surely there must be room for the development and improvement of treatment along those lines?—I think there is no doubt about that.

16,159. And is it because you have been working along those lines that your happy experience has been a diminution of violence in your institution?—Yes, and because I have had such a well-trained staff under me, who are interested in these subjects.

16,160. Take the case you have been describing. If that case had not received sympathetic treatment, then I suppose there would have been more struggling, and then restraint, and restrained struggling produces still more violent efforts, and the case would have been a padded room case before the day was over?—Yes, and all regarded as due to the disease.

16,161. Whereas it would have been really due to unskilful or unwise treatment of the case, or at least unsympathetic treatment of the case—want of insight into the case?—Yes.

16,162. I see you refer to the phrase, which sometimes one hears, of "the asylum-made lunatic." It may well be that treatment along the lines which are lacking in insight and sympathy tends to exacerbate rather than cure a patient. May not that be so?—Yes, I think so. Of course, I think the phrase is abused.

16,163. After all, if one may use a homely simile; a dog that is always tied up by a chain is a much fiercer dog than one running about the place?—About 35 years ago there was an illustration of this in a comic paper, and I cut it out and sent it to the Commissioners in Lunacy.

16,164. The mere imposition of restraint is one of the things which is felt to be most galling by the patient?—Yes.

16,165. And in turn may produce the irritation which you find?—Yes. Of course, this must be remembered, that with regard to all these things, although evil in the bulk, there is something to be said for every one of them. I mean the airing court, for example, has certain advantages. The padded room, in a few cases, may have advantages. Restraint, in special cases, may have advantages, and it is used not uncommonly in what we call surgical restraint, where a person suffers from a surgical injury, and would injure himself if he got a chance.

16,166. Mr. Micklem: How did you deal with the lady who objected to the other one's dress?—It is very difficult, because if you had given a new dress to her, there would have been another two who wished new dresses.

16,167. Chairman: How did you deal with her? It might be useful for some of us to know how to deal with such a case.—The answer is that you must not deal with two cases alike. You have to think out the individual case, and how to deal with it, and act accordingly. No two people are dealt with alike.

16,168. I suppose you would deal with it on the principle of what Dr. Chalmers called "the expulsive power of new affection," and try to distract the attention of the person to some other interest?

16,169. Earl Russell: I should like to go back to the judicial authority. Just let me outline to you the procedure that takes place in the case of pauper patients in one of the London workhouses. The magistrate attends there and he sees the patient, either in bed, or the patient is brought in. He has a look at him, asks him if he wants to say anything, and then the patient is taken away again. There is no excitement, and no prolonged examination. He sees the certificate before him, he sees the relieving officer, and hears from him such particulars of the case as he has been able to get, and sees any of the relations who choose to turn up. Not until he has gone into all those things does he sign the order. Do not you think that that affords some little protection and assistance, both to the patient and to the friends?—I think it is most excellent in these respects.

16,170. I mean it is neither upsetting to the patient, nor is it a farce.—No, I think it is a very thorough system, only I would wish it to be not a judicial authority.

16,171. You mean you would rather it was a person not a magistrate?—Yes.

16,172. But some outside person?—Yes, I certainly think there should be another person.

16,173. Is the reason you object to the magistrate the association with the police court?—Yes. Treatment should have as little to do with that sort of thing as possible.

16,174. What is your view about the administration of aperients in asylums, and particularly about croton oil?—Certainly it is absolutely necessary to attend to the state of the bowels; there is no doubt whatsoever about that; and great amelioration of the symptoms very often results from careful attention to the bowels and the liver. What aperients you use, of course, have to be determined by reference to the patient you are attending to, and usually one adopts what the patient himself or herself has been accustomed to.

16,175. You would not be in favour of a standardised weekly dose being administered to a whole ward in line?—No.

16,176. That is the practice in some places, you know?—I know it is done.

16,177. It is not really medical treatment?—No. Then with regard to croton oil, of course, croton oil has its use. One of the members of my Board was going round the asylum the other day, and we passed the dispensary, and the dispenser was in. Just by way of a joke, I asked her: "How often have you dispensed croton oil?" and she said, "Once; I have been here five years, and I have dispensed it once." I remember ordering it in one of the nursing homes in another case; and there are cases where croton oil is the best remedy to use. (When a person is unconscious, you can take a drop of croton oil and a drop of glycerine, put it in the back of the throat, and it will have effect when there is almost no other purgative that you can give. As a purgative used legitimately it has its uses.)

16,178. But you think once a year would be the sort of limit?—Yes, and it is in only one or two cases where it is required.

16,179. 5,000 doses in a year in any asylum of 2,000 patients you would think rather remarkable?—Yes.

16,180. There is only one other question I want to put to you, but it is a very big one. What is your view about the sterilization of lunatics, if you are going to let them out at large?—I think it is a horrible idea altogether.

16,181. You would be entirely opposed to it?—Most certainly.

16,182. Do not you believe that lunacy is hereditary?—Yes. I think too much is made of heredity. I would educate the public as regards marriage, by advising a person who has got nervous disease in the family to make a point of marrying into another family in which there is no nervous disease.

16,183. That is a long way to go in the education of the general public, is it not?—If you are not in too great a hurry, I think that some day or other that will be reached.

16,184. A generation or two, at least?—I have been consulted very frequently about the marriages of people—the better educated classes.

16,185. But what about 90 per cent. of the population?—With regard to them, of course, there may be a difficulty.

16,186. Sir David Drummond: Have they taken your advice, doctor?—No, they have not always taken my advice; that relieves the responsibility very greatly.

18 April, 1925.]

Professor GEORGE M. ROBERTSON, M.D., F.R.C.P.

16,187. Earl Russell: In any case you would be completely opposed to compulsory sterilization?—I would.

16,188. Would you say on what ground?—You talk about interfering with the liberty of the subject; you are interfering with something just as important as the liberty of the subject; and I do not think any doctor would be justified in doing an action of that kind. I have known of it being done. I have known patients with religious scruples asking to have the thing done, and I have known it done, but I myself have dismissed it absolutely from my conception as a practical measure at all; and much of the harm that is done by heredity is cured by nature itself, because the vast majority of the persons who inherit a very strong tendency to insanity become insane before the ages at which they marry—before 25 years of age.

16,189. That does not apply so much to the feeble-minded cases, does it?—No; feeble-minded cases are a difficulty; I would segregate them.

16,190. Chairman: Just on that question, I know that in connection with the administration of the criminal law considerable difficulty arises in this way, that if you let out patients on parole or probation, or if they escape and are not followed up, you are very liable to have attempted suicides and so on taking place, which creates one of the difficulties in giving the freedom which it is so desirable to give at as early a moment as possible. The tendency to commit suicide?

16,191. On the one hand there is the desire to let the people regain their freedom as soon as possible, and on the other hand the risks attendant upon it, that they may do foolish things, or even criminal things?—Yes; well, of course, that has to be considered by the superintendent before he discharges a patient. If he thinks there is a strong probability that the patient will do these things, then he will not discharge him. On the other hand, if he thinks the possibility is a very remote one, then he just takes the risk.

16,192. Then apart altogether from anything criminal, if a patient is sent home on parole, not completely recovered yet, but if sent home, be it a man or a woman, it is very liable that sexual relations may be established?—Yes.

16,193. And not always with the most desirable results, I should imagine?—That is so.

16,194. You cannot ensure that such will not take place?—No, you cannot, and of course in such cases as these one has to do one's level best with the patient and with the wife and with both of them in the matter. We may avoid sending patients out on probation; it is within the discretion of the doctor—probation or pass—if there is a danger of that kind, but of course I have known of it being done.

16,195. Earl Russell: Are there not a considerable number of women detained in asylums, who need not be detained if you were sure they would not breed?—No, I do not think there are many detained for that reason—any more than a man is detained because he would go and get drunk.

16,196. Chairman: I really think we have covered all the ground that you have put before us in your précis and in your papers. If there is anything else you would like to bring before our notice, that we have not touched upon, we should be very glad to hear you upon it.—I do not think I have anything to add.

16,197. Mr. Micklem: If I understand you rightly, Dr. Robertson, you think that the padded room or seclusion, may in some very special instances be useful and possibly necessary, but, speaking generally, unnecessary in an asylum at all?—Yes.

16,198. What I want to put to you is this. In the little experience I have of asylums there are padded rooms to be found in all of them, and seclusion rooms. Do you find a substitute for those by putting the patient to bed and giving him a sedative?—Not necessarily. There are excitable patients who are put to bed, and there are excitable patients who get sedatives; so there are also in these asylums which have padded rooms; as a matter of fact in my asylum, and in a great many other asylums—for instance, the Woodilee Asylum, one of the largest in Scotland, which has been established for more than 40 years—there is no padded room.

16,199. Chairman: What do you do, without it?—Probably put the patients to bed, have them out in the open air, and have an attendant in charge of them, and they might have sedatives.

16,200. Mr. Micklem: Usually it would be hospital treatment instead?—Yes, and personal attention—the patient would have a special attendant.

16,201. Chairman: And you would put them some times in a room by themselves?—Yes. If it were found to be unmanageable to have him outside, he might be put in a room by himself, with an attendant either there or at hand.

16,202. Mr. Micklem: As far as you could, you would treat those cases in the open air, I understand?—Yes, as far as possible, during the day time. No person would be locked up in a room with nobody near him; he might be put into a room and have some person keeping observation upon him.

16,203. Chairman: It would not be one of those rooms with merely a mattress on the floor?—No, the room would be an ordinary bedroom.

16,204. Mr. Micklem: It seems to me very largely a question of attendance; it is a question of expending money, really?—Yes, you have to increase the number of attendants, and also the number of the night staff. The greatest number of these people are put into these rooms because there is an inadequate night staff. They are well looked after during the day, and during the night time there is a small staff. How are they to be looked after? They are put into single rooms and locked up. That is not the best way of looking after them.

16,205. Chairman: You give a striking example on page 2 of your paper: "On one occasion I ordered an adolescent girl to be placed in the padded room. For several days afterwards when I visited her I received tales of her excitement and violence, and the number of nurses it took to control her when she was fed, washed, etc., so that any suggestion of mine for her removal from the padded room was instantly set aside as a demonstrated impossibility. One of the nurses, however, came to me privately, and under promise of secrecy told me I was being systematically deceived by exaggerated reports, and that there was nothing to prevent the girl leaving the padded room. This was a lesson on the weakness of human nature where selfish interests are involved that I have never forgotten. So fully realised, however, is the danger of abusing this form of treatment that the authorities most properly compel us to keep a written record of it in our registers." That was a case where it was much easier just to put the patient into the padded room, rather than to give the individual care and attention that the case should have got?—That was brought home to me very impressively. I went from one asylum to another where there was no padded room, and I found a totally different set of ideas among the staff. In the one asylum, when the patient became excited, the padded room was suggested; in the other asylum, all sorts of expedients were tried to get over the difficulty. You have got to use your brains, instead of simply putting the person into the padded room. Supposing you have a maniacal girl, very restless and excited, singing and shouting; if at night you put that person into a room and lock the door, it becomes dark, she rushes about, denudes herself, soils herself, sings and shouts and hammers on the wall, and you are undoing during the night time all that has been done during the day time—a sort of Penelope's web.

16,206. I am rather struck with this aspect of it: the patient goes into an institution for the first time, possibly an intelligent case, highly strung and unbalanced and upset. May it not often happen that that patient, being brought for the first time into the atmosphere of an asylum, and seeing other cases afflicted in the same way, may find it very upsetting?—It might be upsetting if she is put amongst any class of patients, who are noisy and violent. In many of the hospitals that have been built in Scotland they have had a special set of receiving rooms provided, where a new patient is, as it were, broken in to the idea of being in the asylum, and is kept apart from the other patients; but as a general rule the condition of the patient is seen at first, and she is placed among a group of patients who are more or less in the same condition.

18 April, 1925.]

Professor GEORGE M. ROBERTSON, M.D., F.R.C.P.

16,207. Then you would not allow the putting of a highly-strung, nervous person into a room or ward where she would hear unpleasant sounds, noises and shouts and so on, would you?—No.

16,208. I can imagine that that would be most detrimental?—Yes, it would upset the patient very greatly.

16,209. Do you in practice see that such cases are not exposed to those distressing circumstances?—Yes. Whenever a patient comes, it is always considered what part of the institution she should be placed in, and we have for the melancholic, sensible, quiet patients, for instance, a particular place.

16,210. Classification from the outset?—Yes. You have a very good idea, just by seeing the patient, and of course you have certain reports regarding the patient when she comes in, and we like to have a relative come, always, to give us a history of the case.

16,211. One has read of distressing cases of people who have gone in and who have been very much terrified and frightened at first, and had restless nights, because they heard in adjoining rooms people crying out and so on. Even to a sane person, that is depressing, but to a mentally afflicted person it may be the worst thing of all?—It may be upsetting at first, if precautions are not taken.

16,212. You agree that precautions ought to be taken to see that patients are not exposed to those surroundings?—Yes. There is no question that classification of patients in an asylum is a very important item, and the best classification can be had in the larger institutions. Where you have a small institution, with only about 12 or 14 patients, you have only one or two places to put the patients into. If you have a larger institution where you have 20 places, with the patients all classified, the result is you have a better opportunity of putting the person in the exact surroundings that suit him.

16,213. Miss Symons: On almost the same point, where you have to separate a noisy patient, not in seclusion, but in a private room, do you find that the institution is so constructed that the noise cannot be heard elsewhere?—As far as possible.

16,214. We have all noticed that in some cases.—Noise is one of the greatest difficulties in an asylum, after introducing all these hospital ideas. I mention it in this report; that is one of the greatest troubles. Most modern institutions have been built with quarters where a noisy patient can be placed so as not to disturb the others, and we have not reached finality in that ourselves. Only last week I was discussing with the matron and my deputy how we could provide a detached building where a noisy patient could be placed; but to separate a noisy person is a very important point.

16,215. Sir David Drummond: How can you obviate that in private homes?—We do not take any noisy patients in private homes. If a patient becomes very noisy in one of these private homes, then he is unsuitable for the homes, and we have him put into an asylum.

16,216. At once?—Oh, yes. Homes might be built where you could put in these noisy persons, but none of the homes we have can take in a very noisy patient.

16,217. In the case of a home that can accommodate 10 or 12 patients, even by raising the voice you would hear it all over the house; it is not necessarily a very noisy patient that would disturb the others?—These 10 or 12 patients do not disturb each other. Then with regard to the poor people, these psychopathic hospitals should be substituted to take the place of these homes, and observation hospitals for the poor should be established, where voluntary patients could come in. At Morningside we have proposed to have a detached building where the rate-aided patients can come without coming into an asylum, i.e., a psychopathic hospital.

16,218. Miss Symons: In the parishes where they do pay for voluntary rate-aided patients, how do they decide where they shall be sent—on a doctor's certificate?—Their own doctor—not the certificate.

16,219. The doctor's advice, I mean?—Their own parochial doctor recommends that the patient should have this treatment.

16,220. There is no difficulty about that? The patients who need it get it, in so far as the parish has voluntary boarders at all?—It has not developed very far, but the whole machinery is there. Supposing a patient becomes melancholic: the inspector of poor is informed; he calls a parochial doctor, who sees the patient and who says: "This is a suitable case for a voluntary patient," and he gets his voluntary treatment.

16,221. And that is developing all the time?—Yes.

16,222. Just one small point, following up a question Lord Russell asked about drugs. Do you ever find it necessary to administer drugs or aperients or sedatives in food?—That has been done occasionally. It is to be avoided as much as possible, but it has been done occasionally. Of course, you are faced with a practical difficulty. There is the patient, and the patient is in a state of great excitement, noisy, and so on, and requires a sedative. How is it going to be given? It is sometimes done.

16,223. In fact, you would say about it what you said about the airing courts and padded rooms?—Yes; in all things evil there is some good.

16,224. In Scotland do you get many, or any, children or young people in your asylums, or are the children who require treatment dealt with under the Mental Deficiency Act?—We do not have many at the present time. During the war we had a number, as they are only just now providing institutions for defectives in Scotland; we have a small number.

16,225. Would that cover all the children who might need treatment, or are there certain cases of abnormality in children which is not actually mental deficiency?—If there is something in addition to the mental deficiency, there is nothing to prevent them from being sent to an asylum, and they benefit very much by being sent to an asylum, because all the women there mother them; they like to see the small children; and they have a very good time when they come, but they only come in small numbers.

16,226. Sir David Drummond: I would like to hear you, Dr. Robertson, upon the question of the superintendent's duties, and the desirability of exercising both administrative and medical functions. What do you think about that?—I certainly think that the medical superintendent should be the head of the whole institution. If you have divided authority you almost invariably have friction, and what is more, as a general rule, the medical man plays second fiddle, because other persons have got the control of the material, furniture and food, and so on, and they can annoy the medical man in a great many different ways. It has been tried in this country, and has not been successful. It is adopted in France, and there the doctors object to it very decidedly. It was a most unpleasant experience to me to go to the asylum at Charenton and see the doctor describing some of the cases, and to have at his side the lay superintendent, who really was the "boss" of the place.

16,227. Can the superintendent of asylums such as we know here, of 2,000 patients, exercise his professional functions?—It is quite certain that, although he is the head of the place, all these duties should be performed by competent heads of departments.

18 April, 1925.]

Professor GEORGE M. ROBERTSON, M.D., F.R.C.P.

16,228. He delegates the work to other people?—I would not even say it is delegated. These persons are appointed to do these special duties, like a house steward. I do not say that I have delegated my duties of book-keeping and cashier work, or the farm work, to these people. These people are appointed to do the work of their department, but if any of them neglect the work of their department, then I would feel it my duty to report them to my Board.

16,229. Then you contend that you yourself are able to give sufficient time to your patients, and yet carry out your administrative duties?—I give sufficient time to my patients, but I have to look after these individuals and see that they are attending to their business.

16,230. Sir Ernest Hiley: Just following that up, doctor, can you give individual attention to each of the patients?—No, I cannot give individual attention to each of the patients.

16,231. Sir David Drummond: I thought you said you could?—I mean not in the fullest sense. With the development of psychiatry now, each patient requires a very great deal of personal attention, but that part of the work can be done with qualified assistants. All my assistants have made up their minds to go in for mental work as their life work. They come there with that promise or intention, and they are well trained, and they become ultimately superintendents of asylums; each one has his department, and he looks after the patients in that department, and I supervise the whole work and advise about the different patients. Any difficulties they have they bring to me, and I solve them as far as I can.

16,232. Sir Ernest Hiley: But even in your small and very well equipped institution you cannot give individual attention to each patient?—Why should I give individual attention to each patient, I mean in the way of ordering purgatives and things of that kind, when there are medical men looking after these individual patients?

16,233. I was not thinking so much about that. I want to go to the end. It is on your recommendation that a patient is discharged?—Yes.

16,234. Can you give enough attention to the patient to be able to make a proper recommendation at the end?—Yes. The majority of these cases are really very, very simple. In a difficult case one has to give more time to it, but in other cases, with the assistance of the medical officer, one does not have much difficulty in deciding.

16,235. Do you think it is possible in an institution such as we have here, of over 2,500 patients, and with even a smaller staff than you have for your 800, that the patients can get that individual attention which would ensure the medical superintendent being able to make a proper recommendation for discharge or for further detention?—Of course, it is quite certain that the smaller the place is the more individual attention you can give; and I should fancy that even in a large institution (we have no institutions larger than 1,000 in Scotland) a doctor, with expert assistants, could give an opinion, but certainly not such a good opinion or as reliable an opinion in all cases as he could if it were a smaller institution.

16,236. Just to leave that, and to go back to the point the Chairman mentioned in your paper on the padded room, was that an instance of bullying on the part of the attendant?—No, it was merely, I think, to escape having a troublesome duty to perform.

16,237. You have had a very wide experience: have you come across many cases of ill-treatment of patients?—I will not say many, but I have come across a certain number.

16,238. Do you consider they are a frequent occurrence?—To say frequent is very difficult if one is not to say the wrong thing; but every now and then there is an incident of the kind that may occur. I found with regard to that a very important matter, and it is this: I have known of superintendents who dealt very severely with any case that occurred, dismissing the attendant, and so on; but I have found, just as has been found in penology, that the certainty of discovery is far more effective in preventing these things than occasional severity, when the majority of instances are not discovered. That is the reason why I have such a large supervisory staff; they are everywhere, and I can depend upon these people reporting things to me, but every now and again an incident of that kind occurs.

16,239. Then it is not wrong to attribute that sort of treatment to accident rather than to anything like habitual practice?—No, it is not, and in the vast majority of instances it is not done out of any wickedness at all, but it is just done out of irritability, or being out of sorts; it is just human nature. Many of these people enjoy a rough and tumble. Even sane people of that class very quickly use their fists and their hands, and think nothing about it. I remember one patient at the Stirling Asylum. There was a tremendous row and tussle, and he received a black eye and some bruises and so on. He had been a soldier; I made a long inquiry into the matter, and was rather distressed about it. The patient said to me it was the best day he had ever had in the asylum; the only complaint he had was that there were three of them to one man.

16,240. Chairman: There is one point I would like to bring out, doctor, on the questions recently addressed to you. I suppose one may take it that the great bulk of the population in the asylum consists of cases that do not require any special medical attention?—Yes.

16,241. The majority have been diagnosed and put in their proper category, and after that their treatment becomes more or less routine?—Yes, that is so.

16,242. And therefore you may safely relegate those cases to the matron and to your subordinates?—Yes.

16,243. But the cases that are recoverable, and which are recovering, and which merit, therefore, special attention, are at any given moment, I suppose, relatively few?—Yes.

16,244. Do you find that you have time to attend to those cases, and are they brought to your knowledge?—Yes.

16,245. You must be a very busy man, doctor, because you are not only Superintendent of this Institution, but you are also a University Professor, and you have, I know, other functions as well. You have these houses to attend to, and so on?—Yes.

16,246. Do you find that your mind is distracted or diverted from your purely medical work as the head of a great psychiatric institution by the cares of the household?—Not by the cares of the household; I delegate these to the matron; and as regards clothing and feeding and furnishings and other matters, to the house steward.

16,247. Is it only in matters of principle that you have to interfere?—Only in matters of principle.

16,248. Therefore when you have decided a question of principle, you can leave it to your subordinates to carry it out?—Yes. I do not care a twopenny bit what wallpaper they put up, for instance.

16,249. I am not so sure, doctor. The psychological effect of a wallpaper has some influence upon some people?—What we do is to put up another one.

16,250. What I mean is this. I am thinking of your day's work, so to speak, and the different proportions in which your fund of attention is occupied; we each have only a certain fund of attention, and the question is how it is occupied in the 24 hours. Do you find that you may safely relegate all these small matters of detail to others?—It has to be done with discretion, and I find I can with the staff that I have. I also find this, that the variety of interests that I have, I think, really are a stimulus, and broaden one's views on matters. For instance, all the different methods of dealing with insane persons that I have had experience of, and in dealing with rich people and with poor people, have broadened my views very, very greatly, and given me many ideas.

16,251. Yes, but I mean the work of administration has not been pursued by you to the detriment of your proper medical work?—No. I think I have deputed more of that sort of work to these officials.

16,252. Sir David Drummond: As a matter of fact, how often do you see the patients?—Every day I go to the Institution; I do not see all the patients every day.

16,253. How often do you see all the patients?—Perhaps once in a week, most of them.

16,254. Sir Ernest Hiley: Do you have a daily report on each case?—No, not on each case.

16,255. Not a written report?—No. There are written reports for all the cases. Each individual doctor in charge of his ward has written reports of all his cases, but he reports the principal cases to me.

16,256. Does he summarise that for you daily?—Yes.

16,257. Therefore by that means you can take a bird's eye view of the institution, as it were?—Yes.

16,258. Chairman: And do you see each of your assistant doctors every day?—Practically every day.

16,259. And if they have any difficulty about a case, or if they think any case is approaching the stage of discharge, do they discuss it with you?—Yes.

16,260. Do you have that patient then sent for, or do you see the patient?—I would see the patient at one of my visits.

16,261. So that when questions do come up that require your personal decision you see the patient?—Yes, I see the patient.

Chairman: I am sure we are much indebted to you, doctor, for your interesting contribution to our deliberations.

MISS MADELEINE SYMONS.

MR. P. BARTER (Secretary).

MR. W. FAIRLEY (Assistant Secretary).

Dr. JOHN D. COMRIE, M.A., B.Sc., M.D., F.R.C.P., called and examined.

16,262. Chairman: This morning we have with us Dr. John D. Comrie, M.A., B.Sc., M.D., F.R.C.P. Dr. Comrie, you are Senior Assistant Physician to the Royal Infirmary at Edinburgh?—I am.

16,263. And Physician to the Deaconesses Hospital at Edinburgh; and some little time ago you were Consulting Physician to the Forces in North Russia?—Yes, I was.

16,264. You are good enough to attend this morning for the purpose of giving us some information as to the methods pursued in Edinburgh for the treatment of mental cases at the Royal Infirmary?—Yes.

16,265. And we propose, if you please, to confine your evidence to that particular topic, as we have had a considerable volume of general evidence on the Scottish practice already. First of all, the Royal Infirmary in Edinburgh is a general hospital, is it not?—A general hospital, a voluntary hospital.

16,266. A large general hospital supported by contributions from the public and by endowments?—Yes.

16,267. It is not a rate-aided institution?—Not rate-aided.

16,268. It is a general hospital in the usual sense, for the treatment of all forms of surgical and medical cases?—Yes.

16,269. Then even from the earliest times has the Royal Infirmary in Edinburgh treated a certain number of mental cases?—Yes, almost for 200 years.

20 April, 1925.]

Dr. JOHN D. COMRIE, M.A., B.Sc., M.D., F.R.C.P.

16,270. I gather from your précis that so far back as 1738 mental cases were treated at the Royal Infirmary?—Yes, they were.

16,271. I think it is rather interesting to place on our notes an extract from the Minutes of the meeting of the Managers of the Royal Infirmary on the 20th April, 1738, which reads: "As there is no proper place in Scotland for entertaining lunatics the Managers propose to prepare in this part of the house first to be built five cells to entertain such lunatics whose expense in the hospital their friends will defray." You find there an indication of the primitive and rather barbarous method which was employed for the treatment of lunatic cases at that period?—Yes.

16,272. And subsequently the number of cells, as they were called, was increased to twelve. But after the institution of the Royal Asylum at Morningside, of which Dr. Robertson has been telling us, in 1813, did the need for accommodating cases of chronic insanity in the Royal Infirmary pass away?—Yes.

16,273. And consequently those cells fell into disuse?—Yes.

16,274. Was it still found, however, that a considerable number of cases which reached the Royal Infirmary were suffering from mental derangement and required special treatment?—Yes, that was still found, and also that cases showed mental aberration in the wards of the Infirmary.

16,275. Sometimes, I suppose, as symptoms of the physical ailments from which they were suffering?—Very often arising out of the physical ailments.

16,276. And, as a matter of history, was a special ward set apart for the reception of these cases?—Yes. It is difficult to find out exactly when it was, but apparently it was immediately after 1813 when the Royal Asylum was founded at Morningside.

16,277. Then in 1881 the Royal Infirmary was transferred to its present buildings from the old Infirmary premises, and again was a ward set apart for the reception of cases of the type you have mentioned, and were rules drawn up for the regulation of that ward?—Yes. The practice had been found to be so useful to the public that it was decided in 1881 to set apart a special ward in the new building, and to improve its conditions, and definite rules were drawn up for its management.

16,278. And I think an assistant physician was put in charge of the ward, and perhaps we might have just a quotation from the rules defining its purpose: "This ward and the adjoining apartment shall be reserved for the reception of patients who, from nervous excitement or delirium, are likely to disturb the patients in the other wards of the house; and also for cases of poisoning, or other emergencies of a nature which might prove the cause of such disturbance." Consequently in the existing Royal Infirmary has it always been the practice to have a ward set apart for cases suffering from mental disorder of one kind or another, where special treatment was given to them?—Yes; that has ever since been the practice.

16,279. Has that ward been reserved for cases where the mental disturbance was incidental to other ailments?—No; that, no doubt, was its original purpose.

16,280. So it would appear historically?—But gradually more and more as time went on, the ward has been used for the admission of patients from the outside, private cases of doctors who are in difficulty as to the disposal of patients, and cases with regard to which the police or the magistrates were in difficulty; and more and more these cases have been admitted from outside.

16,281. So that while in its inception the idea was to have a special ward into which you could relegate patients who in the course of their illness became disordered in mind, it really has developed into a ward in which mental derangement is treated?—It has developed very much, and especially, I think, in comparatively recent years, the last 20 years or so, during which cases of mental aberration due to alcoholism have very much diminished; that has left more room in the ward for cases due to other conditions, and so these other cases have been more and more admitted as the alcoholic cases fell out.

16,282. Before we go into the very interesting statistics of the cases handled in that ward, I would rather like to get from you a general account of the relation of this ward to the system of the treatment of insanity in Scotland—I mean its relation to the ordinary asylums, and what part this particular ward in the Infirmary plays in its relation to the general system. Could you tell us that?—First of all, with regard to the patients who were taken mentally ill in the Infirmary, of course it would be inconvenient to send them to an asylum, because they often have other conditions for which it is very undesirable that they should be removed from the Infirmary.

16,283. I suppose, in short, a state of mental derangement ensues on an attack of pneumonia, or uræmia?—Or in the case of a man with a fractured thigh bone, say.

16,284. That is a case already in the Infirmary for the treatment of the physical ailment; but, a mental derangement supervening, the case is removed to this ward, and is still in a general hospital, and has all the resources of the general hospital available for treating the physical side of the ailment, while the mental side is dealt with in the ward by special attendants, I suppose?—Yes, that is so.

16,285. And with a special physician in charge?—Yes.

16,286. Then these cases, of course, in their inception are not certified cases at all; they are simply cases of ordinary ailments in which mental symptoms have supervened?—Yes, either at the same time or subsequently. Then there is another group of cases. Doctors outside are often in great difficulty with regard to a case as to whether it should be sent to a mental hospital, to an asylum, or whether the case is likely to recover in a very short time; it may be a case which it is impossible to keep, say, in a private house on account of noisiness or family arrangements generally; and these cases are sent in for diagnosis in the first place, and in that sense the ward is, as it were, a clearing house either for getting patients better and sending them back home, getting them well enough to go for convalescence somewhere, or else sending them on to mental hospitals.

16,287. None of those cases which reach you are certified cases, are they?—None are certified.

16,288. In such cases what do you do in the matter of detention, because such cases must, in many instances, be disordered mentally? Are they all willing to receive your treatment?—They come in presumably voluntarily. They do come in voluntarily, or are brought in by their friends. They are not under any form of restraint when they come in, and, theoretically of course, they could get up and go out at any time. As a matter of fact, take a case of pneumonia, for example: if a patient insisted upon getting out of bed one would exercise one's discretion in acting for that patient's ultimate good. It would be extremely dangerous for him to get out of bed, probably fatal, and of course such a patient would not be allowed to get out of bed, or still less to leave the Infirmary.

16,289. But such a patient in private practice would not be allowed to get out of bed?—Exactly, except that with special attendants the patients are more easy to manage.

16,290. But it is a symptom, I suppose, of these ailments that whether in private practice, or in a hospital, for the patients' good they must be restrained?—They must be restrained, as necessary.

16,291. And although technically that may be an interference with the liberty of the subject, it is an interference which in ordinary practice takes place daily, I suppose?—It takes place daily, and it is quite recognised by law.

20 April, 1925.]

Dr. JOHN D. COMRIE, M.A., B.Sc., M.D., F.R.C.P.

16,292. But theoretically these patients who come to your ward may leave at any time they please?—Theoretically, they may leave at any time they please.

16,293. They are under no legal restraint; they are merely under the restraint which any wise doctor imposes upon a suffering patient?—That is so.

Sir Humphry Rolleston: I wonder whether Dr. Comrie will just expand a little the statement that one has the right legally to restrain a delirious pneumonic patient. It is humanly so, but is it legally so?

16,294. Chairman: I do not think so, Dr. Comrie.—My understanding is that the doctor must in such a case act for the benefit of the patient to the best of his ability, and restrain the patient, if necessary, and take responsibility temporarily for doing so; and that the patient may subsequently bring an action against him under the common law, but that the law would undoubtedly exonerate the doctor.

16,295. Of course, you must remember we are dealing with practical problems. I suppose if a patient is brought into the general hospital suffering from some injury to the brain, let us say, a fracture of the skull, you may at once have to perform an operation on that patient?—Yes, that is so.

16,296. And technically that is an assault upon the patient, of course?—Yes.

16,297. But no Court of Law would regard that as otherwise than necessary, though technically it is an assault?—Technically it is an assault.

Sir Humphry Rolleston: It is not provided for in law.

Chairman: There is no provision that I know of in law for that case.

Sir David Drummond: On the other hand, if you allow the patient to get up, and he dies, the Coroner will inquire into it.

16,298. Chairman: You are between the devil and the deep sea?—Yes.

16,299. And also it might be said that you were guilty of professional negligence if you allowed a patient to get up when he ought to be kept in bed; you would be contributing to the patient's injury?—Yes, I think so.

16,300. However, these things fortunately settle themselves by commonsense, and the law is sometimes in consonance with commonsense; but we understand the legal position of these patients—they are like the other patients in a general hospital, they have come in, and the only specialty in their case is that their ailment is mental instead of physical, and you treat them as you would treat other patients in a general hospital. Legally they are free to get up, but they do not in practice do it; and the doctors exercise both moral, and, where necessary, I suppose, physical restraint, upon those patients?—As necessary, yes; and we really never have any trouble with patients.

16,301. We should bring out at once that these patients are not taken for gain in any sense?—They are not taken for gain.

16,302. They are treated gratuitously, like all other patients in general hospitals?—Yes.

16,303. Now, before coming to the detailed statistics, have you found that the facilities thus provided in the hospital in Edinburgh are advantageous in the public interest, and in the interest of the patients?—Very advantageous; I have found that over and over again. Cases are saved, for instance, from being certified and going to a mental hospital and having whatever stigma attaches from that. Then very often such patients are found to require medical or surgical treatment, which could be administered much more readily in a general hospital than it could be in a mental hospital.

16,304. Are many of the cases associated with some physical condition, the alleviation of which results in mental improvement?—Very often, yes. One finds, for example, in cases of melancholia that that is very often the case, that there is some physical underlying condition as a contributory cause.

16,305. On that being alleviated the mental symptoms disappear?—Yes, the mental symptoms gradually disappear.

16,306. We have heard some evidence in England of cases where delirium has supervened on pneumonia or uræmia, being taken to the mental wards in poorhouses, and there certified. I suppose you would regard that as an undesirable practice?—I think it is unnecessary, in the first place, and highly undesirable in the second.

16,307. Is it merely a transitory phase associated with the illness?—Yes, and passes off when the illness is recovered from.

16,308. But if certification is resorted to in order to impose restraint upon such persons, then they have the stigma of certification for life?—Yes.

16,309. While all that really they have suffered from has been some ordinary ailment with a transitory phase of mental disturbance?—Yes.

16,310. Now you succeed in obviating certification altogether in those cases by this method which you pursue in Edinburgh?—Yes, in a very large number of cases.

16,311. What is your relation to the Royal Asylum at Edinburgh—I mean what determines whether a case is sent to you or sent to the Royal Asylum?—That perhaps is largely a matter of opinion of the outside doctor, and his doubt about the case; and also probably cases tend to come to us because the doctor does not wish to take the personal responsibility of certification in some instances; so that the tendency is rather to send them in to us and leave to us the question of certification.

16,312. But I could conceive that among the patients reaching you some would be cases in which certification at the moment would be quite legal, I mean the cases would be in such a condition that certification could be quite conscientiously resorted to?—Yes. For instance, I notice in my statistics in 1923-24 that there were 17 cases of fixed delusional states. These were observed by us for a sufficiently long time to verify this condition, and then they were certified and sent to an asylum; that might have been done before they came in to us. There is a small number of these cases.

16,313. Then it really turns upon the discretion of the doctor who is attending the case whether he will recommend that the case should be sent to your ward, or should be certified at once and sent to an asylum?—It depends a good deal upon his discretion, yes, and the case is often difficult for him to diagnose.

16,314. And then, in addition to that, he may of course recommend that the patient should enter an institution voluntarily, as another expedient?—Yes.

16,315. Not applicable so much to rate-aided patients, of course?—No, the voluntary admission is not applicable to a great extent to rate-aided patients; only a few parishes in Scotland make provision for that.

16,316. I was thinking of the choice presented to the medical attendant. He is attending a poor person who is showing symptoms of mental derangement. What resources has he at his disposal? He seems to me, in Edinburgh, to be able to say, "This is a case where I think the symptoms will pass off; this is a case for Dr. Comrie in the Royal Infirmary"; or he may say, "This is a case of clearly pronounced insanity and it should be certified"; or, if the person had a little means, he might say "I think you should yourself voluntarily go into an institution, and we will see if arrangements can be made for you." That would be a possible alternative?—Yes.

16,317. Are there any other things that might be done?—No. Of course this ward to a large extent takes the place of the voluntary admission to an asylum; it really does that for pauper patients.

16,318. Sir David Drummond: What proportion of these cases attend your out-patient department

20 April, 1925.]

Dr. JOHN D. COMRIE, M.A., B.Sc., M.D., F.R.C.P.

before they are admitted?—Quite a small proportion; I could not give you an exact figure.

16,319. You do not see many of them yourself before they are admitted?—If I might just give a figure at random I should say perhaps something like 5 per cent. may be seen.

16,320. Chairman: I have not brought out from you yet the full equipment of your institution. Have you an outdoor clinic as well?—Well, there is a general out-patients' department of the hospital, and a certain number of cases come through that. Then some cases are sent up, as Sir David Drummond asked, to see me personally at the ward, in a side room of the ward, and these come irregularly; I have not any definite day.

16,321. The out-patients' department is the general out-patient department of the hospital, and of course that would be in the hands of the junior physicians and surgeons of the institution?—Yes.

16,322. If they find a case which exhibits mental derangement they may pass on the case to you for consideration?—Yes; that is quite common. A large number of cases come in that way; they appear to be likely to cause disturbance in other wards, or are unsuitable for other wards, or are possibly cases of attempted suicide in other wards. These cases are sent up with a request that they would be admitted to ward 3.

16,323. Are some of the milder cases treated in the out-patients' department by visiting from time to time and getting advice, and possibly medicine?—Yes; a number of the slighter cases are treated in the out-patients' department.

16,324. Sir Humphry Rolleston: There is no special day for them?—No. Professor Robertson is, I understand, going some time to organise such a clinic, a regular psychopathic outside clinic.

16,325. Chairman: In association with the hospital?—In association with the hospital, to which he is consulting alienist, but that has not matured yet; at present they come with the ordinary out-patients.

16,326. Sir Humphry Rolleston: There is no social service associated with the infirmary—I suppose the after care would be associated with Morningside, and the other mental hospitals?—There is a social service gradually increasing its scope.

16,327. Chairman: But is it specially associated with that department? Is it not just the general social service that is given to all patients?—The general social service for out-patients, who form a pretty large part of the work; and it renders very valuable service in that way, visiting them both before admission, and following them up after admission. A social service among in-patients is being developed.

16,328. Who engages in that work—volunteers?—Several ladies. The Edinburgh University Settlement had a great deal to do with starting it; it is all worked by ladies, of whom there are now four paid workers and a varying number of volunteers.

16,329. Is this ward open just as all the other wards are open, or is it kept closed?—To the public—it is open under the same conditions, that is to say, anyone having a friend in this ward can get a visiting ticket and see the patient on four afternoons a week at certain hours, and visit his friends and visit any other patient.

16,330. One is familiar, of course, in connection with the Edinburgh Hospital with the visits that are paid by good-hearted people to mental patients, and Sunday morning visits, and so on, that take place there: is this ward treated in the same way as the other wards, or have you to take any special precautions?—No, we sometimes have ward concerts, for example, in the evening. Ladies organise concerts, and the patients appreciate them very much. It is a little bit awkward sometimes; if there is a patient requiring quietude in the ward, or a patient is very noisy, the concert has to be put off.

16,331. Have you any separate rooms for patients there?—No, that is one of the drawbacks of it. The department consists of four rooms; there is the large male ward, there are two smaller rooms for female patients which are capable of holding four or five patients each, and then there is one room with one bed in it where a noisy case, or a case which is unsuitable to have in the ward, may be treated temporarily.

16,332. Then you have nothing in the nature of padded rooms there?—No padded room.

16,333. And if any patient becomes obstreperous how do you deal with the case?—If a patient becomes obstreperous there are several ways of dealing with the case. For example, there is, first of all, an attempt at moral suasion, by appealing to the patient, and this I think is more effective in the case of male patients than in the case of female patients; that is to say, I think the sister and nurses can exercise more restraint simply in that way over male patients than over female patients.

16,334. Is the ward staffed with female nurses?—Yes, female nurses in the main; there are three men who are called porters.

16,335. They have not the status of nurses?—They have not the status of nurses; they act under the directions of the sister.

16,336. You were telling us that the sister will use moral suasion with the patient?—Moral suasion in the first place, and attempt that as far as possible. Then, of course, secondly, there is the use of drugs.

16,337. Sedatives?—Sedatives such as paraldehyde, hyoscine, morphine, veronal, and so on. Then in other cases there is the question of restraint—in surgical cases, for instance. I have a patient in the ward just now, for example, with a compound fracture of the leg, and she resents the splints being on it, and takes them off at every possible opportunity and throws them out of bed, and then raises her leg in the air and has a look at it, which of course is very bad. In a case like that it is an absolute obvious necessity to fasten the splints down to the bed—surgical restraint. It is an obvious necessity that that splint should be fastened down on the bed, and the leg fastened down, so that is an example of surgical restraint. Then in such a case, too, the patient's hands would be fixed by bandages, fixed to the edge of the bed to prevent her from working at the splints. A somewhat similar procedure might be carried out in the case of pneumonia in which the patient was insisting on getting out of bed, which is a very dangerous procedure in a person with pneumonia with a failing heart. Human restraint which, of course, is rather desirable in many cases for mental patients, that is to say, by a nurse standing on each side, and holding the patient's hands, is here out of the question, because a patient suffering from acute delirium with pneumonia as a rule resents any human interference; and so it is found to be better that in such a case a screen should be put up round the patient's bed and the attendants should be on the far side of the screen ready to come to the patient's assistance, to give the patient a drink, or do anything for the patient should it be necessary, but that the patient in such a case should simply be restrained by a sheet pinned over the bed or by bandages. Then a somewhat similar procedure is found advantageous, and for the same reason, in heart cases; they often resent the presence of another person very much, such as a nurse at the bedside; they may have a delusion with regard to the personality of the nurse and resent it very much. Such measures of restraint are only carried out for a few hours at a time, that is all that is usually found to be necessary, and then the patient realises that it is useless to struggle against inanimate restraint, whereas the patient would go on struggling persistently against animate restraint; so he quietly drops off to sleep, and then the restraint can be removed. Of course such restraint is very much easier to carry out in a general hospital than in a mental hospital.

16,338. Why is that?—I think it is because of the greater access of the public—people see what is going on all the time, and they have confidence; they see for themselves that this is the proper and obvious thing that should be done for this patient; and they see and approve of it, and there is never any complaint about it. In the mental hospital it is considered to be more open to criticism. And then, of course, the superintendent of an asylum has certain legal disabilities; every time restraint of that sort is used he has to enter it in a book for the inspection of the Commissioners.

20 April, 1925.]

Dr. JOHN D. COMRIE, M.A., B.Sc., M.D., F.R.C.P.

16,339. Now you just deal with these patients apparently on ordinary lines, and adopt commonsense expedients in their interests?—I think that is how to put it, yes, that one adopts commonsense expedients, such as one might use in any ordinary medical case in private practice.

16,340. You are not subject, are you, to any inspection?—No. As a matter of fact, members of the Board of Control do come and inspect the ward unofficially by arrangement, but they make it quite clear that they do not come officially. They just come to keep in touch with what is going on in the ward.

16,341. But they have really no more status there than they have in the other wards of the hospital?—No, presumably not.

16,342. Sir David Drummond: What is the relation between that group of wards and the general hospital—I mean as to position?—It is simply one of the wards in a pavilion. In Edinburgh the wards are mostly arranged in tiers of three in pavilions, and this is simply a ward in a pavilion of three wards, the upper two being surgical wards.

16,343. Would noises arising in your ward be heard in the general hospital?—They are sometimes complained of in the ward above, but very seldom.

16,344. Chairman: I suppose there is this feature, too, that as the cases come to you after a process of selection, that is to say, on the advice of the medical attendant, you probably will not have the most violent and noisy type of case sent to you?—I should not say that; I think we do get very violent and noisy cases. For example, some of the alcoholic cases are excessively violent and noisy. Yes, I think that we have cases that probably are more violent and noisy than many cases in a mental hospital, but they are violent and noisy for a short period only.

16,345. The point that Sir David raised is of importance. In the accommodation which you have, are all the patients of different types together?—Yes. I have always realised that that is a defect. It would be very advantageous if there were more possibility of classification of patients; if a noisy patient could be kept quite away in a separate ward, and at some little distance from the quiet and timid patients. That is one drawback to this particular ward.

16,346. I can imagine a sensitive case. Take a woman who is overwrought and sensitive, and melancholy possibly, she might be much alarmed by the advent of an extreme alcoholic case, for example?—Yes. Of course, as much care is taken as possible to keep them as far apart as possible, and violent cases are put behind a light screen, and so on.

16,347. But the screen will not keep noises out?—No, it does not keep noises out, but it prevents the timid patient from seeing threatening looks and threatening movements.

16,348. It disturbs the sleep also?—Yes.

16,349. Do you find much difficulty arising from that cause in the actual work of your ward?—Only occasionally, but I do feel it would be a great advantage if there were more rooms in such a department, so that classification could be better carried out. I think that in any reconstruction or any development that should be borne in mind. I understand that at the present moment there is a scheme for actually adding an early mental department to the Royal Infirmary of Edinburgh, but it has not eventuated yet. It is, I understand, largely a matter of finance.

16,350. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Accidents, of course, occur in all mental hospitals—there must be a certain number of suicides, and so on—how do your accidents, suicides and escapes, compare with those of an ordinary mental hospital?—I do not think we have suicides actually occurring in the ward. Of course we admit a great many people who have attempted to commit suicide. I think in one particular year the number I give is 58. This was about 60 per cent. of the melancholic cases, who had already attempted to commit suicide, but we do not have suicides after they come in.

Sir Humphry Rolleston: Really? That is most successful.

16,351. Mrs. Mathew: Would you be in favour of small rooms instead of large wards?—There are advantages in the patients being together; they derive something from one another. The worst patients derive a great deal of benefit from the admixture with sane, or almost sane patients, so that there is an advantage in having a large ward; but at the same time I would certainly recommend a number of small wards for the purpose of classification—that is to say, for accommodating very violent and noisy patients on the one hand, and on the other hand, very quiet and timid patients who prefer seclusion.

16,352. Sir David Drummond: Might we hear about your staff? I take it you have an exceptional staff?—There is a sister in charge, and then there are six female nurses under her, and three male orderlies or porters—ten.

16,353. For how many patients?—About 24 patients.

16,354. That is practically one attendant to two patients?—Yes. I should add that of course in the case of any patient where a special nurse is required, the special nurse is available from the general staff of the infirmary in addition. There is also a strict rule that under no condition may there be fewer than three attendants in the ward.

16,355. You have no difficulty in getting special help?—No difficulty in getting special nurses, or getting male porters.

16,356. Chairman: Then, just to complete the staff, have you a resident under you?—Yes, a resident who does duty in another ward as well, but I have a resident.

16,357. Is that a male or female doctor?—A male doctor.

16,358. Is he appointed to you in the usual way in Edinburgh, appointed as your resident?—He is appointed to another ward where I am senior assistant physician, in which I act as well. Then he comes to Ward 3, as a matter of practice.

16,359. You, as the senior physician will visit, I suppose, every day?—Yes, every day.

16,360. And you see all the cases each day?—I see each case each day. With regard to the staff I should add that I also have a doctor, who is non-resident, from outside, who acts as clinical assistant. And Professor Robertson, of the Mental Hospital at Morningside, has very kindly allowed his Deputy Superintendent, Dr. McAlister, to act in that capacity, so that I have the benefit of a trained alienist.

16,361. Sir Humphry Rolleston: I quite realise the benefit that a patient on the border-line may obtain from being in contact with patients who are perfectly sound mentally; on the other hand, is there not a little risk that it may react on patients who are sound in the same ward. For instance three children were admitted for gas poisoning—is it not possible that the effect of seeing a wild lunatic might produce some impression on their minds which eventually would be not entirely beneficial?—I think theoretically that is so, but I think practically it does not arise, because one would to a certain extent be able to classify the patients, and one would keep away such patients as you mention from the very wild patient.

16,362. I imagine the children being there was just an accident?—That was accidental gas poisoning.

16,363. Would you ever think of recommending that a woman who is mentally unstable should have children put near her so as to awaken her maternal and better instincts?—It would not be possible to arrange it, of course, but when it does happen by accident it always does have a beneficial effect on a mental patient.

Dr. JOHN D. COMBIE, M.A., B.Sc., M.D., F.R.C.P.

16,364. Mr. Snell: I want to know what effect it would have upon the health of the general ward. Will there not be another side to all that?—I think the sane patient can stand association with the insane patient without being deleteriously affected.

16,365. I should have thought in a hospital ward where a patient requires every ounce of his nervous and physical strength to fight his disease, the presence of noisy irritable patients would have been very bad?—Well, again, theoretically, yes, but you can to a certain extent keep them apart. You can, for instance, use the single room I mentioned for treating very bad cases of poisoning.

16,366. Chairman: But I think you are a little at cross purposes. One of the purposes of this ward, I understand, is to remove from the general hospital cases which are disturbing and noisy, and likely to affect injuriously the other patients. In the ward itself we shall not find general patients, that is to say, patients suffering from ordinary ailments?—No, they are suffering from a few conditions of which the most typical one is poisoning. The question is not asked whether they are cases of accident or suicide; they are all admitted to this ward, and a good many of them are cases of accident, and these are examples of the sane patients to whom I refer, not patients suffering from general diseases.

16,367. You speak of the benefit to the mentally afflicted cases of the association of ordinary patients, but I rather thought that this ward was for the purpose of segregating the mentally afflicted cases and treating them by themselves in this special department of the infirmary?—There are poisoning cases, and then, of course there are the cases who are ill with something else, who have been noisy at one time, and therefore removed from another ward.

16,368. That is temporary mental disorder?—Very temporary. Then, of course, there are the alcoholic cases who are also admitted to that ward, and they are noisy for a short time; but then for several days before they go out they are perfectly sane.

16,369. Take the type of person such as Mr. Snell has in mind, I think; a person who quite accidentally has been poisoned, a perfectly sane person, but through some domestic accident has taken poison.

16,370. Sir David Drummond: Pardon me, you do not take that case there?—Yes, they come in there.

16,371. I thought it was only mental cases?—That is one of the rules of the place. Given a case of poisoning arriving at the front door of the infirmary it would be impossible to start asking: "Is this a case of accident?" They must be taken in somewhere at once; they are all taken into Ward 3, and having come there they are all retained there.

16,372. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Is not the question of alcoholic and poisoned patients rather a historical survival of the functions of the ward?—Yes, it is.

16,373. It is not part of the scheme of the Edinburgh Infirmary?—The ward is, so to speak, a historic survival which has undergone development, and is undergoing development.

16,374. So that you might eventually shed the alcoholic cases without much loss to psychological medicine?—I think probably they will be shed ultimately.

16,375. I can imagine a case of accidental poisoning, where the patient was recovering, being very much disturbed by the presence of a very noisy and clearly mental case in the next bed. It would retard recovery, would it not?—It might, but then such a case would not be put in the next bed to a noisy patient.

16,376. Chairman: These things are managed with good sense, I have no doubt; but you do find yourself to some extent hampered in your treatment by the physical circumstances of your accommodation?—Yes; undoubtedly it would be better to have several small rooms in addition.

16,377. The main topic which interests us is the type of institution, it is the system that is of interest to us, a system of treating mental cases as part of the ordinary work of a general hospital?—Yes.

16,378. That is in operation at the present moment in Edinburgh under the conditions you have mentioned?—Yes, and I think quite successfully—about 60 per cent. of recoveries.

16,379. And apparently provides a method of dealing with cases provisionally without certification?—Yes.

16,380. A sorting out place?—Yes.

16,381. Sir David Drummond: Is the accommodation which you have anything like adequate for a large district like that?—No, I do not think so, because we are limited to a large extent by the number of patients that have to be treated.

16,382. You often have to refuse cases?—We often do keep cases waiting which go to a mental hospital instead, or we keep slighter cases waiting a longer time at home.

16,383. Sir Ernest Hiley: Can you give us any idea as to the extent of your waiting list?—I think it is not a very large waiting list in this particular ward. I should think of the mild mental cases waiting to come in there are usually about half a dozen or so all the time.

16,384. Mr. Micklem: How many beds have you got in the male ward?—Sixteen, and eight female, with a possibility of taking an extra two beds in either case.

16,385. Sir Ernest Hiley: If you were given a free hand to extend, what provision would you make in addition to what you have now?—In the first place, I think it is very important, and it is a great advantage, to have such a ward under the same roof, at all events, as the general hospital. I mean it would be quite a different type of ward if it were at some distance. I think it must be really under the same roof. Then I think it should have some grounds for the exercise of the patients; I think that is very important. Then I think that there should be a considerable possibility of the classification of patients, that is to say, a number of rooms in addition to the wards, and then the possibility of fresh air treatment.

16,386. But how many beds would you provide?—I think, that in Edinburgh, with a population of 50,000, and a large surrounding district, as far as present needs go 50 beds would do very well.

16,387. Sir David Drummond: Can you tell us about the costs of your department as compared with any other portion with a similar number of beds?—No, I am sorry I have no statistics.

16,388. Chairman: The staff is larger, is it not?—The staff is somewhat larger than it is in an ordinary medical or surgical ward.

16,389. But you think the cost does not vary very much?—I do not think the cost is very greatly higher. The increased staff is practically the only increased item of cost, and per patient I should say the cost is not larger, because the patients go out fairly quickly.

16,390. Chairman: On that point, first of all, what proportion of your cases are bed cases?—They are all regarded as bed cases. Of course some of them are up for part of the day, but they are all regarded as bed cases all the time.

16,391. Then you do not propose to cater really for a resident population of insane people in the ward?—We cannot do that meantime with the present facilities.

16,392. I am not sure that it would be appropriate that you should, because you do not want to convert yourselves into an asylum?—No; I think it would be better to keep to the bed cases.

16,393. Sir David Drummond: Curable cases?—Yes.

16,394. Mr. Micklem: You will have some in there for three months or so?—Virtually we are limited by the number of beds multiplied by the number of days in the year and divided by the total number of patients who pass through in the year. That gives us the number of days we can keep the average patient, but that is only two or three weeks, and the maximum time that we can keep cases is six weeks. Of course occasionally they go on longer than that, but it is only very occasionally.

20 April, 1925.]

Dr. JOHN D. COMRIE, M.A., B.Sc., M.D., F.R.C.P.

16,395. Chairman: If there is some prospect of getting a complete recovery I suppose you may keep a case a little longer?—Yes, but if a case is not well in six weeks we regard it as not likely to be well under six months, and then further steps are taken for disposal by sending the case to an asylum.

16,396. It is a prominent feature of this system that you do not cater for a resident population of confirmed lunatics; it is a place where you deal with the transitory cases, and the cases which have not been completely diagnosed?—Yes.

16,397. But you do not propose to equip yourself for ordinary prolonged residence of patients?—No; the managers of the infirmary do not encourage that at all.

16,398. I think we might take from you the statistics. We have heard how you run your wards.

16,399. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Might I ask one question about construction. I do not know when you said "under the same roof" whether you were speaking literally or whether you meant in the same ring; because I should have thought it was rather an advantage to have the block separately surrounded by a park, such as at Phipps' Institution at Baltimore, where it is in the same ring, but not absolutely under the same roof. I should have thought the advantages to patients in that way would more than counterbalance the advantage of immediate surgical help that might be available under the same roof. When you say "under the same roof" do you really mean that, or do you mean an annexe?—I used the term "under the same roof" with the idea of being emphatic. I was actually thinking of the Phipps' Institute in Baltimore when I said it. The Phipps' Institute is connected by wide corridors with all the other departments of the hospital. It is in a ring with the other blocks of the hospital. The great point is this, that the other specialists can be got at once. It is not a question of arranging by letter with the specialist to come and examine the patient; he can be actually got in the course of two or three minutes to come and see a patient at once.

16,400. Chairman: You mean really as part of the same establishment?—Yes.

16,401. Sir Humphry Rolleston: You would be quite content to take charge of the Phipps' Institute if it were transferred to Edinburgh?—I should be quite delighted.

16,402. Chairman: Now I propose, with your permission, to take the table which you have furnished us with on the second page of your précis, regarding the classes of case admitted to these wards, and put it on our notes as it stands?—If you please. (The Table is as follows:)

	1852-53	1883.	1913.	1923-24.
Drunkenness	6	210	209	119
Delirium Tremens	60	91	48	14
Confusional States associated with other diseases.	40	48	60	102
Melancholia (non-suicidal) ...	—	12	30	29
Poisoning and attempted suicide	6	25	35	58
Dementia	—	—	30	52
Psycho-neurosis (Hysteria, &c.)	5	11	12	35
Post-epileptic States	9	19	16	29
Mania	11	21	13	20
Gross Brain Disease	8	30	24	16
Fixed Delusional States	—	4	24	17
Primary Mental Defect	—	—	3	9
Total Admissions	145	471	504	500

16,403. That table shows the very interesting history of the cases which have been dealt with in these wards at various periods during the past 70 years; and the statistics point to interesting changes in the social habits of the people, particularly in the cases of drunkenness. You have there a history which shows an increasing use of these facilities, reaching apparently in 1913 a maximum of 504 cases, while for the year 1923-24 you have 500 cases in all?—Yes, virtually the same.

16,404. This table shows us the classification of the cases, which seems to cover pretty well most of the ordinary forms of insanity?—Yes.

16,405. You do not have cases of dementia præcox or general paralysis of the insane among them?—Oh yes, we have a number of cases of both these; the dementia præcox are included under the word "Dementia."

16,406. So we may take it that all types are represented in your ward at some time or another?—I think a few cases of almost every type of insanity.

16,407. Sir David Drummond: When you speak of "Gross brain disease" we are not to assume that all cases of gross cerebral disease go to your ward?—No. These were cases in which there had been some mental condition, and a cerebral tumour or meningitis had been found to be the cause of it.

16,408. There is a mental side to the cerebral condition?—Yes.

16,409. Chairman: Now these being the number of admissions in 1923-24, namely, 500, it will be interesting to hear from you the results of your treatment—I think you can give us some figures. You say: "With regard to results, the proportion of cases discharged sufficiently well to return home was 72 per cent. of the total."?—Yes, or perhaps it is fairer from the point of view of mental disease to leave out the alcoholic cases altogether.

16,410. If we leave them out, is the number of cases sufficiently well to be returned 64 per cent. of the total admissions?—No, of the total mental cases.

16,411. Putting aside the alcoholic cases?—Yes.

16,412. If we take 1923-24 the alcoholic cases apparently are 133 in number, because I am including drunkenness and delirium tremens?—133.

16,413. Then if we take 133 from 500 we get 367 other cases?—Yes.

16,414. And of the 367 other cases 64 per cent. I gather were after treatment sufficiently well to return home?—Yes, that is what I mean.

16,415. Then with regard to the disposal of the other cases, I think you passed on to mental hospitals 17 per cent. of the total, or, again excluding the alcoholic cases, 22 per cent. of the total?—Yes.

16,416. Does that mean that these cases were found not to yield to the treatment in your ward, and to exhibit a more or less permanent state of mental aberration?—Yes; that includes either those cases which were found, after an interval had elapsed for diagnosis, to be cases of chronic mental disease which were not early cases, and which need not be retained at all—

16,417. Proper asylum cases?—Proper asylum cases or cases which we could not keep for a sufficient length of time for recovery.

16,418. In these cases did you resort to certification?—In these cases we did resort to certification as a rule. In five cases only, the patients entered mental hospitals as voluntary patients.

16,419. Then these must be people who have some means?—These were people who had some means, or whose friends had some means. But there is no doubt that this would have been taken more advantage of, if the pauper patients could have gone as voluntary patients, and we are often asked by them whether they can go as voluntary patients, and we have to explain to them that they cannot.

16,420. Now I would like to know how you deal with cases which have to be certified. Does the certification take place in your own institution?—Yes.

20 April, 1925.]

Dr. JOHN D. COMRIE, M.A., B.Sc., M.D., F.R.C.P.

16,421. Who does the certification?—The actual certifying doctors are, in the case of the private patients, always the resident physician and the clinical assistant; in the case of the pauper patients the parish council sends two of its own medical officers from outside.

16,422. Do you yourself ever certify?—I never certify.

16,423. Then the two certificates are given and transmitted to the Sheriff?—Yes.

16,424. And an order is pronounced by him, and the patient is taken from your ward to the asylum to which he is directed?—Direct to the asylum, yes.

16,425. But apparently that happens in a relatively small number of your cases?—Yes, only 22 per cent.

16,426. Then I may take it that if a provision of this sort were made general throughout the country a very large proportion of cases would escape certification altogether?—Yes. I think one might assume that the similar proportion of cases might be treated with a similar result in other places.

16,427. Of course we must not assume that all those who are in your ward would be necessarily certifiable cases?—No; of course some of them might have recovered at home.

16,428. We must not assume these are all cases which would otherwise have been certified, but in consequence of your facilities escape certification; some of them would never have been certified anyhow?—No doubt. There is one point with regard to that, and that is on the question of the seriousness of the illness. It might be said that these cases were all very slight cases which would never have been certified; but I think it is sufficient answer to that to point in the case of melancholia to the number of those which at all events have been sufficiently severe to attempt to commit suicide before they came in; that is to say, out of 87 cases of melancholia, 58 had already attempted to commit suicide. That shows of itself that they were serious cases, and the same applies to the other diseases.

16,429. Sir David Drummond: Is there any compulsion upon the other physicians to send you cases that become mental?—There is no compulsion, but they prefer to do it.

16,430. They leave them in the ward as long as they can do so without disturbing the other patients?—Yes, and then of course there is always, in the case of the high wards three flights up, the risk of suicide.

16,431. The physician may use his discretion whether he transfers a patient from his own ward to yours?—Yes, but he is generally rather anxious to do so.

16,432. Some of these hysterical cases are very interesting for students, and they are not dangerous cases?—But they are still available for students in Ward 3.

16,433. Miss Symons: Do you get many re-admissions, doctor?—Not many; occasionally a person comes back. That applies particularly to cases of epilepsy in which a man has a post-epileptic state, and is in for a short time and gets better, and then has another attack in the course of a few months and comes in again.

16,434. Really recurrent cases?—Yes, recurrent cases, and the same applies to some recurrent types of mild insanity.

Mr. Micklem: Take the case of a pauper patient whom you have to certify for the asylum; I suppose the cost of maintaining him in the asylum is exactly the same whether he is certified or uncertified. How is it in Scotland where you seem to admit the voluntary patients—these people are not allowed to go in as voluntary patients?

16,435. Chairman: They do not get the grant—is not that the trouble?—The point is this: there is a Government grant in aid; I cannot give you the exact figure, it is roughly between £5 and £6, but this grant in aid is available for pauper patients who are certified, but it is not available for anyone else, so that if a pauper patient goes in as a voluntary patient then his parish council loses his grant in aid.

16,436. We have still to deal with one or two of the residue of your cases. I see that a small percentage is transferred to other non-mental hospitals, chiefly poor law hospitals?—Yes; that for example includes cases of senile dementia; that is the most typical kind of case coming under this heading.

16,437. You have told us about the length of stay. You have already alluded to the great advantage which many of the cases derive from being in a general hospital; that, their ailments being associated with physical disease, they have at hand all the resources of surgery for their treatment, as well as the fact that there are pathological and bacteriological laboratories available and specialists at hand. All these are available to your cases there, which of course cannot be available to the same extent in an asylum properly so-called?—No, unless it happens, as in the case of Edinburgh, to be close to us, and to be very well provided with a laboratory of its own.

16,438. Quite so. Then you regard it as advantageous that these wards of yours, being part of the general hospital, are open to public visitation, and in that way public opinion has an opportunity of satisfying itself that everything is all right?—Yes; one feels that that is a great safeguard, that public opinion can satisfy itself at once, or, if there is anything unsatisfactory, then a complaint can be lodged at once, which is a very important thing.

16,439. Have you formed any opinion as to the type of cases which are best suited for treatment in this way?—Well, I think the types which give the best results are, first of all, confusional insanity due to exhaustion, or due to a toxic state following, for example, infectious fevers. These recover very well. Then the same thing applies to cases of mental derangement occurring in the course of syphilis too, in which a correct diagnosis means a cure. It is very important in this particular disease that the diagnosis should be made at once, and one feels that if they come into a general hospital this is more certain to take place than if they went perhaps to a district asylum where the matter might be delayed longer.

16,440. That brings one to a very important feature, that to get the benefits of an asylum the patient has to be so far advanced in his ailment as to require to be certified?—Yes.

16,441. Whereas in your case, certification not being a necessary prerequisite to treatment, I suppose patients will come at an earlier stage?—Yes. Of course, they sometimes are very severely affected mentally. A patient may be quite stuporous or quite violent, and show all the symptoms of general paralysis of the insane. The case presumably would be one just at the beginning of that disease, and then by getting the diagnosis made at a very early stage, one can apply the treatment at once, and many of these patients become perfectly well again. For example, I had a case quite recently of a man who had been very violent, who was in a stuporous condition, was found to be suffering from this condition, received treatment, and in three months was again perfectly normal mentally and back at work.

16,442. Sir Ernest Hiley: He would not have got the same treatment in the public dispensary provided by the town?—Yes.

16,443. He would have got the same treatment?—Yes, he would have got the same physical treatment, but he needed also in-patient treatment, owing to his mental state. Of course, such a patient is passed on afterwards to that department as an out-patient, to continue as an out-patient. Then, to continue these cases, melancholia gives very good results, despite the fact that many of these melancholics were very much depressed indeed, so depressed as to have attempted suicide. About 60 per cent. of these cases became sufficiently well to return home, and about 40 per cent., on the other hand, were passed on to mental hospitals. Then with regard to the violent cases of psycho-neuroses,

20 April, 1925.]

Dr. JOHN D. COMRIE, M.A., B.Sc., M.D., F.R.C.P.,

hysteria, neurasthenia, and so on, with very marked mental symptoms, the benefit of the hospital treatment again appears in this, that in 50 per cent. of these cases it was possible to find a definite physical cause for the condition. Some of these cases were operated upon. Some had various forms of treatment; and in all the cases except one, the patient left hospital to go home again; one case went to a mental hospital.

16,444. Chairman: That is a very good record of that type of case?—Yes, and, as a matter of fact, this one case went to the mental hospital as a voluntary patient, because arrangements had been made for her doing so before she had come into the ward.

16,445. Then, on the other hand, have you found that cases of chronic manic-depressive insanity are not so suitable for you?—They are not so suitable; that is largely on account of the question of time; they require a long time, and a longer time than we can afford to give them.

16,446. And consequently do your records show that some 60 per cent. of these cases have to be passed on to mental hospitals?—Yes, whereas 40 per cent. recover sufficiently to go home.

16,447. Then in cases of fixed delusion, were these cases passed on to mental hospitals after the condition had been diagnosed and found to be established?—There it is a question of diagnosis.

16,448. These are not cases appropriate for treatment in your wards?—No, the treatment there would have no special benefit.

16,449. You focus your conclusions in three propositions which we might just put on our note. You say that you draw the following conclusions with regard to the treatment of early mental cases in general hospitals. Will you just read out your three propositions?—"Firstly, slight and undiagnosed cases of mental disorder admitted to a general hospital may in about 60 per cent. of cases be expected to recover sufficiently to return home within a period of six weeks." That means, of course, not returning home for full work, but very often going to live with relatives in the country for a time afterwards, but, at all events, to live in an ordinary house under ordinary domestic conditions. Then secondly: "Treatment in a general hospital is particularly valuable in expediting recovery because of the relative ease with which physical conditions (infective, exhaustive, or reflex) as partial causes can be discovered in a large proportion of the cases of confusional mental states, melancholia, and psycho-neuroses." Then thirdly: "The association of mental cases with patients who are normal mentally, and the greater freedom of access by the public in a general hospital are important factors in expediting recovery and in establishing public confidence."

Chairman: I think we have had a very complete and useful account from you of your work, for which we are obliged. If any of my colleagues have questions to ask they will do so.

16,450. Mr. Snell: I would like to ask Dr. Comrie about the great diminution of cases due to alcohol in one form or another, these figures are extraordinarily striking. To what do you attribute that great falling off since 1913 to 1924?—There is no doubt that less whisky is being drunk in Scotland; less spirit, less alcohol generally is being drunk in Scotland, and there is no doubt there are fewer drunken people. Then I would point out, that not only is the number of cases less, but I have divided alcoholism into two types, first of all, drunkenness, and secondly, delirium tremens; and one notices particularly with regard to delirium tremens that there has been a very marked fall since 1883, from 91 to 14, whereas ordinary drunkenness has fallen from 210 to 119—that is practically half.

16,451. Do you attribute that to what we call voluntary abstinence from alcohol?—I think it is voluntary abstinence. It is difficult to say why people are more abstinent. In my own mind, although I have no particular reason for saying it, I have rather associated it with the increased price.

16,452. That is what I am wanting to find out, whether it really does mean a change in social habit, or whether there are economic influences operating?—I think that perhaps general influences may have a good deal to do with it. The army, for instance, had a good deal to do with it; there was a very striking drop (although the process had begun before 1914) between 1914 and 1924. I think the military discipline of the army had a good deal to do with it.

16,453. Chairman: In Edinburgh, as far as I remember, prohibition is not in operation in any of the wards?—No.

Chairman: Of course, as you know, Mr. Snell, we have local prohibition, but, as far as I know, Edinburgh has not prohibition.

16,454. Mr. Snell: Yes. If you look at the figures as between 1913 and last year they fall from between 50 and 60 per cent. in 1883, to 50 per cent. in 1913, and then they drop to 26 per cent.; so it is extremely interesting.—Extremely interesting, and there is no doubt that the type of alcoholism, the severity rather of the alcoholic cases, is very, very much less.

16,455. Put quite bluntly, what I want to find out is whether the amount of unemployment which exists on the Clyde and all round that southern part of Scotland has to be taken into account in considering these figures.—Of course I am only considering Edinburgh, but I think probably there are somewhat similar figures in the west, and I think probably unemployment has something to do with it.

16,456. That would fit in with your ideas as to price?—Yes.

Mr. Snell: That is not so pleasing as it might have been.

16,457. Chairman: Is the whisky still of the same potency in Scotland?—No, I think not—much less.

Chairman: That would be another element to take into account.

Mr. Snell: One notices in connection with that that there is an increase in the cases due to poisoning and attempted suicide.

Chairman: Methylated spirit has become a beverage, I am afraid, nowadays.

16,458. Sir Humphry Rolleston: With regard to the early treatment in hospitals, I suppose perhaps the greatest of the several advantages is the much greater facility for correcting any physical infective causes, and that the psycho-therapeutic aspect is perhaps not so marked, although it is a tremendous advantage from the environmental point of view to remove the patient from the depressing conditions?—Yes.

16,459. You, no doubt, go in for psycho-therapy, but the real great advantage in a general hospital is perhaps first the great facilities for skilled examination?—Yes, I think so, both as regards the question of laboratories, and then perhaps even to a greater extent the possibility of getting physicians, surgeons, gynaecologists and so on so readily.

16,460. Psycho-therapy is carried out?—Yes.

16,461. But you lay more stress on the team work, so to speak, than on the specialised treatment?—Yes, I am, in this report, laying more stress upon the team work.

16,462. Sir David Drummond: Have you discussed your methods in Edinburgh with alienists in this country? Have you gone into the question with any of them?—I have discussed it a good deal with Professor Robertson.

16,463. I meant in England?—Occasionally. I know a number of alienists, and I have spoken to them.

16,464. Do you know the views they entertain about this, the possibility of introducing mental cases into general hospital wards such as you have?—Some of them, I think, are very much in favour, as I have heard it expressed, of having a less cloistered form of treatment, than that at present in vogue.

16,465. As far as you have gathered, your methods in Edinburgh would be acceptable in this country?—I think they would be acceptable and feasible.

16,466. Sir Ernest Hiley: Would it be possible to extract from the accounts of the Royal Infirmary the cost of running this ward of yours?—Yes, I think it would be. I would be very happy to forward it.

16,467. Could you let us have that without much difficulty?—Yes, I will forward it to the Secretary.

16,468. Chairman: Then perhaps we should just add that you have been good enough to furnish us with a report, from the British Medical Journal for September 27th, 1924, of an article which you contributed on "Early Mental Disease treated at a General Hospital." You refer us to that article for more elaborate detailed examination of the cases which you have had through your hands?—Yes, the précis is really to a large extent taken from this.

16,469. But we have here in this pamphlet the more elaborate examination of these cases to which you refer us, if we wish further detail.—Yes, fuller statistics.

Chairman: We are very much indebted to you.

(The Witness withdrew.)

Dr. JOHN CARSWELL, F.R.C.P. (Glasgow) L.R.C.P. (Edinburgh) called and examined.

16,470. Chairman: Our next witness is Dr. John Carswell, a Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians of Glasgow and a Licentiate of the Royal College of Physicians of Edinburgh. (To the witness) Dr. Carswell, I think you have been engaged in medical practice, and in lunacy administration since 1878?—That is so, yes.

16,471. You began your career in the Woodilee Asylum, Lenzie, to which you were appointed as Assistant Physician in that year?—I was.

16,472. Then just to take your experience, you were certifying physician in Lunacy for the Glasgow parish from 1889 to 1914, and Lecturer on Mental Diseases at Anderson's College Medical School, and Extra-mural Lecturer in Glasgow University. Then you were engaged in consulting practice, and were Medical Officer for mentally defective children to the Glasgow School Board, and then you were a Commissioner of the General Board of Control for Scotland from 1914 to 1921?—I was.

16,473. On retiring from that office you have been since attached to the London region of the Ministry of Pensions as Neurological and Mental Specialist, and in 1924 you delivered the fifth Maudsley Lecture?—That is so.

16,474. Now we should like very much to have from you an account of your pioneer work in Glasgow. It is alluded to in your lecture, but perhaps you will tell us in a little more detail of the inception of that scheme, and how it has worked in practice. I think it started so long ago as 1889, with a suggestion which you then made to the local authority in Glasgow?—That is so.

16,475. What was your motive in making the suggestion that you then made to the local authority?—The primary motive was that, in common with others, I was impressed with the fact that mental disorders were entirely neglected, so far as the study and systematised knowledge of them were concerned, until the patient appeared as a certified lunatic at the door of an asylum. No provision existed anywhere at that time for meeting the needs of the patient while the patient was still in the condition which he, as well as his relatives and friends and medical men, recognised to be of a serious import in relation to the question of his mental state. Arising out of that conviction was the feeling, not my own, but it was general and had been expressed by others in medical journals before that, that some provision ought to be made to meet the case of patients in that state. It happened that the Barony Parish of Glasgow, as it then was known, with which I was connected, found that its asylum at Woodilee was getting overcrowded, and the question arose therefore in a very practical form: What can be done? And it was with an open mind that my suggestion was received, that what might be done provisionally was to have some investigation made that could be systematically recorded as to the nature of the kind of cases that applied to the inspector of poor for relief in respect of insanity, and that provision should be made for placing certain of the cases under care and treatment without going to the asylum. These were the motives.

16,476. I follow. You were really impressed with the fact that the only passport to treatment was a certificate of lunacy?—Not only was it in law but in fact; there was no early treatment of lunacy. I am speaking of public insanity, the rate-supported insane. Of course the well-to-do people were always at some advantage in that respect.

16,477. But so far as the rate-aided patient was concerned, until he was certified he could not get the benefit of any of the recognised forms of treatment?—Nothing.

16,478. And was it in view of that fact which had impressed itself on you that you made your suggestions to the local authority?—That is so.

16,479. I think your suggestions took two main lines: first of all, that the certification of all cases reported to the local authority as in need of asylum care should be placed in the hands of one responsible and experienced medical officer?—That was one recommendation.

16,480. And, secondly, that the medical officer should be provided with hospital facilities for the temporary treatment of patients who, in his view, might be treated without recourse to legal certification?—That is so.

16,481. So first of all we may say it was preventive, in the sense that certification was to be avoided if it could be?—That is so.

16,482. And, secondly, if and when certification had to be resorted to, it should be in the hands of a responsible medical officer conversant with this particular form of malady?—Yes. I have prepared a supplementary précis which I do not propose to read, unless you desire it, but if you would allow me to put it in, on the evolution of lunacy administration in Glasgow, I would like to read relevant to your question now one portion relating to the appointment of a certifying physician.

16,483. If you please?—I think it is so important that I thought it wise to put it definitely in writing. "The idea of having a special medical officer to examine and where necessary to certify all cases arose out of the obvious necessity for a policy of the nature proposed"—that is to say, the policy of having observation wards and sorting out cases without certification; it arose out of the necessity for the success of such a policy that it should be "carried out by one responsible official who would inform himself of the views of the Council and of the General Board of Lunacy, as well as the limits of responsibility which the inspector of poor would undertake on the advice of his medical officer; because it must not be forgotten that the responsibility for the steps taken to certify or otherwise dispose of a case of lunacy reported to him rests by statute upon the inspector of poor. Clearly, in a new movement, highly experimental, and not free from legal and other pitfalls, the statutory official had to have the assistance of a medical officer who would be disposed to carry out his duties along the lines indicated. I make this observation because the appointment of a certifying physician has been sometimes represented as arising out of the necessity for having an expert opinion. I make no comment upon that aspect, but in the interests of historical accuracy, and for a better understanding of the position, I think it necessary to make this clear." Perhaps I may be allowed to say, notwithstanding that out of the many thousands of cases that passed through my hands during the years I held that office, the Parish Council had not to answer a single letter of complaint relating to all these things. The main thing was that you could not embark upon an experiment of this sort and just leave it haphazard, and get this man or another man to come in and certify. It was a policy clearly thought out, submitted to the General Board of Control, and it involved the official responsibility of an official who was trusting to the medical officer to advise him correctly.

16,484. Then would you say it is an indispensable feature of the scheme of having the provisional treatment of mental cases in hospitals that the certifying doctor should be a specially selected official?—I think so.

16,485. That makes it more difficult, of course, to deal with cases occurring in rural districts, because you may not always be able to get the services of an expert in such parts of the country?—I do not think that difficulty is so serious as it appears. In any case, in England the law provides for the removal of a patient without being visited and certified, a simple ordinary urgency order removes a patient, and he can immediately be examined by a man of experience and expert knowledge, and with the full knowledge of the policy that is being followed by the responsible authorities. I do not know that I make that point quite clear. What I mean is this, that it is easy to illustrate it by the position of a medical officer of health, not only does he know about drains, and other matters connected with that, but he knows the general lines of policy within which he must act.

16,486. Earl Russell: You would remove the patient to a centre anyhow?—That is being done now in England.

16,487. Before he was certified?—In Scotland, and in my practice I always visited the patient at his own home, but in England patients are removed pretty summarily.

16,488. But only on emergency orders?—Only on an emergency order, which is not a real certificate of insanity at all; it is an emergency order, and, as I understand, it is nearly always acted upon in the case of a reported insane person.

16,489. Would you suggest that the emergency order should be applied to all cases to enable them to reach this centre for examination?—I think the public mind in England seems to be so habituated to that procedure, that it would not shock any sensibility in the English mind that a patient should be removed on an urgency order on the certificate of the nearest medical man available.

16,490. Of course there is always the shock to the alleged lunatic himself?—That is so, but as I understand that is pretty well generally the universal practice here. I am open to correction in the matter.

16,491. Chairman: In some parts of the country undoubtedly the urgency order is taken advantage of to a large extent; we have had evidence to that effect?—But in London I think almost all cases are removed to a Poor Law infirmary, and there seems to be no objection to it.

16,492. They are taken there by a relieving officer without a medical certificate at all?—That is so.

16,493. Then they must be brought before a magistrate within three days?—Precisely. There is ample time. If a relieving officer has that power, as I understand he has, to remove a patient reported to him as requiring care on account of the state of his mind, then the difficulty of the rural districts, it seems to me, disappears.

16,494. Except this, that he removes him naturally to the local poor-house. The local poor-house will not, of course, have so complete an equipment, and the patient would not get the advantage of being certified by a specialist, unless he were taken much further away—taken into some centre?—I presume that you are coming to a scheme for the substitution for the Poor Law infirmary arrangement of some kind of reception house; so that when I made the suggestion that the patient could be removed there, I had in mind that it would be not to a Poor Law infirmary, but to a reception house where an experienced man was available.

16,495. Your view seems to be that the task of medical certification should not be in the hands of the ordinary medical attendant, but should, in all cases, be in the hands of some special functionary?—For the reasons I have taken some trouble to state. More on the ground of public policy than on the ground of the more efficient medical skill available, I agree; and would so recommend a scheme of that sort.

16,496. Only in the case of rate-aided patients?—I am speaking entirely of rate-aided patients; and I think the question of the certification of the person who is to be provided for on the direct and sole initiative of his own relatives or other person interested is another problem entirely.

16,497. Earl Russell: Another difficulty that presents itself to our minds necessarily is that in this country you do not deprive the patient of his liberty without a medical order, unless he is dangerous to himself or to others, or is being ill-treated. Now under your system everybody would be in the first instance deprived of liberty without even the sanction or protection of a local doctor?—I am afraid, if I may say so, your Lordship has misunderstood my position; I do not suggest such a system. I was meeting the case of the rural districts. I think that every person who is stated to be insane ought to be visited in his own home, if possible, by a responsible medical officer.

16,498. By your special official, do you mean?—I do not know. If you cannot have a special man you must have the other. But the rural district difficulty has been so frequently stated (I mean outside) that I do not think it is such a serious difficulty as at first it appears; but in any case I would like very firmly and strongly to say that I know of nothing (again I am speaking of rate-aided patients) that would justify even a remote suggestion that the general practitioner has on the whole not been a successful official in the discharge of his duties under the Lunacy Acts towards rate-aided patients, and all other classes of patients. I think the general practitioner in this country has discharged his duties excellently well, and they are disagreeable, responsible and unsought-for duties.

16,499. Chairman: I think that what we should specially like to have from you is your actual experience. I am afraid it will be our task to judge how far the same expedients can be adopted elsewhere. We would like to have the practical evidence of what yourself devised and did in Glasgow. That will be most useful to us?—Yes. In practice it came to this: we had a population round about 600,000; very largely, to the extent of roughly 80 per cent., people who when mental illness afflicted any member of the family, required public assistance. When a medical man became aware of an illness of that character he intimated, or he asked the relatives to intimate, to the inspector of poor. The inspector of poor, or his assistant immediately telephoned to me, and, within a very short time, I visited the patient. Speaking almost in strict accuracy, every case reported every day was seen and disposed of that day. There might be two cases in a day, there might be six or eight cases in a day, occurring all over a fairly widely scattered area. These cases were all visited, examined, reported upon, and disposed of the same day.

16,500. They were brought to your knowledge by the inspector of poor, and was he under an obligation to notify you?—He notified to me during 24 hours of 365 days.

16,501. But I want to know under what authority he notified you. You were the medical officer. You must have held some appointment which had been given to you?—As Certifying Physician in Lunacy to the Parish.

16,502. That is a novelty?—Yes.

16,503. What one wants to get at is how you came to hold that office. Did the local authority institute that office in Glasgow?—Yes.

16,504. And appointed you to hold it?—Yes, they appointed me to hold it.

16,505. What statutory authority or other authority had they for starting such an office?—No statutory authority was necessary beyond this, that they had statutory powers to appoint medical officers to carry on the medical duties of the parish.

16,506. And availing themselves of those general powers, they decided to have a certifying physician for their lunacy cases?—That is so.

16,507. Did they provide a salary and establishment for that office?—They provided a salary—of sorts.

16,508. Sir David Drummond: Did they pay according to the number of cases?—No, I was paid a salary. There was no inducement to certify patients.

16,509. Earl Russell: No fees at all?—No fees at all.

16,510. Had you an office, Dr. Carswell?—I had an office—that is to say, I had a room at the chambers of the parish council.

16,511. And that was the place where you received those notifications from the inspector of poor?—No. I received them in bed sometimes by 'phone in the middle of the night—at any time, and at all times.

16,512. Were any rules or regulations framed by the parish council requiring the inspector of poor to notify you?—Yes.

16,513. And it was in pursuance of those regulations that every case occurring in this large population of 600,000 persons was at once notified to you, and visited by you?—Yes.

16,514. Sir David Drummond: Only the 80 per cent.—only the pauper patients?—Only the pauper patients; 80 per cent. of the whole population came under that category; that is to say, they required public assistance.

16,515. Chairman: We have got an idea in our minds of the system that was inaugurated by you. Then when the case had been visited by you, what was the next stage in the patient's history?—The patient was examined and a responsible decision come to in his own house, and his relatives were seen; the matter was discussed, and it was decided either to remove the patients to the observation wards, or to certify the patient and remove him to the asylum. The removal of the patient either to the one place or to the other was carried out by the assistants, the removing officers appointed by the inspector of poor.

16,516. Then it was really in your discretion whether the patient was sent to those observation wards, or was regarded as a case suitable for immediate certification and removal to an asylum?—Entirely within my discretion.

16,517. Then that class of case visited by you in its home I can understand; but there must be a considerable number of cases, I should think, in Glasgow, of persons wandering in the streets insane?—A considerable number.

16,518. What happened to that class of person?—They were also notified by the police to the inspector of poor, and then the rest of the process is the same.

16,519. But where was the person taken to? He is, ex hypothesi, a person with no home. Where is that taken to in the meantime detained?—He was detained at the police office.

16,520. Is that where you saw him?—That is where I saw him. Perhaps it might be useful to interpose here that supposing a man or a woman were taken out of the river, having attempted suicide, by the police and taken to the police office: there was no intervention of court proceedings or police charges, or anything of that sort. The case was seen immediately by the medical officer of the police, who said "This man is insane, or he is in need of observation," and the police lieutenant, acting on the opinion of the medical officer of the police intimated to the inspector of poor, and I was told by the inspector of poor; and perhaps within a couple of hours the patient was safely in bed in the observation wards, or safely removed to the asylum. No charge of attempted suicide, or anything of that sort was made.

16,521. Earl Russell: Would such a charge get entered on the charge sheet in the police court?—No, it is not a crime in Scotland to commit suicide. In order to regularise sometimes the necessary detention of a patient overnight in the police court, they might enter on the charge sheet a charge of disorderly conduct.

16,522. Chairman: You must not take me as assenting to the view that felo-de-se is not a crime in Scotland. I see how the thing worked. You have not told us yet of the institution of those observation wards, which is a very necessary part of this system. How did they come into being?—I thought I had already mentioned that, owing to the urgency that arose from the needs of the parish by their own asylum reaching a state of overcrowding, they considered what could be done to avoid building a new asylum. Therefore there was a very open mind when, in answer to that enquiry, I suggested the establishment of observation wards, and the sorting out and dealing with patients who might not need to go to the asylum at all.

16,523. Where did you get provision of that accommodation?—To begin with we had to be content with a very small amount of provision in one of the poorhouses of the city. That continued for some years until two parishes amalgamated. You understand the scheme began with the Parish of the Barony. The Parish of the Barony and the Parish of Glasgow in 1889 united, and then we had the 600,000. Prior to that we were dealing with a population in the Barony Parish of 300,000, but in 1889 the amalgamation of the parishes afforded a larger basis, and then the united parish set out on a large scheme of hospital building. They built three large hospitals entirely removed from poorhouses, Stobhill, the Western District Hospital and the Eastern District Hospital.

16,524. These were Poor Law infirmaries?—These were what is known in England as Poor Law infirmaries. We transpose the terms in Scotland. Our big general hospitals (like St. Thomas's) would be called infirmaries, whereas in England you call them hospitals. We call the Poor Law hospitals, hospitals, not infirmaries; so that when you use the term "infirmary," for example, the Royal Infirmary of Edinburgh, is the important General Hospital of Edinburgh.

16,525. Earl Russell: Can you give us any idea, however rough, of the capital cost of these three new hospitals?—At the moment I would not like to trust my memory, but they were regarded as not inexpensive for the provision made.

16,526. £100,000, or half a million, or what?—I think nearer half a million for the three hospitals. Stobhill is a very large hospital. They have 1,200 beds there, or more, and it is on a large village system with wards scattered over a considerable area. The other two hospitals were in the city proper and meant to meet the cases of people just immediately at the doors.

16,527. Chairman: You have told us that they were quite apart physically from any poorhouse, and were infirmaries, as we call them in Scotland, in everything except that they were rate-aided.—They were rate-aided.

16,528. But they had the features, so far as laymen visiting them would observe, resembling those of the general hospital, I take it?—They resembled exactly a general hospital of London.

16,529. And the only difference between them and, let us say, the Western Infirmary in Glasgow, was that the one was dependent upon voluntary contributions, whilst the other was dependent upon rates?—That is so.

16,530. In treatment and in character and in staffing, did they compare with each other on a more or less equal footing?—In these respects they do. Of course, naturally the Western and the Royal Infirmarys of Glasgow get men who have reached the top of the tree professionally as the visiting physicians and surgeons. The others have men of experience, but who are either past the top of the tree or are climbing to the top of the tree; but in medical status they stand very high. The mental patients were provided for in the Eastern District Hospital there in a separate pavilion, not at any of the other hospitals at all.

Dr. JOHN CARSWELL, F.R.C.P. (Glasgow), L.R.C.P. (Edinburgh).

16,531. Sir David Drummond: Not at Stobhill?—Now they are. I shall develop that in a moment. At the outset we had a pavilion for 50 beds, 25 women and 25 men, at the Eastern District Hospital.

16,532. Chairman: Now was that the first ward or block of the type which had been instituted in Scotland?—It was; that was opened in 1904. We were really carrying on one way and another for some years before 1889, before the amalgamation of the two parishes, until the whole scheme could be completed, and this new hospital opened in 1904.

16,533. Then, when the other two hospitals came into existence were they also equipped with special accommodation for mental cases?—No. I have explained that only at the Eastern District Hospital had we the pavilion for 50 patients.

16,534. What is the position now?—The position, as I understand, now is that they still have 50 beds in the Eastern District Hospital, and I think they have 120 beds (I speak from hearsay only) at Stobhill Hospital, and they have now two medical officers, one the certifying physician in lunacy, Dr. Mackenzie, who continues the work at the Eastern District Hospital, and Dr. Anderson, who acts as a visiting physician to the wards at Stobhill.

16,535. Now, after 1904, and so long as you continued certifying physician, was the only provision available to you for observation and treatment this block in the Eastern District Hospital?—That was all.

16,536. Because you had only 50 beds, and I was wondering how far you found those resources adequate?—They were adequate for the purposes we had in view during that period, consistent with the state of opinion in relation to lunacy administration then. The fact that the observation wards proved so successful has given rise to larger views and more open-mindedness, and therefore it was only to be expected that a larger extension of provision would be made. But during the ten years that I controlled these wards I think the 50 beds were adequate for the purpose we had in view at that time, as I have said, consistently with the state of medical and public opinion on the question.

16,537. The purpose you had in view was that in cases which were not immediately declared cases, and therefore not appropriate for immediate certification, the patients should be under observation for a time and treatment in this block; and from there either discharged recovered or, if necessary, sent on to a mental asylum under certification?—That is so.

16,538. It gave you a period for more complete and accurate diagnosis and more observation of the case and deliberate judgment as to its disposal?—That is so, and did more, a very important matter: it gave the relatives and, in some aspects of the case, even the patient, time to realise the situation. The great difficulty in dealing with a mental case is that relatives need time to realise the situation. In well-to-do circles that is more or less easily secured; they can go abroad, they can take the patient to the seaside, they can do lots of things. When it occurs in a working man's home, and the woman who carries the whole domestic burden of the daily routine breaks down, it becomes a matter of urgency, and her husband and others are not keen that the patient should go to an asylum, and the patient is very willing to go somewhere, but would dread going to an asylum. That would be her feeling; I call it dread, it is her dread; and if unfortunately after a month or six weeks' treatment in hospital it becomes obvious that not six weeks but six months, or even 12 months, would be necessary, the patient and her friends have realised then the need for it; and you have met a great public want there in giving these people time to realise the situation and satisfying them that they have got everything done that can be done for them in a preliminary way before they are sent to an asylum.

16,539. Earl Russell: At what stage before certification do the relatives come in touch with anybody, and who is it they come in touch with? Is it the inspector of poor, or is it the certifying physician in this case?—They come in touch with their own medical attendant, and their own medical attendant refers them to the inspector of poor.

16,540. Yes, but I mean before a certificate is made is information present to the mind of somebody connected with the certification as to what the relatives wish, and what the conditions of the home are, and so on?—Yes. The certifying physician has seen the home, he has been there. He sees the patient, of course, regularly, as a matter of treatment, every day, and he sees the relatives, the husband or the wife and others frequently on their visits to the hospital.

16,541. I do not understand that. I thought they were brought to you, and I thought you were the person who saw them in the observation ward?—No, I visit the patients at their own homes.

16,542. You first saw them, not when they were in the observation ward, but in their own homes?—That practice has been somewhat relaxed in Glasgow, and they do now, I understand, remove patients fairly freely in the way that your Lordship suggests. Personally I regard it as of the utmost importance that the certifying physician in lunacy should visit the patients at their own homes. The patient should not be disturbed at all until he is seen by a responsible medical official with all the possible appliances in his hand for the adequate determination of what is best for the patient. That I regard as important.

16,543. Chairman: We have been much interested in the suggestions that we have received that there should be some intervening period between the first discovery of the mental aberration and the ultimate judgment upon the case by way of certification. Various expedients have been suggested for doing that, and we have heard from Dr. Comrie this morning an interesting account of how it is done to some extent in connection with the Royal Infirmary in Edinburgh, which is not a rate-aided institution at all. In Glasgow the problem seems to a large extent to have been solved along the lines that you promoted, which were to have in the rate-aided hospitals observation wards to which patients could be taken for this intermediate period, and there dealt with in one way or another. It does seem to be necessary to get some kind of house, either a reception house or an observation ward, in which patients can be kept for the time being, until they are properly diagnosed and disposed of ultimately?—I thought that was the proposition I was putting before you.

16,544. Yes, that is exactly what you have exhibited to us. That system is still in operation since you left?—It is still in operation and very successful, and I understand that instead of the limit of six weeks, which was considered a great concession to my views, the Board of Health and the Board of Control have consented to a period of six months.

16,545. Tell me how you faced and dealt with one difficulty that of course occurs to one. Many of those cases which you sent to the observation ward must have been fractious and obstreperous, I should imagine?—Yes.

16,546. What authority had you to detain them against their wishes?—No more than you have already heard from Dr. Comrie to-day.

16,547. You did what was considered best from the medical point of view for the patient?—No more and no less; and I think personally it is very little authority that is contained in Schedule G, of which you heard from Dr. Robertson the other day.

16,548. Earl Russell: Were these all dealt with under Schedule G?—No; I presented that to the Board of Lunacy at the time, and they would not listen to it. It was a special arrangement made with the Local Government Board.

16,549. Before certification what is the provision with regard to the maintenance—are they maintained by the rates just as any other sick poor person would be?

Chairman: If they are in a rate-aided hospital they must be, I suppose.

16,550. Earl Russell: Is a contribution made from the parish, or is it all part of the same thing?—It is all part of the same thing. I have prepared this little statement on the evolution of Lunacy Administration in Glasgow. The Glasgow Parish Council is also the Glasgow District Board of Control. It acts like your Asylums Committee of the London County Council. It sits as one body with its own officials, the same officials as the other, and then it sits as another body, the Parish Council.

16,551. Rather as it would be here if the guardians ran their own mental hospital?—Yes, and if they were constituted as the lunacy authority. The parishes in Glasgow did run their own asylums, but they were not the lunacy authority. That is a complicated question.

16,552. Chairman: In law these persons in these wards could not be detained?—In law they could not be detained.

16,553. Yet in their interests in many instances it would be proper that they should be detained, would it not?—In their own interests it was proper that they should be detained.

16,554. And, in fact, were they detained?—In fact they were no more detained than any of you gentlemen would be detained in a nursing home, if unfortunately you found yourselves under the necessity of going there.

16,555. Earl Russell: Is that quite so, Dr. Carswell?—That is quite so.

16,556. Chairman: Suppose one of these patients in an observation ward at Stobhill, or in the Eastern District Hospital, had announced that he was going out, and was going to throw himself in front of the first train, what would you do?—Certify him and remove him to the asylum.

16,557. Or suppose that he was in bed, and in a state when it would be exceedingly dangerous for him to be allowed out, would you not keep him down in bed?—I would if he was to be well to-morrow or next week. I would not send him to the asylum if I knew that, with a little restraint or treatment, in the course of a week he would be all right. He would thank me for doing it.

16,558. What we are considering is this, whether it may not be necessary as an accompaniment of this method of treatment that there should be compulsory powers of detention as well, because otherwise you will find yourself open to the criticism that you are breaking the law by detaining persons without any authority?—I am very conscious of that. At the same time I am very conscious of the need for keeping such hospitals free from any form of legal interposition in restraint of the patient. I do not think the difficulty is so great as it appears. I would rather take the risk, as I took it in the hospital wards, of having to certify a patient and remove him to an asylum, although I was very unwilling to do it, believing he would be well if he stayed there for a month or so. But if he insisted on going out, I would rather take the risk of doing that than have the other nine patients out of ten feel that they were in a place where they were detained. I think the atmosphere of the hospital is so easily engendered in these cases, and was successfully engendered, so much so that we almost never had the difficulty of having to consider whether I should remove the patient under a certificate to an asylum, solely for the reason that he wanted to go away—very rarely.

16,559. Earl Russell: And you would run the risk of actions by half-recovered patients, who had been discharged, against the managers for unlawful imprisonment?—We have run that risk. We ran that risk for ten years under my care, and the responsible authorities have never even had to answer a letter of complaint all the time.

Earl Russell: But this was Scotland?

16,560. Chairman: I am afraid we might have actions in England, judging from the experience in the Law Courts?—I fancy you have to put these matters a bit more to the test before you can be sure that is really the position. My experience is such that I am satisfied that 70 per cent. at least (I do not think I am putting it too high) of the patients who require treatment—again I am speaking of rate-aided patients, and it makes an important difference whether you live in a room in a licensed house or in a villa—70 per cent. of them are quite willing to remain in a hospital provided the accommodation is good and the attention is skilled and sympathetic.

16,561. I think one would recognise that on all hands the great bulk of the patients are both willing and grateful, but the question is with regard to those who are not; and it is the recalcitrant and difficult person who gives all the legal trouble afterwards?—Then I think he must be certified. Then you are running risks also; but I do not think the risk of establishing a hospital on the lines suggested need be complicated with the other risk that arises out of certification.

16,562. You would eliminate as far as possible all the legal element from it, and emphasise the medical element?—Yes.

16,563. And you think this transitional period ought to be as free as possible from the idea of compulsion?—It ought to be entirely free. I give that as a very deliberate opinion. If it is complicated with a legal position or the restraint on the patient, you will introduce elements into the general administration of that hospital that will adversely affect it.

16,564. To complete the thing logically you suggest that in this period of observation the patient should be under no legal compulsion to remain, but, if occasion arises for compulsion, then that should be dealt with by obtaining certification?—Compulsory detention.

16,565. Yes. I will make my point again. The patients in this institution are not to be compulsorily detained. They have been recommended to this place by the certifying officer; they have gone there, and if occasion should arise for their compulsory detention there against their declared wishes then you would say the expedient is to have them certified?—That was my expedient, and I know of no other. I hope I understand you, that you are excluding the question of any possible restraint as meaning the same thing as detention.

16,566. It is very difficult to know at what point the patient is being, in point of fact, made the victim of a breach of law in his own interests either in private practice or in an institution. But your conception of the system is that the patient who goes there should be under no legal form of restraint or compulsion whatever?—That is my view.

16,567. Should be an inmate of the institution exactly as the ordinary inmates of the institution are situated?—That is my view.

16,568. Then if occasion should arise for detaining a patient against his or her wish, you would propose at that stage to invoke certification?—I would.

16,569. Sir David Drummond: Only if they are certifiable cases?—Clearly, I am assuming that.

16,570. There are many people who elect to leave the hospital although they are not certifiable?—Oh yes, I am assuming that. The instance it arose out of was the man who says, "I am going away and shall throw myself in front of the first train."

16,571. Chairman: The other alternative method was the suggestion that there should be a period of observation in an institution without certification, but accompanied by some modified form of control which would be placed in the hands of the head of that institution, so as to obviate risks that might arise through patients exercising their freewill and deciding to go away without any notice, when it was bad for them to go away, escaping, and possibly committing suicide. It was suggested that during the transitional period there might be some modified power of control, but that, I gather, is not in concert with your view?—These considerations do not appeal to me when I keep in view my own personal experience.

16,572. Earl Russell: You do not want the patient to feel under duress—that is the prominent feeling in your mind?—I do not wish them to feel under duress of any kind. I think it is bad for the conception of the hospital idea, bad for the nurses and the doctors—bad all round. It will deteriorate the whole idea.

16,573. Chairman: Then would you give us some very instructive figures that you have?—Might I, Sir, before getting to that, emphasise the importance of paragraph 4?

16,574. About getting the cases at the early stages?—Yes, and also a most neglected class of case, namely, the depressed patient, and the confused and bewildered patient, due mainly to bodily exhaustion conditions, who are regarded as “not bad enough” for an asylum—(a horrible phrase that has crept into modern language, as bad as “the borderline case”)—“not bad enough” for an asylum, but who nevertheless constitute a large body of suffering people many of whom commit suicide while in a state manifestly requiring skilled treatment. That I consider is a most important consideration. Every medical man in practice among the poorer classes knows the kind of case. A woman marries at 18 or 20; by 35 she has had perhaps eight or nine children and, as they used to say in Glasgow, buried six of them. She has carried on all her social, physiological; and financial functions, under very poor conditions, and she breaks down; she gets dull, apathetic, bewildered; her house becomes neglected; her man comes home at night and there is nothing prepared for him; the fire is out. The doctor sees her, he does not know what to do with her; she is “not bad enough,” they say, for an asylum, neither is she in a literal sense. The existence of the observation wards in Glasgow had the effect of educating the medical mind into the knowledge that a woman of that sort could be reported to the inspector of poor just as though she were insane, knowing that she would be taken into the observation ward and treated there, but not certified insane; and that constituted a considerable number of the cases. And when you come to consider the statistics I would like to stress the fact that we reached the class of case that was urgently in need of care, and was never provided for, not even in asylums; and therefore with that remark on that, I think, very human element, a very necessary element from the medical view, I wish to look at the figures to which you refer.

16,575. Earl Russell: How does your percentage of certified cases compare, say, with the London figures?—That I cannot tell you. I have never been able to understand the London figures.

16,576. It ought to be a good deal less?—It ought to be a good deal less, and is.

16,577. Chairman: Your figures are rather instructive. Using the round numbers, I think the cases intimated numbered over 1,000 per annum in Glasgow. (I am taking page 2 of your précis.) Of these there were admitted to hospital during the ten years 1904 to 1914 an annual average of 640?—Yes.

16,578. Then of the cases treated in the hospital an annual average of 261 were discharged recovered and 111 were discharged improved—an average annual total of 372 cases, out of 640, who were treated without recourse to asylum care. That is the record of the work?—That is so.

16,579. And from that one can infer that, through the provision of probationary hospital wards, more than half of the cases there treated for mental disturbance succeeded in escaping certification altogether?—That is so.

16,580. And in addition you are enabled to treat, as you have just explained, a class of case for which at the moment there is no provision at all elsewhere?—Yes.

16,581. Included in those statistics are the class of case you have been describing?—That is so.

16,582. Then may we take it that the result of your experience in Glasgow has been that the system you then inaugurated in association with the Poor Law authority, the special wards for the probationary treatment of the mentally disordered, has succeeded there in solving this problem of treating persons who are mentally disordered, without certification and so as to avoid certification?—In so far as it is possible to do that.

16,583. Yes; you think that is the practical solution which you devised, which commended itself to the authorities in the West of Scotland, and which in practice seems to have worked very successfully?—That is so.

16,584. Earl Russell: Out of your 1,000 cases there were 360, I see, who were not admitted to hospital. Could you tell us a little about those cases? I take it none of them would have been certified in the ordinary course under the English practice?—They were either sent direct to the asylum or not certified at all.

16,585. That 360 may include some sent direct to the asylum?—Yes. That brings out the point that a sorting out did occur in the patient's home. The patient might go direct to the asylum.

16,586. Chairman: That is when you used your discretion in the first instance?—In the first instance I said, “This patient must go to the asylum direct.” But 640 of the 1,000 came into the hospital. For the rest nothing was done at all. That is to say: Sometimes it happened a man and his wife quarrelled and it depended upon who got first to the inspector of poor to report the other insane. Nothing was done there.

Chairman: Then you will refer us for further discussion of the matter to the copy of the lecture which you have been good enough to send us, the fifth Maudsley Lecture, which is in the hands of the Commission. We are very much obliged to you for telling us about your experience in Glasgow; I think it is most instructive for our purpose, if I may say so.

16,587. Miss Symons: Did you find that you could not keep many of the cases long enough; I think you said you could only keep them six weeks when you were there?—That was the understanding. We could, if a patient was recovering, by application to the Local Government Board get that period extended for another six weeks in any particular case, where we showed that further treatment would be advisable.

16,588. But where a longer period was necessary, did you find that many of those patients availed themselves of it—I suppose you did not, because they were all rate-aided patients, and they could not go as voluntary patients—or did you have voluntary rate-aided patients in Glasgow?—We had no voluntary rate-aided cases.

16,589. I think you heard Dr. Comrie's evidence, and he said he believed a great many more patients would have availed themselves of the voluntary provisions if they had been extended to rate-aided patients. I wondered if you had experienced the same difficulty in Glasgow?—I think a considerable number of patients of the rate-aided class would go to asylums voluntarily.

16,590. Take, for instance, the woman you gave us as an instance. Supposing that she was found to require a much longer period than six weeks or six months, it would seem rather hard if she could not go as a voluntary patient, though she might be willing to do so, and would have to be certified?—We would admit that difficulty if she is going to get well. It is only bad workmen who complain of their tools; you can always use your tool. Sometimes we meet a difficulty like that, I do not mind telling you, by getting the husband to take the wife home for a week, and bring her back again as a new admission. You have got to have resources; you cannot do a big thing like this with such a variety of circumstances to consider without having a little elbow room and a little common sense.

16,591. Earl Russell: Quite; you made the law your servant instead of your master?—That is so, as far as it was possible to do it in reason, but manifestly we could not lay ourselves open to risks. But a case such as you instanced just now we would neither send to an asylum nor turn out except in that sort of way.

16,592. Mrs. Mathew: I was sorry when you said that such a case would have to be reported to the inspector of poor. Is there no way out of that?—I expected to have been taken over points like this at some detail, and I would be very glad to offer the Commission my opinion upon that question. I have a very strong conviction indeed. I have indicated in my précis very briefly that in my view the proper authority for receiving intimation of the occurrence of insanity is the Public Health authority, and not the Poor Law authority at all. That opens a very large question. I had devoted a great amount of thought and consideration to it. I find little support from medical men in asylums, because they do not want the medical officer of health to get his nose into asylums; I find no support from medical officers of health because they do not want to be bothered with it. In Glasgow the Poor Law authority has discharged its duty magnificently, and I think, speaking generally, that can be said in Scotland as a whole. Take, for example, a woman who turns ill from an infectious disease: she is taken into an infectious diseases hospital run by the municipality, simply by the doctor attending the patient intimating to the medical officer of health that the patient is ill, and requires to go to an infectious hospital. When she develops mental trouble in that hospital, the doctor has to send for the husband and tell the husband that he must go to the inspector of poor and get his wife removed to an asylum at the instance of the inspector of poor. Well, I think that is a hardship, and I do not see that the admission of patients, or the treatment of patients, should be complicated by a Poor Law qualification, a poverty qualification; and I know no way out of the necessity that presently exists for the first executive official connected with the case being a Poor Law official. I know no way out, unless you turn to the other constituted authority, namely, the Public Health authority. That might be worked along with the suggestions made by the Medico-Psychological Association in favour of a mental board of health. The mental board of health would practically be the county council for functioning in respect of mental health as they function in respect of general questions of public health; and I would favour that. Therefore my answer to your question is, that there is no legal way just now of getting the necessary public assistance otherwise than through the Poor Law. I would suggest that that might be altered, but I put in this consideration that personally I have no complaint, but rather the reverse, to make of anything in my experience of the Poor Law authorities in Scotland, except in that legal and technical sense in which it is undesirable that a man should have to go and apply to the inspector of poor for assistance for his wife, or vice versa.

16,593. Would you favour a regional mental medical officer of health, one for a region or a district, or a town, as the numbers permitted?—I think local authorities should be empowered to take a step of that sort if they thought proper. I have no great belief in compelling local authorities to do certain things. They must be compelled to do some things, but I have a very great belief in allowing local authorities a considerable amount of discretion and initiative in their own servants; and if you qualify your question whether I am in favour of the appointment of a regional medical officer for mental health, with the consideration that local bodies should be empowered to do that if they think proper, I would agree.

16,594. Then about the mentally defective children—do you have them mixed up with the older mental defectives or lunatics in hospitals?—No. In the case of mentally defective children the provision is varied and efficient in Glasgow. The education authority runs special schools very successfully, so far as special schools can be called a success at all. The Parish Council, or the District Board, provides for uneducable children in a special home at one of the asylums—idiot children. They also provide, by payment to an institution at Larbert, an educational institution. The Catholic Church found some conscientious difficulties in allowing children to be sent to imbecile institutions that were not run by the Catholic Church, and the Board of Control, when I was a member of the Board of Control, suggested that they should run some for themselves. They instituted one in Glasgow, and they have now, I think, a very much larger one, and it is also successful. Then there is a voluntary body as well. We favour the idea that every possible means should be put in the way of the public to provide facilities for the care of these children, because the human element enters so largely that you have to provide a great variety of facilities, and that is the policy that is run in the west of Scotland.

Sir Humphry Rolleston: Dr. Carswell has raised with Mrs. Mathew a very important point about the relation of the Public Health authority to mental disease, and he says in his précis, "I consider that the questions connected with the causes and prevention of insanity are in substance the same as those which arise in the course of public health administration." Now I was wondering whether on a subject which is rather difficult it would not be helpful if perhaps Dr. Carswell would be so kind as to submit a memorandum on what that means, and what it implies, so that we may have it in writing and study it at our leisure.

16,595. Chairman: I should welcome that myself. I think you have some of the material there?—I have some of the material, and may I put in this note on the evolution of lunacy administration in Glasgow? I shall be delighted to prepare a memorandum on that question alone.

Chairman: Thank you.

16,596. Sir David Drummond: Just one point. I do not know whether you can offer an opinion, but can you conceive it possible, Dr. Carswell, that such a scheme as you have worked in Glasgow could be introduced in this country, a comprehensive and adequate system dealing with these cases, without enormous capital outlay?—Considerable—I would not like to say enormous.

16,597. But it would entail that—new buildings?—It would entail, I am afraid, new buildings in most instances. Personally I think London could be divided into five or six different districts, each with a properly equipped hospital of 200 or 300 beds, and provide for all the cases occurring in that area, out of which might be sent the patients who required to go to the asylum. With regard to the country, I am constantly met with the country difficulty. I have been over the whole of the south of England and the Home Counties, and I have looked at these conditions. The facilities for getting from one place to another are so great, and the idea of travelling about is so familiar to the people that personally I do not think in practice the rural district difficulty would be so serious as it appears to be. Take, for instance, a place like Ipswich. At Ipswich they have a borough mental hospital. Now I am treading on delicate ground. They have also a county mental hospital not far away. I do not see any difficulty in utilising the borough mental hospital entirely for the whole rural district.

16,598. Chairman: We have only to thank you very much for your assistance, and we shall expect the advantage of this memorandum which you are going to prepare at Sir Humphry's suggestion?—If you please.

16,599. Chairman: This morning we are to have the evidence of the Medico-Psychological Association of Great Britain and Ireland, which is to be tendered to us by certain representatives of the Association who have been appointed for the purpose. Gentlemen, we have all read with great interest the memorandum which has been prepared on behalf of your Association, and it has occurred to me that we should take the same course with regard to this memorandum as we did with regard to the memorandum of the British Medical Association, that is to say, that we should incorporate in our minutes the text of your *memorandum, at least the first 18 pages of it, in order that we may have a record of your considered opinion upon the matters which we have before us. I think it is desirable, where an Association of your responsibility has formulated its views in a document of this sort, that we should have on record your recommendations in the actual words which the Association has chosen, rather than that we should have a more or less detailed examination upon all the points. We should I think reprint the actual memorandum for reference, and it should be also available to the public. That will be without prejudice to our discussing with you this morning certain points in some detail. I should like to know if that course commends itself to the representatives of the Association?—(Dr. Cole): Quite. We esteem it a great honour to have the memorandum printed. Personally, I should like to have the views put forward by Dr. Goodall also incorporated.

16,600. There are, as you know, considerations of economy in the matter of printing, and I thought we might print the recommendations dealt with specially in the memorandum; but we may consider putting in the whole of it. The first 18 pages contain the official memorandum of the Association, as I understand?—That is so.

16,601. Which are formal recommendations?—That is so.

16,602. First of all, I think we might have from you a short account of the history of the Association. I see it dates back as far as 1841?—That is so. It was formed, first of all, in Oxford by a certain number of medical superintendents of asylums, as mental institutions were called then, one of whom was Sir Charles Hastings, who was also one of the founders of the British Medical Association. It was felt that the time had come in which psychological medicine might be advanced by having an Association of Medical Officers of asylums, for the exchange of ideas, and soon afterwards a Journal was founded for the publication of professional papers and discussions, which Journal was first of all called the "Asylum Journal," and afterwards became the "Journal of Mental Science." This Journal has existed since the year 1853 as a quarterly periodical. The original object of the Association was in no way analogous to a trades union, but purely to promote the care, treatment, and recovery of patients suffering from mental disorders and to encourage research into the causes of insanity and its prevention. Dr. Bucknill, afterwards Sir John Bucknill, was a shining light in those days, and he insisted that our work should be a department of mental science, that we should take up the scientific aspects of insanity as well as purely administrative problems. In later years our activities have been extended in promoting the education and examination of medical men and women and nurses engaged in the practice of psychiatry. We have altogether between 700 and 800 medical practitioners, some of them women, who are actively interested in psychiatry. Each member pays an annual subscription of a guinea and a half, and this includes the current number of the "Journal of Mental Science." We have medical officers of both public and private institutions, and also men from the prison service, men and women employed under the educational authorities, professors and lecturers in psychiatry, and men and women in consulting practice, and also in general practice.

16,603. Then your activities, as far as I can gather, fall into two compartments. You have first of all, the practice of the art of psychiatry, and then you are concerned with education and research?—Certainly.

16,604. These are the two main divisions of your work?—Yes.

16,605. And associated with the latter is your important work in the training of nurses?—Yes.

16,606. Perhaps at the outset I might ask a question which interests me. You have since 1891 conducted examinations for a certificate in mental nursing, and have, I see, awarded your certificate to more than 18,000 male and female nurses?—Yes.

16,607. Would you tell me how your system of examination and certification correlates with the system which is set up under the recent statute—I mean the Nurses Registration Act of 1919?—Would you mind if Dr. Collins answered that?

16,608. If you please. What struck me was that there would appear to be some overlapping between the two certifying bodies. Are they related in any way?—(Dr. Collins): The syllabus for the two examinations is practically the same, with the exception that in the case of the Nursing Council the preliminary examination is an examination common to all nurses. It is an entrance examination, and the qualifying period, which in their case is 18 months, can be taken at any hospital where nurses are taught.

16,609. For the purposes of your certificate is it not necessary that the nurse should have had any general hospital experience?—No, it is not necessary, but she must have had three years in the same mental hospital. The General Nursing Council do not require that three years to be spent in the same place, neither do they require candidates to have been three years in a mental hospital at all.

16,610. It is perhaps rather an embarrassing question to ask you, but how do the two certifying bodies rank?—The certificate of the General Nursing Council has never yet been given. The first examination is to be held in June this year.

16,611. It strikes one as rather unfortunate that there should be two systems of certification for nurses, and that some of the nurses might take the one method, and others take the other. It would have been very desirable, if possible, to have one recognised qualification for the nursing profession in mental science?—Considerable effort has been made in that direction. One of the difficulties is money. We can conduct an examination for the cost of 15s. to the candidate; in the case of the General Nursing Council eight guineas is required. That is a very great difference which the nursing side feel very deeply.

16,612. Of course your examinations have been organised by your own Association, and are less perhaps encumbered with difficulties?—We do the work of examining for practically nothing, particularly the viva voce examination. The General Nursing Council are not willing to accept voluntary service; they want to have the control over their people that they have by paying them.

16,613. It did strike one as rather unfortunate that there should be two recognised certificates. Competition, of course, may be desirable between two bodies who grant diplomas, but, on the other hand, the overlapping seems perhaps a little unfortunate; but you say efforts have been made in the direction of bringing the two together?—There was a meeting called by the Ministry of Health between the General Nursing Council and the Medico-Psychological Association; the Association was given certain rights with regard to the General Nursing Council. An Advisory Committee was formed, half of whose members belonged to the Nursing Council, and half to our Association, and their recommendations are recommendations to the General Nursing Council with regard to the final examination in mental nursing only.

16,614. Sir Humphry Rolleston: When Dr. Collins said that the Nursing Council charged eight guineas, partly because they wished to have control of their own people, did that mean their examiners, or what?—Yes. I mean they did not care for the principle of voluntary examiners, I think. We examine them viva voce without fee. If you have to travel you get a small sum for expenses, but beyond that we examine without fees. But that is what I believe is not feasible under a public body like the General Nursing Council.

4 May, 1925.] Dr. R. H. COLE, M.D., F.R.C.P., Dr. M. A. COLLINS, O.B.E., M.D., Dr. E. GOODALL, C.B.E., M.D., F.R.C.P., Dr. J. R. LORD, C.B.E., M.B., Dr. W. F. MENZIES, B.Sc., M.D., F.R.C.P., Sir FREDERICK W. MOTT, K.B.E., LL.D., M.D., F.R.C.P., F.R.S., and Dr. R. WORTH, O.B.E., M.B. [Continued.]

16,615. I was wondering whether the expression you used was quite happy?—They are a public body, and I think the feeling is—mind you, I am only speaking of the feeling I have gathered from conferences which I have been to—that they ought not to have examiners who were not paid; but that is only the feeling I have gathered. At any rate, they are not able to reduce the fee.

16,616. Chairman: The contrast really between the two is that the Nursing Council is a statutory body which, of course, is bound to administer the Act which Parliament has handed to it. I understand your system of examination has been constituted by your own body and is therefore a voluntary arrangement; and there may be some difficulty in bringing into relationship two bodies whose origin is so entirely different, yours being purely a voluntary organisation, and the Council under the Act of 1919 being a statutory authority; but it is satisfactory to know that relations have already been established between the two bodies in this matter?—There is another point I might make, namely, that we nominate the examiners for the final examination for the Nursing Council to appoint. I mean there is a good deal of working together, and, of course, this is the first examination.

16,617. Quite. The thing is merely in its inception just now, and possibly in the course of time it may be possible to assimilate the two?—Up to the end of June this year our certificate is registerable by the General Nursing Council, but it will cease to be so, and one must wait and see what effect that will have.

16,618. The whole thing is really at the present moment merely at its initial stages. You were in the field no doubt, first of all, with the qualification. Then the question arises as to what should be the relationship between the voluntary system and the statutory system. That seems to be the practical problem to which you will be addressing yourself no doubt later on?—We propose to continue our examination for the present.

16,619. I quite understand that.—(Dr. Cole): There may be fusion in time, we feel.

16,620. It was merely the practical point that in a profession like mental nursing it seems desirable that there should be one standard of certification that should be recognised as the universal standard in the profession, and that may ultimately come to be so?—Yes.

16,621. I understand, gentlemen, that the preparation of the evidence which you are to give us to-day was entrusted by the Association to a Committee, the names of whom are set out in this print before us, and that the gentlemen who are here this morning are those who have been deputed expressly to give the evidence before us?—Yes. Amongst these names you will see there are some men connected with public, and some with private institutions, and some in practice.

16,622. We fully recognise the representative character of the Committee, and of the gentlemen here this morning, and we also fully recognise the very representative character of your Association in all matters connected with psychiatry in this country?—And you will notice we also take into our fold mental deficiency, which we have always regarded as part of psychiatry, although strictly, it is not within the Reference of this enquiry, I understand.

16,623. It is sometimes a little difficult to keep the compartments distinct, as you can imagine, but technically it is not within our purview?—You notice we grant a certificate for mental deficiency.

16,624. So I notice. Now our Reference, as you are aware, falls into two parts. The first part relates to the amendment of the existing law relating to the certification, detention and care of patients, while the second part relates to the very important question of the treatment of mental disorder without certification. On the first part of our Reference, namely, the state of the existing lunacy laws in those matters to which I have referred, might I ask you, as persons conversant with the working of the code, how you have found it in practice?—I think some of us feel that there is an unnecessary amount of records to be kept, and unnecessary searching enquiry into certain things. We quite recognise that safeguards, as they are called, are necessary, but we almost feel they are a burden in the carrying out of the Lunacy Act—that they really interfere with the treatment of mental disorder. That is our point. Our principal point is that the Act, such as it is now, prevents us from treating mental disorders in the way we consider medical science at the present day dictates; that the Act actually prevents the treatment of insanity in the proper way.

16,625. Of course you will realise that the law as it stands at present is a compromise between the purely medical aspect of mental disorder and the legal aspect of it. It is a balanced statute which endeavours to reconcile those two not always very easily reconcilable aspects of the same problem. On the question of the machinery of the Act, that is the actual machinery for certification, detention and discharge, what have you to say as to its adequacy in providing safeguards against abuse?—We think that they cannot be improved upon except in one or two minor respects. One is that we feel that probably a second certificate in doubtful cases is a proper safeguard. At the present time the majority of pauper patients, rate-aided patients, are received on only one certificate of a doctor, whereas of course for private patients, or paying patients, two are necessary. We feel that is a safeguard.

16,626. We will develop that a little later. But have you found that under the existing code, the methods, the avenues by which patients may reach mental hospitals, are rather difficult and complicated—the different methods which you know obtain with regard to the lunatic found wandering at large and the lunatic who comes through the workhouse and the different classes which are provided for under the statute? Have you found in practice that those different methods of dealing with cases cause any embarrassment?—We, who are conversant with the Lunacy Law, do not mind that very much. It seems to work fairly well.

16,627. We have had a good deal of evidence to this effect, that the persons who actually have to carry out the executive part of the Act, people like relieving officers, and so on, have found themselves embarrassed by the complexity of the programme of certification, and the selection of the particular method to be applied in a particular case. There is a considerable choice of methods of procedure, as you know?—Quite so.

16,628. Do you think that the preservation of those various methods serves any particular purpose, or would you be in favour of a simpler programme of certification?—Perhaps Dr. Collins will answer that question. (Dr. Collins): We do, under our Recommendation 28, recommend the same procedure for all patients.

16,629. Yes, I have noted that, but I thought that that was probably referring rather to the assimilation of the rate-aided patient to the private patient?—But you are referring now to the rate-aided patients?

16,630. I am really referring to this, that there are so many different methods provided under the statute, and in the case of rate-aided patients particularly there are several methods under the Act of 1890; it seems to present a rather embarrassing choice to the medical man?—Under our recommendations from No. 28 onwards, by the provisional order or the two certificates we should cover, I think, every case by either of those methods.

4 May, 1925.] Dr. R. H. COLE, M.D., F.R.C.P., Dr. M. A. COLLINS, O.B.E., M.D., Dr. [Continued.
E. GOODALL, C.B.E., M.D., F.R.C.P., Dr. J. R. LORD, C.B.E., M.B., Dr. W. F. MENZIES, B.Sc.,
M.D., F.R.C.P., Sir FREDERICK W. MOTT, K.B.E., LL.D., M.D., F.R.C.P., F.R.S.,
and Dr. R. WORTH, O.B.E., M.B.

16,631. That is really a general answer to my question. We are considering the simplification of the code; at the same time, we wish to preserve every necessary safeguard.

16,632. With the provisional order which is reviewed at the end of three days, or the two certificates, you will not need any special provision for people wandering at large, because they would be dealt with under the provisional order?—Yes.

16,633. Then you recommend as an Association one method for dealing with all classes of patients, private and rate-aided alike?—(Dr. Cole): A simplified procedure.

16,634. It did occur to one that the Act of 1890 contains the survival of a good many previous legislative efforts, some of which are really unnecessary at the present day; and if one could get an adequate code, but a simpler code of certification, it might facilitate the working of the statute very much, particularly in the hands of those subordinate persons who have to do the actual executive work, before the cases reach your hands at all. I am impressed with that very much and relieving officers have told us of their difficulties in administering the Act?—(Dr. Collins): Perhaps these figures will help you as to how the Act works now. These figures refer to 244 patients admitted to Chatham in 1924; 196 were admitted under one certificate, either as paupers in receipt of relief, or in such circumstances as to require relief for their proper maintenance; 7 were admitted as lunatics wandering at large, and 29 as not under proper care and control with two certificates. So that you may take it that the Act works so that the majority of people are brought in under one certificate; although as I read the Act, I do not think personally that that was the intention.

16,635. That really supports the suggestion I am making, that the Act is a little ambiguous in some of its provisions. It is very undesirable that there should be any ambiguity, or that people should be at a loss to know what is the proper procedure to adopt. Things have to be done quickly, and it is desirable that the system should be as simple as possible. I am sure that will have your support as an Association?—Yes.

16,636. Now returning to your memorandum, I understand that your Association has from time to time taken up the different aspects of the problems with which you are concerned and has reported upon them; and that the present recommendations are the outcome partly of those previous reports, and partly of a general revision of the whole position in anticipation of our meeting to-day?—(Dr. Cole): That is so. When it was announced that a Royal Commission was to be appointed, we formed our Committee, and we looked up the work we had hitherto done. There is a very important report on the status of the British Psychiatry Committee, of which there is a short resumé on page 4. Then in 1918 after the War—and during the War—there was such a revival of feeling in the matter that the medical profession and the public seemed to realise that lunacy in many cases could be managed without certification, although of course the bulk of the cases in the Army could be managed under military law which is more drastic than the civil law. Still it gave us an opportunity to press what we have been urging for many many years, that there should be some revision of the lunacy law for the initial stages of mental disorder.

16,637. I observe on page 5 in your comment on the lunacy law you express this view: "The Association is of opinion that the vast majority of the community, including patients, is grateful for the protection afforded by the existing Lunacy Acts, and that the safeguards they provide against abuses and illegal detention have on the whole proved satisfactory"?—Yes.

16,638. But, on the other hand, in your opinion the statutes have "failed to keep pace with medical progress, especially in regard to the treatment of the initial and most curable stage of mental disorders." I may take it, I think, generally, that the subject in which you are most anxious to assist us is that second topic, namely, the introduction of new legislation to deal with incipient cases without certification?—That is so.

16,639. That is really the province in which you are specially fitted to assist us?—Yes. We would like to make the statement that with regard to a compromise between the legal and medical professions, we do really feel that the lawyers have had the greater share in regarding a person as possibly shut up unnecessarily, and the public needing protection, rather than regarding the patient as a sick person who requires treatment. It is very rarely in the Lunacy Act that any reference is made to the person being ill and requiring treatment and what is the best thing to cure the person. The chief concern seems to be whether he is a proper person to be there, in a place that is under suspicion as it were; and the whole Act reads in that way, as if it were an undesirable place, in which a person should not be unless he is qualified to be there as a person either dangerous to himself or to others, not as a person who is ill and requires treatment to get him well again. That is our point about the Act really and truly, that it is too legal and too little medical. I merely mention this in connection with your remark, Sir, when you suggested a compromise between the medical and the legal professions.

16,640. You mean the compromise has all been one way?—Yes.

16,641. On the other hand, you have to recognise this, that we are dealing with a subject upon which the public are very sensitive. The question of the liberty of the person is naturally a topic where the legal element has to come in. In the case of other ailments, where the patient is a willing co-operator in his own care and treatment, the position is easier. The difficulty here is that you must, in the interest of the patient himself, use certain methods of restraint which, if not authorised, would be illegal. That is where the difficulty arises?—We quite realise that.

16,642. And therefore the tendency of the code may be more prominently towards dealing with the safeguards against improper detention than looking at it from the medical point of view, with which the Legislature would naturally not interfere. The Legislature would not interfere with the treatment of patients, because that is a matter for the medical profession; but it is naturally concerned with the safeguards for the liberty of the person. Probably that is the reason why it has, as you say, a more legal atmosphere?—Yes.

16,643. Now on page 6 you formulate certain leading views which we shall find worked out in detail in your recommendations, and the very first matter to which you refer is the desirability of the establishment of clinics for mental disorders?—Yes.

16,644. On that subject what is the practical view of yourself and of your colleagues as to how the thing should be started?—I will ask Dr. Goodall to answer that.

16,645. Dr. Goodall has, I know, had considerable experience already in developing this method. Perhaps he will be good enough to give us his views? We are practical people, Dr. Goodall, and wondering how we can best follow out your idea into actual practice?—(Dr. Goodall): Of course, we want these clinics (I believe I am speaking for my colleagues) in association with the general hospitals.

16,646. That is the first proposition; let us examine it for a moment?—Where there is a medical school, of course, a fortiori.

16,647. That assumes the existence of a general hospital?—Yes.

4 May, 1925.] Dr. R. H. COLE, M.D., F.R.C.P., Dr. M. A. COLLINS, O.B.E., M.D., Dr. E. GOODALL, C.B.E., M.D., F.R.C.P., Dr. J. R. LORD, C.B.E., M.B., Dr. W. F. MENZIES, B.Sc., M.D., F.R.C.P., Sir FREDERICK W. MOTT, K.B.E., LL.D., M.D., F.R.C.P., F.R.S., and Dr. R. WORTH, O.B.E., M.B. [Continued.]

16,648. And the association with it of a clinic for mental treatment?—Yes.

16,649. One difficulty that occurs to one at once, of course, is that general hospitals are not to be found everywhere; they are to be found at the larger centres of population. How would you propose to deal with the cases in the more remote parts of the country. Would you have them sent in to towns, just as they are sent in at the present moment for other ailments?—In the appendix which deals with my evidence I draw attention on page 28 to Lord Dawson's scheme: "How these maladies could be brought into the comprehensive scheme for the hospital treatment of disease in general, which was described in the Interim Report of the Consultative Council on Medical and Allied Services." That Report envisaged a whole network of hospitals, great and small, from the main one in connection with the medical school through lesser ones in towns where there was no medical school away to outlying districts where there was a cottage hospital. All these were to be linked up by a motor system, and disease was to be treated from the periphery to the centre, and vice versa; and the scheme, which that Committee proposed, is illustrated best in Gloucestershire; so I would treat them everywhere.

16,650. Sir David Drummond: Do you think a clinic apart from an indoor department would be of much service?—I have had five years' experience of an out-patients' clinic in psychiatry at the Cardiff Royal Infirmary, which was set up in the hope that an indoor clinic would be established when the Early Mental Treatment Bill (as I hoped) would pass. If it had not been for that hope, I would not have advised it or worked it, because I consider it entirely a one-horse show. I can say that seven-tenths of my patients want to come in immediately.

16,651. That was our experience in Newcastle. We established an outdoor clinic without any in-patients department?—I keep it up in the hope that it is the thin edge of the wedge, and I do not want to withdraw it. There is a large After-Care Association in connection with it now.

16,652. Chairman: There are certain precedents in connection with the treatment of tuberculosis and venereal diseases which have now been taken over by the public health department in most of the large towns; I suppose, you have separate institutions with out-patient departments as well as in-patient departments, and patients resort to these places for treatment. If you take any large general hospital in a town, both the in-patients and the out-patients are generally drawn from a considerable area round about. Out-patients come in and stay for a time to get the benefit of the treatment. Is it your view that these clinics should be established in separate institutions comparable with the tuberculosis institutions, or that they should be more closely associated with the general hospital and become simply a department of the out-patient and in-patient administration?—Yes; I would have them part of the administration, but not contiguous; I would have them as they have on the continent, as at Munich, for instance, with which I am familiar. That place is in a separate pavilion, like the gynaecological pavilion and that for children's diseases, with a certain amount of ground around it; it is part of the University system, but it is separate in that way and not contiguous. You must have arrangements for mental cases which you cannot have in the general wards of a general hospital.

16,653. Do you think the general hospitals throughout the country would be disposed to co-operate?—I have been informed that that is very doubtful, whether they would be so disposed; I do not know why. I believe in time that opposition would break down. I may tell you that at Cardiff the City Corporation gives £2,000 a year to the Cardiff Royal Infirmary, and has five representatives on the Board.

I asked the Secretary particularly, and he says, "Yes, they are there, and they are welcome there." They are practically helping to support the place already, and I fail to see why a local authority should not co-operate with the committee of an infirmary—I do not think there is anything in it—in time.

16,654. When you speak of the general hospital, are you thinking of the hospital that is supported by voluntary contributions?—Yes, as at present.

16,655. You are not thinking of the Poor Law infirmary at all?—No; I would rather it had nothing to do with the Poor Law.

16,656. I would like to follow that idea out with you. We find the general hospitals which are supported by voluntary contributions and endowments scattered throughout the country in large centres of population. One trouble of course is that they are generally very full up already, and their accommodation is pretty well taxed?—Yes.

16,657. If a mental clinic were to be associated with them, that would mean more building, of course?—Yes.

16,658. And further expenditure?—Yes. The Early Mental Treatment Bill provided for the co-operation of local authorities in that matter, and it will not be done, I think, without their co-operation. Abroad, as you know, it is the State; here, I take it, it would be the local authority.

16,659. If grants of money were made either from Imperial sources, or from local sources, do you think that that might encourage the general hospitals to undertake this branch of the work?—Yes, I presume so; I think it would.

16,660. We have had some evidence as to the association in Edinburgh of mental treatment in the Royal Infirmary with the general hospital work, and very remarkable results were communicated to us by Dr. Comrie?—Yes, I have read them.

16,661. Is it on those lines that your Association think a solution of the problem might be found?—I say on page 29 of this appendix: "These patients"—these were Dr. Comrie's patients—"were treated in wards of the infirmary which are reserved for early mental cases and cases of incidental delirium. Such an arrangement is not the equivalent of a separate neuro-psychiatric department ad hoc; it is by no means the ideal." The ideal to my mind is what is found on the Continent, especially in Germany, and also in the United States, at such an institution as the Boston Psychopathic Hospital. As we know, you must have arrangements for exercising and occupation which cannot obtain (so far as I can see) in the general hospital; there is not enough scope for fresh air and exercise.

16,662. The treatment, in short, of mental disorder requires a different type of equipment?—Yes.

16,663. Do you not think that that difference in equipment points to the desirability of separate institutions rather than to the association of the treatment with the general hospital treatment?—Yes, as I said, separate pavilions of the same administration.

16,664. If you take, for instance, any of the well known hospitals here in London, some of which are right in the town with no ground round them at all; such places would not be suitable for the treatment of mental cases?—No. London is a problem in itself, I think. The same applies to Berlin. They had a clinic at Charlottenburg, in Berlin. They work a neuro-psychiatric clinic right in the middle of Berlin.

16,665. But they would not have the facilities for gardens and exercise grounds?—They have a certain amount, like Bethlem have, for instance, here, but of course the problem is easier of solution in the big provincial centres.

16,666. Is your primary conception that these clinics should, if possible, be associated with the general hospitals in administration but that they should be conducted in separate buildings?—Yes.

16,667. With separate equipment?—Yes.

16,668. Then, I suppose, on the staff of the general hospital, just as at present you have the surgical staff and the medical staff, you would also have some person specially conversant with this branch of medicine, who would have his own residence, and so on, as a department of the hospital?—Neurology ought to be worked with psychiatry in my opinion as it is done abroad, and there would be a professor of psychiatry and neurology; he would be on the University staff, one of the ordinary professors, and all the medical staff of the hospital would be available for the clinic, and vice versa; and the same would apply to the nurses.

16,669. The other idea of having separate institutions has already been developed to some extent, has it not, in connection with tuberculosis?—Yes, I believe so.

16,670. It appears to present a choice of methods as to whether it is better to have it in association with the general hospital or to have it as a separate institution by itself, separately run?—Anything that tends to promote a differentiation between the neuro-psychiatric clinic and the general medical clinics is greatly to be deplored in my opinion; they should be recognised as one organisation; there is nothing peculiar about the mental cases. That is the trouble we are suffering from.

16,671. You find an assimilation in the public mind of mental disease to other forms of disease?—Certainly.

16,672. You do not want even a geographical discrimination in the treatment?—No. Might I just read this note to you: "If recent and curable cases of disease, now known as mental disease, because they chiefly manifest themselves as disorders of conduct, are isolated from the main mass and dealt with under special conditions, they will be looked upon as something apart and fail to enlist the live interest of the medical and nursing professions; the resources of medicine will not be brought to bear on them. The combined experience of men skilled in different branches of medicine must be available and regularly applied, as in the case of other kinds of disease in the same social class, in connection with the general infirmaries."

16,673. You wish to eliminate as much as possible the deterrent that at present exists which is associated with asylums?—Yes. I would have no recent or curable cases of mental disorder at the asylums except such as were an overflow, because the clinics could not accommodate them.

16,674. Let us turn for a moment to the other side. I was looking at the clinic from the point of view of its association with the general hospital, not as a separate entity by itself; what is to be its relation to the existing asylum system of this country?—There would be no relation except when cases got incurable or dangerous or violent; they would be transferred to the so-called mental hospital.

16,675. Do I understand that you would exercise some selection of the cases presented to you at your clinic, some of them you would regard as appropriate for remission to the mental hospital at once?—All early and recent mental disorder cases would be available for a clinic in my opinion.

16,676. Would this stage of the clinic be interposed, so to speak, between the first onset of the ailment and its ultimate disposal either by cure, as it might be in your clinic, or by remission to a mental hospital, if it were a case where permanent treatment was required?—Yes, that is my view; the detention would take place at the asylum, and then the lawyers can reign supreme.

16,677. I do not know that that is desirable, I hope not, but one likes to figure all these things out practically. Let us just consider what you have in mind: an unfortunate citizen is attacked with a certain amount of mental disorder; he himself is possibly still quite capable of realising his condition, or his friends are. You would figure that case being brought, in the first instance, to a clinic in a centre?—Yes.

16,678. A clinic associated with a general hospital or an independent institution; the case would arrive there in the first place. Then do I understand the case would be in the hands of the doctor in that clinic for a period?—Yes.

16,679. Would you receive all classes of cases, including dangerous cases, right away into this clinic?—You might have to restrain a dangerous case, of course.

16,680. We will come to the question of the legal difficulties in a moment; but from a doctor's point of view would your first aspiration be to have the handling, as a doctor, of all cases before they were ultimately transferred to asylums?—Certainly, acute manias and acute melancholic cases ought to come in.

16,681. But would not you need in this clinic to have practically a duplication of the equipment of the asylum, because you would have to have provision for seclusion and restraint and treatment which, although devoted to the earlier stages of the disease, would be a duplication of what you would find in the asylum?—The staff would be so much more heavy, both medical and nursing, that you would not want in practice any restraint or seclusion.

16,682. You contemplate in the clinic a much more intensive treatment of the cases, because you would have a larger nursing staff and a larger medical staff?—Much larger medical and nursing personnel.

16,683. There is one aspect which rather commends itself even to a layman like myself, that is that so many cases of mental disorder are associated with physical ailments, and in a general hospital you are able to call in the consultant in any department to advise upon the case at once. Is that one of the features that commends this to you?—That is a very strong point indeed. The Boston Psychopathic Hospital is one of the finest things there is.

16,684. We are indebted to you for sending us a copy of their report?—If you look at their staff there are only 110 beds there. That is really a psychopathic clinic.

16,685. It is a very elaborate one?—There is the chief medical officer; two medical officers; four assistant medical officers; only 110 beds. Then in the Psychology Department there is a chief psychologist, one psychologist and two assistant psychologists. In the Bio-chemical Laboratory there are the chief of the laboratory, two laboratory technicians and four student internes. In the Pathological Laboratory there are one assistant pathologist and one laboratory technician. In the Department of Therapeutic Research there are a chief of department and one assistant physician. In the Out-Patient Department there are the chief of the department; two assistant physicians and one clinic manager. Then there is the Social Service Department, with a head social worker and four social workers. In the Occupational Department there are the head occupational therapist and one occupational therapist. In the X-Ray Department one roentgenologist and one technician. A Dental Department. The Consulting Staff is composed of specialists in the major branches of medicine and surgery. The Nursing Department consists of the superintendent of nurses, assistant superintendent of nurses, one chief supervisor (male); three supervisors (2 male, 1 female); 12 head nurses (male and female); 28 attendant nurses; and two hydrotherapists (1 male, 1 female). Of course, we know what there is in asylums here.

16,686. I was certainly impressed with the completeness of the staff for the treatment at Boston Institution. I think we can hardly hope to have institutions of that sort all through this country for some time, Dr. Goodall.—I think the Maudsley Hospital is very well equipped. Sir Frederick Mott would know.

16,687. That is one?—That is one, but that is the way to staff these places.

16,688. Sir David Drummond: Might we hear Dr. Goodall upon the preliminary steps of introducing these patients into the clinic? Would they come to the clinic entirely in a voluntary way, sent by the doctor as ordinary patients—is that your idea?—Yes. We agree, I think, with the Early Mental Treatment Bill in the main, with certain modifications; the patient would come with one medical recommendation, and in the case of the non-volitional patient there would be a notification to the Board of Control within 24 hours. We did not even think the minister of religion or the justice was necessary in the non-volitional case, as the Early Mental Treatment Bill had it.

Chairman: But following out Sir David's point, I can understand the case of the patient who is at home, who is afflicted with an incipient mental disorder, coming to the out-patient department and getting advice, and possibly being alleviated and not requiring to become an in-patient. Then I can conceive also the class of case where the onset is of a much more violent and sudden character, when something has to be done at once; that person is not capable of forming any judgment at all of what is right for him. How would that case reach you? It obviously could not be treated as an out-patient case; it plainly must be dealt with at once in some place where there are facilities for detention. Would you figure that case also being brought to you by the medical attendant and relatives?—Yes, I do not see why not, and notified to the Board of Control within 24 hours.

16,689. Be it so. That person would be brought by the relatives or the doctor called in. Then take the case of the wandering lunatic: that person would be brought to you by the police, I suppose?—Yes. These things are all done at Utrecht, as you may know; they are done every day there.

16,690. Then your conception really of this clinic is in one of its aspects a clearing house?—No; I think that is a mistake. As far as possible I would avoid that, if by that is meant that cases are to be sent on to the asylum from there; it ought to be an institution for the treatment and cure of the patient.

16,691. But cure, unfortunately, does not always happen?—No; you would have them there for six months, and renewable for other periods of six months as we recommend.

16,692. Let us assume that the patient has reached you through one or other of the avenues which you have described, that the case is regarded as one suitable for out-patient treatment: then I suppose the patient would attend at regular hours, and get advice, and possibly medicine, and so on, and be treated like any other out-patient case. If, on the other hand, the case was one for in-patient treatment, I suppose the patient would be taken in and assigned a bed in one of your wards?—Yes.

16,693. And in that way you would assimilate the treatment of mental disease to what happens with regard to patients coming to an infirmary, as we call it in Scotland, or a general hospital, for any other ordinary ailment?—Yes.

16,694. And people would be sent in from the country districts to the centre to get the benefit of either the out-patient or the in-patient treatment as required?—Yes.

16,695. Would it be necessary to have institutions all over the country? Because at the present moment the centres, the general hospitals, cater not merely for people from their own towns, but they take in people from a wide area. I know the Edinburgh Infirmary has patients from Orkney and Shetland. Is that what you conceive should be done, or do you rather propose a network system all over the country?

—The main clinic would be where the medical school was and the University. I start with that, certainly, then radiate out from that.

16,696. Let me put a practical difficulty that appeals to one: supposing in some remote part of Wales a person suddenly becomes maniacal: there is no University town and no clinic within, let us say, 100 miles of that place, and the transport facilities are difficult. How are we to deal with that case. Something has got to be done at once, observe?—Yes. Under the Dawson scheme there would be a district hospital there on the cottage hospital lines, and my idea is set out in the "Lancet," which is quoted here, that there should be sufficient psychiatric facilities at that place to deal with the patient until he could be got by ambulance to the next town.

16,697. It would be fairly primitive in a cottage hospital, would it not?—What else could be done with him?

16,698. Take the Poor Law infirmary?—I consider that would be the periphery of the system. Even there he could be reached by practitioners (that plan allows a practitioner to attend his own cases), even there he could be reached by experts from the main clinics sent out to advise.

16,699. Mr. Micklem: What would you do in the case of a patient under treatment who wanted to go home from one of these clinics?—Let him go. If he is not fit we could do other things.

16,700. Sir Humphry Rolleston: With regard to the admission to the in-patients department of the mental clinic of really violent cases, non-volitional cases, who really are very maniacal, would it not be better for a patient in that condition to be sent for the time being to a secluded portion of a mental hospital? Would that be desirable for the sake of the other patients who, although you do classify them in an ideal in-patients department of a mental clinic, would to a certain extent be influenced by the knowledge that these violent cases were there?—Yes, that has been urged, I know; it is urged by the National Council of Mental Hygiene that people are put off from going to the clinic because they know that the real insane are there. But I wrote to Professor Winkler at Utrecht, and he said there is nothing in it at all, in his experience. I do not see why that case should not be treated in a clinic. It is a matter of opinion. I know he would be taken into the Munich clinic and treated, and by proper treatment he would be effectively calmed down, by hydrotherapy and things of that sort.

16,701. Sir David Drummond: The same objection would apply to acute pneumonia and many other cases which we admit to general hospitals?—With that, of course, goes the question of trusting the medical profession. In Munich, when I asked them what they would do as to restraining a patient or secluding him, or putting him in a bath with a lid on, if necessary, the medical officer only stared at me and said "That is a matter for the medical director." But I am afraid in this country things are not sufficiently advanced to trust the medical profession to that extent. There is not that respect for learning that there is abroad.

16,702. Mr. Micklem: Supposing you were satisfied that the patient was of unsound mind, would you let him go?—Then provision of course exists in the Early Mental Treatment Bill for notification to his relatives to remove him; the relations usually act; if they will not, some authority can be called in.

16,703. Chairman: For the moment I want to have in my mind a clear conception of your programme. It is that all cases of mental disorder, whether merely incipient or pronounced, which at the present moment are dealt with under the existing law, should, in the first instance, reach your clinic? Is that right?—You might get a case of paranoia, systematised delusional insanity, pronounced, it might be lasting for months, it would not do to take him there; we know he is incurable at present.

16,704. If you are going to have classification there must be some person at the portal of this clinic; is there to be a preliminary sorting out of cases, or is there to be a reception of all types of cases in the first instance, subject to disposal later?—I think the experience of the Maudsley Hospital comes in there. I do not know whether you have examined Dr Mapother yet?

16,705. Not yet?—But they do select their cases. Most cases are sent to them by medical men, as a matter of fact in practice; others they have themselves to determine upon, as you say, in an emergency.

16,706. From the point of view of the simplification of working, the reception initially of all cases would probably be much easier to work. All cases pass through your hands, and upon some of them an early judgment could be pronounced to the effect that the cases were not suitable for treatment in your clinic; these would leave your clinic and pass into the ordinary type of institution. But is it your conception that there should be a preliminary classification such as takes place at Maudsley, and a rejection of some cases, or that all cases should, first of all, reach the clinic?—I think it would be going too far to say all, but the great majority undoubtedly. Some cases would have to be rejected as soon as they are brought. There would have to be a staff there to decide it, as in the case of the Boston Psychopathic Hospital.

16,707. Some person of authority would require to pronounce that judgment?—Yes; you could do it with sufficient medical staff.

16,708. And what would happen to the case rejected as unsuitable for treatment in your clinic? What would be the criterion of rejection, and what would happen to the case?—Of course we do not want cases to be dealt with under the Poor Law, so that the present methods of disposing of the case would not apply; but he could be certified in some suitable place, which we hope would be under the local authority, and taken charge of by the officer of the local authority, and removed to the mental hospital.

16,709. But that would necessitate the institution of yet another place. We would then have not only the asylum at the one end of the system and the clinic at the other, but also some intermediate place where persons could be kept awaiting certification, because rejected by the clinic. Is not that an over elaboration?—I do not see why they could not be certified at the clinic, but I believe at Maudsley they do object to it.

16,710. We have heard evidence to the effect that it brings an unhappy association to the institution; the patients say, "We come here voluntarily, and find ourselves detained involuntarily," and that the association is unfortunate and operates as a deterrent. Have you any view on that?—Of course the population of this country seems to be so frightfully sensitive on these matters. I cannot understand why these things work in other countries.

16,711. You know, Dr. Goodall, we have got to take our country as we find it and, after all, if I may say so, in this matter there is a good deal in sentiment, you know?—Yes.

16,712. In fact, I should have thought that persons conversant with mental disorder would know that sentiment is often one of the determining factors in the treatment of the disease; and you have to conciliate the feelings of patients in these matters if you wish to attract them?—Yes. That presents a difficulty as to where that certificate is to be signed, I admit; but that in itself is not enough to invalidate a principle of such importance.

16,713. Not for a moment, but then you appreciate that, sitting as we are here and envisaging the possible recommendations we may make, we have to produce something that is more or less complete, and we must not leave ragged ends; we must have something in our minds which deals with the whole position.

16,714. Sir Humphry Rolleston: I cannot help feeling that if so many patients are going to pass through, and have their case decided there, that may eventually rather prejudice the reputation of a mental clinic. From what you say, in spite of the slight protest you make, do you not make it rather into a clearing house?—I do not think many cases would be rejected from there. (Dr. Lord): There is a paragraph in our report, on page 10, which deals with Dr. Goodall's difficulty. That is a paragraph unanimously agreed by the Association.

16,715. Chairman: "Special clinics to act as 'clearing houses' may be necessary in large districts, but it is hoped that if the bulk of the occurring mental disorder were overtaken while in its early stages, such 'clearing houses' would be a disappearing factor in the mental health service of the country. Admission of suitable cases direct to mental hospitals is part of the policy of the Association." You see, Dr. Goodall, one can appreciate the desirability of a clinic where hopeful cases and early cases are treated; but if it is to be a place where all cases are received, it seems to me you get into a different region altogether, and have some difficulty in relating such an institution to a mental hospital. What would be the effect on the mental hospital if it was known as a place to which only persons went who had passed through a clinic and were regarded as practically hopeless cases? You would have a very depressed population in your mental hospital, would you not?—(Dr. Goodall): I do not think clinics, however abundant, would be able to deal with all these early and recent cases. Abroad, undoubtedly, cases are admitted into the German and Italian asylums direct, because there are not enough clinics to deal with them, so that they will always have interesting cases; and it is certain they do, because the amount of scientific literature produced from those institutions is very considerable, although it will not compare with what is produced from the clinics. They must be having the cases, but as regards the ultimate reputation of the asylum, I must admit I am not concerned greatly about that; we cannot help that with the march of progress.

16,716. The principle was that there should be the mental hospital for the treatment of the cases which are properly certifiable and certified, on the one hand; and, on the other hand, a system of clinics where cases may be treated of a different type, or at least of a recoverable type or an incipient type, with a view to the avoidance of certification. I could imagine two types of institutions of that sort working together with goodwill quite satisfactorily; but that would involve that into the one class of institution there should go only the cases which were selected because they would benefit by the clinic and might escape certification; whereas a case, which an alienist was able to say at once would not recover in a clinic, ought to be disposed of without going through the clinic, unless you are going to use it as a clearing house. Which is the principle in your mind?—That last case you referred to should go to the mental hospital at once.

16,717. Direct?—Yes.

16,718. That does involve then, as I say, some criterion to be applied at the outset, a criterion which will enable you to discriminate between cases suitable for clinic treatment, and cases suitable for mental hospital treatment?—In our memorandum we advocate that patients be voluntarily admitted to mental hospitals as well, as in Scotland.

16,719. Suppose we take it that way. Certain cases are asylum cases, and certain cases are appropriate for the clinic. The asylum would be the proper place for the established case of mental disorder?—Yes.

4 May, 1925.] Dr. R. H. COLE, M.D., F.R.C.P., Dr. M. A. COLLINS, O.B.E., M.D., Dr. E. GOODALL, O.B.E., M.D., F.R.C.P., Dr. J. R. LORD, O.B.E., M.B., Dr. W. F. MENZIES, B.Sc., M.D., F.R.C.P., Sir FREDERICK W. MOTT, K.B.E., LL.D., M.D., F.R.C.P., F.R.S., and Dr. R. WORTH, O.B.E., M.B.

16,720. It would also have a certain number of voluntary persons, as you recommend?—Yes.

16,721. The clinic, on the other hand, I gather, is to contain only persons who are there voluntarily?—No, non-volitional cases as well.

16,722. Non-volitional cases because they are possibly recoverable cases?—Yes, people who cannot, for instance, sign a paper, although we do not want the volitional case to sign any paper. These non-volitional cases would not be able to sign, but still they should be admitted.

16,723. You might, of course, have a case of acute mania of a very transitory type where certification would be a most unfortunate stigma, because recovery was indicated at a very early stage: such a case would benefit by treatment in a clinic?—Or a case of stupor.

16,724. Then you get at once into this region, that such persons are not capable of co-operating in their treatment, and they must be detained, whether they like it or not?—Yes.

16,725. It is at that point that Mr. Micklem's observation applies. Do you contemplate in your clinics possessing a certain amount of legal power of restraint?—Yes, such as was given under the Early Mental Treatment Bill—six months.

16,726. Lord Onslow's Bill?—Yes, we want to continue those periods of six months, if necessary.

16,727. These persons then who enter your clinic, because they are themselves capable of appreciating the benefits they are to get there and wish to come in, or those who are not non-volitional cases but are recognised by their medical attendant and relatives as suitable persons for your clinic and are admitted by you on that footing, would all be there subject to this, that if they wished they could leave, but would require to give you 72 hours' notice—that is Lord Onslow's Bill?—Yes.

16,728. Is that your contemplation?—Yes.

16,729. Now just follow that out a moment. Here is a general difficulty on which I should like to have the collective opinion of you gentlemen. It puzzles me a good deal as a layman, to be quite frank: the existence of mental disorder connotes a certain amount of mental disturbance affecting the will power and the intelligence; one must assume some disturbance. Is a patient who is in that condition capable of an act of will in the same sense as an ordinary sane person is capable of an act of will, that is to say, appreciative of the circumstances and appreciative of what he is doing? I should have thought that you must have found that many of the cases which purported to be voluntary or were represented as being voluntary were not really voluntary in the sense of being expressive of a full will, an appreciative will. What do you say about that, Dr. Goodall? The difficulty of it, as you see, is that the intelligence is to some extent upset. I do not suppose the judgment of any of us is so good when we have even a bad headache as it is when we are perfectly fit?—Although we do not want them to sign documents, if they have sufficient so-called volition to sign a paper, let them sign a paper. If not, then this Mental Treatment Bill provides for a minister of religion, or a justice, to give a recommendation; but we say a medical recommendation and notification to the Board of Control would be sufficient.

16,730. What I have in my mind is a very large topic, and that is whether you can have a voluntary patient at all in the full sense of the term?—As I say again, it is a matter of trusting men who, in our judgment, of course, I need hardly tell you, should be trusted. They are trusted abroad for this very work every day.

16,731. Yes, but I am not very fond of phrases which are colourable phrases; and a voluntary patient, it always seems to me (to some extent at least, and it must be so in some cases), is rather a contradiction in terms, because, first of all, he is a person whose will is to some extent abated.—Many of them have full volition, of course; others are betwixt and between.

16,732. It does not commend itself much to my mind (this is, perhaps you will say, a lawyer's point) to take an assent from a person who is in a pathological condition. As a lawyer one would not ask a person who is in a state of mental disturbance to perform any of the usual acts. You would not think it fair to take from him a contract giving up his property if he was in a state of mental disorder; but you propose to take from him a contract to give up his liberty when he is in a state of mental disorder, and one rather has the feeling that the voluntary system may be apt to become rather a system of camouflage, that it professes to be voluntary, whereas the case is not really voluntary, and that it might be more frank to say the case is to be treated, whether voluntary or involuntary, in the clinic?—Yes, but I think in practice the mass of the insane are seeking protection, and they are only too glad to have protection, advice and prompting. You can do things by advising them and gently guiding them, and they like it; they feel in need of sympathy and support. A person may come and say "I resent that, and I resent this," and in the end walk in quite easily, with very tactful nurses and doctors. Very few people offer real resistance. I suppose then it would be against the liberty of the subject, but they could be dealt with on the ground that they need support, and are glad to have it.

16,733. But I would like to have the comment of you eminent gentlemen before me upon that problem which has been in my mind, as to whether the description of these persons as voluntary patients is really not a misnomer? What do you say to that?—(Dr. Cole): As a matter of experience I have admitted many voluntary boarders. The vast majority of them have, in a common sense way, what we call volition. Of course it raises a large metaphysical problem, the problem of will; after all it is a matter of susceptibility to suggestion in different individuals who are regarded as normal, but there are a great many people walking about with but little will power; some of them may almost be said to be automatons and a good many insane patients have volition well marked.

16,734. Of course a great many cases are quite able to recognise their position and the desirability of treatment; but there are cases when you get into the borderland, where I should have thought it must have been rather a matter of conscience with a medical man as to whether it was fair to take an assent from such a person, because really his state of mind was not such as to enable him to appreciate one way or the other, and to take an assent which is not a real assent but really a formality is undesirable.—(Dr. Lord): An assent to what?

16,735. An assent to treatment and detention.—He comes and offers himself voluntarily for treatment and he is not refused. The treatment is there for him, if he wants it.

16,736. Suppose the person is brought by relatives and the patient is observed by you not to be able to express any will at all. What would you do?—He is brought for treatment in the same way as a patient suffering from fever. If he expresses any opposition then of course he must be taken away and dealt with under the Lunacy Acts.

16,737. Mr. Snell: I would like to ask Dr. Cole if he finds that a person has an all round volition, or whether the volition in these cases of which he speaks is restricted to certain departments of the mind?—(Dr. Cole): No, I mean an all round volition in the vast majority of cases. We want particularly to provide for people in whom the will is to some extent obscured, delirious cases, which may be regarded as people who have no choice; they give no expression of volition when given a choice to do one thing or another; those cases ought to have special machinery to enable them to be regarded as voluntary patients, or at any rate as not needing full certification.

16,738. Chairman: That is quite clear. One can quite see that cases may be treated, and ought to be treated, short of certification, if they are recoverable cases, but one is thinking of the régime under which they are to be there. The suggestion is that they should be there first as voluntary patients—that is to say, persons who recognise their state sufficiently to desire treatment. Then there should be another class, involuntary persons who will benefit by treatment and may recover, but in whose case the detention is involuntary. How are you to deal with that class of case, where there is a necessity for restraint in a clinic which contains persons who are not certified? There must, must there not, be some form of power over those persons in their own interest? I mean, must not the doctor have some power of control over such patients? Take the case we figure of an attack of mania, acute but recoverable, a case eminently suited for treatment in a clinic, and a case which will probably, after a very short time, recover—that person must at the moment be subjected to restraint, and possibly severe restraint?—(Dr. Lord): Are you thinking of mechanical restraint?

16,739. Yes.—It is practically never used now. If you search the English hospitals through you will find practically none of it in the last 10 or 15 years.

16,740. Sir David Drummond: That is not quite what we have heard?—(Dr. Goodall): A fortiori in a clinic with a strong personnel you would not want any mechanical restraint.

16,741. Chairman: Supposing that person wants to throw himself out of a window?—(Dr. Lord): He would be taken care of by nurses or treated by the doctor.

16,742. You are referring to mechanical restraint in the technical sense of the Rule?—Yes.

16,743. I should have imagined that you must exercise a very considerable degree of physical restraint upon patients just as you would in the case of pneumonic delirium; you would hold your patient down?—I wanted the position to be clear as to what sense you are using it in. If you are using it in the sense of medical restraint by means of baths, nurses, appropriate remedies by means of diet and other methods, restraining excitement, well and good; but if you mean by mechanical restraint tying up or trussing up a person, or something of that sort, that is gone in nearly all asylums.

16,744. Let me put it in another form: the right to detain. It is perfectly obvious that the case I figure of an acute mania ought to be detained. Call that "detention." Now "detention" is illegal without authority of some sort. I think your view would go so far as this, that there should not be certification, or that certification is unnecessary because a patient is merely going to be treated for his illness by a doctor?—My view is the view of the Association, that perhaps for some trifling period, which the public officials and others concerned could not very well object to, the case for detention ought to be decided upon, whether it is recovering from an acute mania, or beginning an acute mania. After a certain period of enquiry, which we put at three days, and in America is put at ten days, you have to decide one of three things: (1) Will the patient stay in hospital voluntarily on the advice of his friends and the hospital? (2) You may put him that question, but he may not be able to understand the question, or to answer it. What are you to do?

16,745. What could you do with the second case?—You have got to consider him as a child in the eye of the law; you have got to do what is good for him. But (3) he may say, "No, I will not stop, I am perfectly sane." Then you hand that case over to the legal authority. They say, "This man shall be restrained or detained," and hand him back to the medical authorities. It is quite clear. There is no ambiguity in our minds on the subject.

16,746. Then it comes to this, that all the persons who are in such places of provisional observation and treatment as you figure are theoretically there voluntarily?—That is right.

16,747. There is no legal interposition with regard to their case at all?—When a person is admitted for acute mania in America, for instance, there are ten days for that person to make up his mind to remain voluntarily, or if he will not make up his mind or objects to detention, then the legal authority is communicated with, and they come in and decide what has to be done.

16,748. Again let us be clear. The inmates of this clinic, I take it, in your view are persons who are to be for the time entirely in the hands of the medical profession, that is to say, there is to be no legal interposition at all?—Yes.

16,749. The legal interposition may come in later if required?—Yes, immediately you have got to act in opposition to the patient's will.

16,750. Or without the patient's will?—His active will; then the doctor's province ceases, and the lawyer comes in and says to the medical man "Well now, he must clear out; this is a case no longer for you," and the doctor discharges him.

16,751. Again it looks to me as if the clinic were, to some extent at least, a clearing house?—A clinic must be a clearing house on discharge at least, whatever it is on admission.

16,752. But you do not desire any form of qualified legal power during this period in the clinic? Some witnesses have suggested to us that, short of certification, it might be desirable possibly for the protection of the doctor, possibly for the protection of the patient, that in the clinic stage there should be some legal power accorded to the medical man in charge to restrain or to detain?—Yes. (Dr. Goodall): The Early Mental Treatment Bill gave power to detain for six months.

16,753. On the person contracting to do so?—(Dr. Lord): On notification, and the authority can come of course at any time and see the case. (Dr. Collins): There is no detention in this Bill at all.

16,754. Chairman: Except the 72 hours?—There is no detention. It really means the patient who is not unwilling can be allowed to remain in an institution for six months. It is Clause 4 of the Mental Treatment Bill; there is no detention except the 72 hours.

16,755. And the obvious purpose of that is, that if the case is one that ought to be detained but does not want to be detained, the 72 hours gives you an opportunity of communicating with the authorities?—Yes. (Dr. Lord): Our recommendation 3, if you will look at it, is "That voluntary patients should be received, and also that provision be made for the reception of non-volitional patients for a limited time without certification."

16,756. And without any legal powers?—Except such as will be given us.

16,757. The question is whether you think as an Association that it would be desirable that while the patient is in the clinic he should be dissociated from the law altogether, or whether you would regard it as desirable to have some modified power of detention short of those powers which you obtain on full certification?—(Dr. Cole): I might inform you that originally in 1911 we thought of asking Parliament for powers for detaining patients in clinics, but since that time we have come to the conclusion that it is useless to ask Parliament to give the medical profession power to detain patients except under a legal authority, and we do not want that for the establishment of clinics. Therefore all we want in these clinics is to have voluntary patients and the delirious patients, the patients who have no will power, that is to say, they would not want to leave, and can easily be induced to stay; and any patients who object to be there should be discharged at the end of 72 hours.

16,758. I follow your principle?—We think it is useless to ask Parliament to give the medical profession the power. (Dr. Lord): The important point is that we do urge that with regard to all cases of the non-volitional type, it should be necessary for the clinic or the doctor at the head of the establishment to notify the central authority.

16,759. That is the precaution you suggest?—That is the precaution we suggest.

16,760. Of course we have had from Dr. Comrie his experience in Edinburgh. The patients who are treated in the Royal Infirmary at Edinburgh are none of them certified, although I gather some of them might be certifiable. It is rather striking, if one looks at this very interesting paper on the Utrecht Institution, to see that Dr. Winkler, at page 18 of the pamphlet, says: "One may ask if I have the right to retain such patients against their will. The measure is so salutary for the patient and his family that I never discuss it. Without doubt I have the right to declare these patients momentarily insane, and to ask legal authorisation to send them to an asylum, which never is refused. But I ordinarily do not. In this way nearly all transient psychoses recover in the clinic, without the stigma of having been insane." That is, I will not say an evasion of the law, but just giving the go-by to the legal side of it, by saying: "The patient's interest is the main thing, and I treat my patients there without bothering about the law"?—(Dr. Lord): We should not propose to repeat that in England; that might do for the Dutch mentality, but it would not do in this country. (Dr. Menzies): I think there is a class of case you are losing sight of which in my opinion should be admissible to a clinic, and that is a certified case which has to go there for some physical disorder, say for an operation for appendicitis.

16,761. Such a case might be sent to the clinic from a mental hospital?—What I should like to see is that the committal order is not broken by transference to the clinic for a week or two.

16,762. That is a piece of machinery that would be very desirable: that a patient in a mental hospital, if you please, a certified case developing appendicitis, where the facilities for an operation did not exist in the mental hospital, should be sent for the time being for treatment in a general hospital and then taken back?—Taken back quite freely. I am afraid I have been doing it myself without due regard to the law; it has now been brought to my notice that I have been acting illegally.

16,763. Your paper is most helpful to us, but I always like to think out the proposal in its practical aspects, and I want to get really down to the bed rock of the thing?—I have a complete scheme for North Staffordshire which would work satisfactorily, and it is one of the most barren districts as regards population in the whole of England. There is not a general hospital within 10 miles.

16,764. Is this in being, or is it in project?—It cannot be in being until the local authority have control of all cases of mental illness, and until they have power to contribute towards the voluntary hospital for the support of beds for an indoor clinic.

16,765. You have also been good enough to hand us a paper, but have you confronted the problem which I have been putting in regard to the voluntary patients?—Yes, I have.

16,766. What is your view as to whether voluntary patients can exist in the case of mental disease?—I think that they can for practical purposes. I am constantly having patients coming up to the door and asking for re-admission, and I cannot re-admit them at the present time at all. That is a cruel thing to a patient; it may perhaps be unusual in North Staffordshire, but I have got the whole of the medical profession on my side, and they are all willing to establish a clinic as far as they can do it, if it were not a question of money.

16,767. Then is it your view that the clinic should contain all cases initially, or selected cases?—No; I think that is a narrow view to take of clinics. I should have the local authority in power over all mental cases. I would have a principal officer of mental health, who would have a central office. The relieving officers, who would then be officers of the mental health committee, whether full time or part time, would bring under the notice of the medical officer of mental health for the county all cases; and he, being in intimate touch, not only with the clinics, but with the mental hospitals and with the outdoor clinics in the small towns, would know, after consultation with all the specialists in the county, exactly what was to be the disposal of every patient.

16,768. You have supplied exactly the link I was looking for in supplement of what Dr. Goodall has been telling us. I wanted to get at the criterion for disposal. That test should take place, according to you, in the hands of some specially appointed officer?—Yes.

16,769. Curiously enough again we had evidence from Dr. Carswell that he had in Glasgow, while he was there, practically the post you contemplate. He told us that every case in Glasgow reached him first; he saw the patient personally himself in every instance, and he said: "That is a case that ought to go to the infirmary," or "That is a case that ought to go to the mental hospital," and he relegated to one or the other as he thought right. Of course there were no clinics, and therefore the case you would have sent to the clinic he sent to the Poor Law infirmary; but that institution in Glasgow was specially equipped to deal with mental cases, and he in effect provided the advantages of a clinic in that way; but the key of that whole system seemed to me to be the existence of a person who was a certifying authority, or at least the representative in the district of the local authority?—There cannot be delay; in many cases there must be freedom of admission to the county mental hospital, for instance. The relieving officer, or whoever is the official concerned—we hope the officials of the mental health committee—cannot wait while a delirious case cuts its throat, or while a homicidal case commits a murder; but in the course of the next day or two, and before the patient is to be finally dealt with, whether by voluntary means or by certificates, the mental officer will have had an opportunity of seeing and examining that patient and consulting with other heads of departments as to what is the best disposal of that patient in his own interests. It might be that he would go to the county mental hospital, it might be to the indoor clinic; he might, if it were only a case of delirium tremens, be allowed to go home. He might then attend the outdoor clinic for a short time.

16,770. Of course one knows that the actual violent cases are relatively much fewer than the public imagine?—That is so.

16,771. But take the instance you have put of the suicidal case arising in a town. Do you contemplate that that case would be disposed of by this medical officer of mental health sending it to the mental hospital, or to the clinic?—He might dispose of it, yes, but we must not envisage only patients in a town; we must envisage my district, say, amongst others, where there are isolated farms where there are actually people who have never been in a railway train.

16,772. But that is a better case, because we test it in its most difficult circumstances. Take a violent case suddenly arising in some isolated farm—as you say, some immediate step is required. Is the immediate step that you contemplate this, that the official whom you have described, the medical officer of mental health, would be called in?—No, there is not time for it.

16,773. What do you do with such a case?—The officer who is present, a relieving officer, and the local doctor, would take him to the mental hospital straight away.

16,774. That is unfortunate, if I may say so, because he is taken to the mental hospital, and there at once the asylum stigma, of which we have heard so much, seems to attach; whereas, although it is a very violent case, it may be a recoverable case?—We do not believe that stigma will last indefinitely. We believe that if there is early treatment of cases the stigma will, in the course of 25 to 30 years, be entirely absent.

16,775. One would hope so, but it is an aspiration at present?—I do not know. I undertake to say, if I live long enough, that in ten years time, if this Bill passes, 50 per cent. of my cases will be voluntary.

16,776. We have had remarkable statistics on that subject already, but I still want to pursue that topic a little further with you, Dr. Menzies. Such a case as you have figured may be eminently recoverable?—Yes.

16,777. Is not that a typical case for clinic treatment?—Yes. We do not want to limit the immediate committal, the immediate destination of a patient. We want that patient to have the destination which is immediately nearest him if it is an urgent case.

16,778. Of course you have figured an eminently recoverable case, but nevertheless one that must be detained?—Yes.

16,779. Now are you going to leave that detention, which will be only temporary, and I agree will be in the interest of the patient himself—are you going to leave that without any legal sanction in the clinic?—No, notification.

16,780. Notification and sanction?—And treated after three days by a provisional order, and after a month, if it still continues, then the magistrate must decide what the destination is to be.

16,781. We are now introducing the lawyer into the clinic?—We cannot help it; if you are going to curtail liberty, you must introduce the lawyer.

16,782. Even into the clinic?—Even into the clinic—that is my view.

16,783. I rather thought the ideal was that the clinic should be dissociated from the legal element altogether, and that the legal element should only come in when you got the length of sending the case to a mental hospital?—I can tell you that is possible in large centres of population, but it is not practicable from the financial point of view in sparsely populated districts of England. (Dr. Lord): Might I say we have got a good practical example in America. In Albany, and in the City of New York, a health officer, a similar official to the one Dr. Menzies has been mentioning, has the power to take up a person of that sort, or he acts in the case of information by the friends and relatives and so on; and he takes him to the clinic where he can be kept for 30 days. In other places he can be taken to the State hospital and be kept for 10 days, but at the end of 10 days, should he himself or his friends demand his discharge, and he is not a suitable case for discharge, then the lawyer is brought in to decide the question.

16,784. Let us again revert to the case put, the violent case which has to be taken to the mental hospital; there is no other provision for it, there is not a clinic available, and it is taken direct to a mental hospital. The medical superintendent at present, of course, could not receive such a case without a certification order. You contemplate that the case could be received without certification?—Yes.

16,785. Then that would be followed by notification. What would be the warrant of the medical superintendent to continue to detain that case? You do not want to have certification because the case is ex hypothesi a recoverable case; you must therefore have some alteration of the law which would enable the medical superintendent to detain that involuntary case (because ex hypothesi it is not a voluntary case) against his wish, for a period that would allow of the recovery?—(Dr. Menzies): Not necessarily the recovery, no.

16,786. A chance of recovery?—A chance of recovery. We say that when the provisional order, which must not last longer than 31 days, and even then has to be renewed from seven to seven—when that is about to expire, then the medical expert must decide about the patient, provided he is a man who is able to give an opinion.

16,787. At present it evidently would be to some extent a matter of circumstances whether the case reached a clinic or a mental hospital?—It must be a matter of circumstances; we want freedom.

16,788. In either of those two places, do you contemplate that there should be a certain amount of intervention of the law to protect, on the one hand, the person who is at the head of the clinic, and, on the other hand, the medical superintendent of the mental hospital, but that the legal intervention should be short of certification?—I do not think you need to introduce it in a clinic, because they would not keep in a clinic a patient who objected.

16,789. We are taking the non-voluntary case, the very case you figure.—Well, I say there is provision in the Mental Treatment Bill to detain him in the clinic for a period of six months, renewable, I understand, under certain circumstances, up to a year.

16,790. You see there is a broad discrimination here; there are two ways of looking at it. You may say that the clinic treatment shall be dissociated altogether from the law,—that is the medical province, and there shall be the period during which the doctor shall be supreme and the lawyer shall be absent. On the other hand, there is the view that even in the provisional period, because some interference with liberty may be necessary, there should be some legal power short of the powers which result from certification. I want to know very much whether the view of the Association is that the provisional period should be in the hands of the doctor alone, so that he should be able to deal with his case as he pleases, or whether during that period he should have certain legal powers confided in him, but that those powers should be short of the powers which result from full certification.—(Dr. Lord): Are you contemplating Section 4 of this Bill? That gives a similar thing; it gives power to house a voluntary patient.

16,791. The six months is only the maximum period during which this treatment may be accorded. Some cases are not voluntary, but transitory, and it is desirable that such cases should escape certification if possible, if such cases must be detained.—(Dr. Cole): Why not "retained," not "detained"?

16,792. That is mere language.—I do not know. A person is detained against his will; but a person who has no will is retained. The view of the Association is that if the person will not accept treatment, if he objects, he must be certified, and then there is the legal intervention.

16,793. May I suggest for your consideration that that is a little unfortunate, because I could imagine a case eminently recoverable, who was both violent and difficult to deal with, who said "I am going out of your place at once and am going to fling myself in front of the first train that comes along," and yet so transitory was the ailment that possibly in a week or ten days it is almost certain that he would be all right again; but, on this view, he has got to be certified.—(Dr. Lord): That is a case you have created in your own mind. I have never met one. (Dr. Menzies): We have 31 days for the provisional order; and then it is for the magistrate to decide whether the patient is to be detained altogether or not.

16,794. Then you would import into this provisional treatment some legal power?—A provisional order in the case of a patient who says: "No, I am not going to be treated."

16,795. Then the resisting case would not necessarily be immediately certified?—Only after the three days.

16,796. What about a provisional order for him?—The provisional order is a modified form which we do not think would have the stigma attaching to it.

16,797. If you had a provisional order which would entitle you to deal with a resisting case for such a period as would give you a chance of effecting a cure, would not that be a desirable thing?—(Dr. Goodall): I believe there is a confusion. I never thought the provisional order was intended to apply to clinics at all, only to mental hospitals. (Dr. Cole): Only in exceptional cases. (Dr. Goodall): In the Boston Psychopathic Hospital they have a ten-day temporary admission; a patient must be discharged to the asylum, or if not legally insane, put on a voluntary status at the end of ten days. (Dr. Menzies): Probably all the clinics would refuse to have a patient who would not stay there; but there are a certain few cases which I would not like to see the clinics forbidden to receive, as for instance, the one I quoted, the appendicitis case. (Dr. Goodall): The Boston Institution is allowed to receive anything and keep it for ten days. (Dr. Lord): That applies to all the mental hospitals in the United States anyhow, if the case is an urgent one.

16,798. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Is it not probable at the present time, Dr. Goodall, that if you had any legal power of restraint in these mental clinics, it would really damage their reputation, and prevent people coming to them who otherwise might come?—(Dr. Goodall): You must have a period in which to make up your mind as to whether you can continue on a voluntary basis, or have the patient "committed," as they say in America—certified.

16,799. 72 hours is not sufficient, is it?—They do not think that, evidently. (Dr. Lord): I must say that any patient who goes into a clinic and promptly wants his discharge would be very awkward to deal with in a clinic; the chances are that they would send for his friends, put him in a cab, and send him away. (Dr. Cole): In voicing the opinion of the Association I ought to say that the provisional order is not intended to be applied to clinics. Supposing at the Maudsley Hospital a patient was homicidal and suicidal and so on, even although it is against the rules of the Maudsley Hospital, they might have to sign an urgency certificate for his admission to Bethlem; they might have to break their rules. Where the Maudsley Hospital fails, in the opinion of the Association, is that they are unable to take the delirious cases at the present time, because the patients are not in a position to have volition to sign a paper to go there. That, to our mind, is a pity; that the Maudsley Hospital does not provide for that class of case, which does not require certification, has no will-power, would stop there, but is not a voluntary patient and therefore is not admitted.

16,800. I follow. Of course, you will see what is in my mind. I am endeavouring, with your assistance, to formulate a system of working, and I want to see, so to speak, the programme of it. It involves certain types of institutions and certain relations between them, and certain different stages, certain periods at which the law intervenes. One must envisage the whole thing as a system; one wants it to be as simple and at the same time as effective as possible, always keeping in view the benefit of the patient and also his protection. That is the sort of general consideration one has in one's mind. I have a little difficulty in envisaging exactly the system which you have in view. Of course, I see the importance of a clinic; I see the desirability of a person being treated without certification; I see the importance of having facilities for dealing with recoverable cases. All these things, if I may say so, are things that we recognise almost as obvious things. It is much more the machinery of it that is puzzling us; as to how you are to work it out on the lines of the existing system, as remodelled, or what practical recommendations we can make. As far as we have got, the practical recommendation is this: (a) that there should be a system of clinics established, preferably in association with general hospitals, or, alternatively, independently of the general hospitals, but in dissociation from the mental hospitals; (b) that there should continue to exist the mental hospitals throughout this country, and that those mental hospitals should work to some extent in parallel with the clinic system, because they also would be available in future for the admission of voluntary patients; and you seem further to contemplate that the relegation of a case to the one type of institution or the other, the clinic or the mental hospital, should be in the hands of some responsible local official, appointed by the local authority, who would deal with all the cases and relegate them to one or other of these institutions, according as he thought best from his experience.

16,801. Mr. Micklem: Could that apply in the case of private patients, do you think?—(Dr. Menzies): No; this applies to rate-aided patients. (Dr. Cole): I have some experience of the London hospitals. At St. Mary's Hospital I have a right to three beds; I never use them, and refuse to use them, because I consider it is not wise for me to take in mental patients to the ordinary wards of the hospital without properly trained staff and without proper arrangements being made. I have frequently seen mental patients in the hospital, of course. We have an out-patient department, and many doctors in the district send me incipient cases of insanity; and I am the officer of the district who decides where these patients are to go to very largely. They come to my out-patient department, and I may decide that this is a patient that must go to the infirmary, and herein I have experience of what the stigma of pauperism is. The Paddington Hospital has been allocated to St. Mary's Hospital, and the staff are paid for attending Paddington Hospital by the Guardians, and the students go there for clinical instruction; also they see the mental cases in the observation wards there. I am consulting psychiatrist to the place, and I am called in now for all the doubtful cases, to decide what is to be done with them. They have a paid medical officer, and he certifies the ordinary cases. Any doubtful cases I am asked to visit and to report upon; but I have the power to send patients to the Maudsley Hospital, that is to say, a clinic. I send them to the Maida Vale Hospital and other places; but I do consider that the private practitioner should have some voice in the matter; he would call in the relieving officer, and the relieving officer would deal with a case as best he can; he very frequently sends them to my out-patient department, and, in other cases, to the infirmary.

16,802. Chairman: Have you considered the effect upon the mental hospital atmosphere of so many of the recoverable cases being withdrawn from it?—Yes. I think a large number of the members of the Association regret it very much. What we feel is that it should be mostly in the hands of the public. Many people prefer the mental hospital, undoubtedly; patients who have been there before may not look at the clinic; others will go at once to the clinic. (Dr.

Lord): Of course, our clinics reach a class of case that is not reached by the other institutions.

16,803. You reach the incipient cases?—Yes, quite a range of cases, neurological cases, functional nervous cases, and so on. These cases, when they are allowed to get worse, when they are untreated, of course, may come into the asylums ultimately incurable. We are spreading out the net to gather them in these clinics, and we also want to use the clinics as mental health centres.

16,804. Of course, one of the functions they would perform in the public interest would be by attracting the cases at their early stages, and you might obviate the increase of the asylum population?—If a clinic is successful, there is no question about it; it will take many years, of course. Ultimately, your mental hospital will become superfluous, to some extent.

16,805. I am a little distressed at the thought of the mental hospital, instead of as at present containing a population of various types of cases, becoming practically a place in which there were nothing but hopeless cases?—By that time, if that ever comes about, of course, naturally you would have to change your personnel and change the name of the institution and the authority it is under. (Dr. Goodall): I can say that has not come about in Germany for 35 years; and, as I have said, very excellent scientific work is turned out of the German mental hospitals. (Dr. Lord): There are many cases of mental disorder which we cannot reasonably expect to cure under two to three years. Are you going to lodge them in a clinic all that time? No; you must have mental hospitals.

16,806. But that would be the voluntary case?—It might be a voluntary case. It might develop after a period strong objections to remaining, in which case it has to be certified; as it got better, being under certificates, we should say: "Well, you are very much better. If you like to take your future in your own hands, you can go out, we do not advise it, or you can remain voluntarily." We want freedom in these matters.

16,807. I should like Sir Frederick Mott's view on this matter?—(Sir Frederick Mott): My idea is that it is largely an economic question. If we could establish all over the country hospitals like the Maudsley hospital, which in my opinion is almost ideal, that would be the very best thing, but at the present time it is quite impossible. The great idea, I think is to attract the patient as soon as possible to come under treatment, because as Dr. Maudsley who gave this money to the hospital said: "That there are crowds of incurable cases of insanity congregated in large asylums is undoubtedly owing in some measure to the common neglect of early treatment when the malady is most curable." For that reason he gave this money, but it was thought at first that the Maudsley Hospital would only be able to receive certifiable cases. As I had a great deal to do with the Maudsley Hospital and its building, I advised Dr. Maudsley (because of my experience during the war with regard to cases of insanity), to adopt the system of having non-certifiable cases there, because I said: "I am perfectly sure the great number of people will not come to the hospital, and will not be brought to the hospital, if it is felt that it is a half-way house to an asylum." He quite agreed to that, and it has worked extremely well, I think. But there are a certain number of cases that one feels perfectly sure will get well; even very bad cases I have known get perfectly well if they are properly treated for a short time; and we want powers somehow to retain those cases for a time, so that they will not be discharged and sent to an asylum, because if that happens people will not come. You were speaking about volition just now. I had two cases, they were quite insane, but I felt sure that if I could send them to the Maudsley hospital they would get well. Their great fear was that they were going to be sent to an asylum. I persuaded them both, I said, "This is a hospital; you will not be certified and sent to an asylum; you will be cured." I saw one of them about a week later, he was quite sane, and in about a month he went out; but most of the cases have to remain there from three to six months. Dr. Mapother will tell you about that.

16,808. Yes, we are hoping to see him.—We want really an extension of time, and, as Dr. Goodall said, if you were to trust the doctors to do their very best, having regard to the excellent staff they have there, I think that would be desirable; but if that is not possible there are other methods. I do not think that a clinic at a general hospital is advisable unless they can provide a condition of things like we have at the Maudsley hospital, namely, extensive grounds and occupation for the patients; because to put a good many of the cases into a ward is not desirable, I think. Of course a certain number of cases can be so treated, but not the general run of cases that I have seen at the Maudsley Hospital.

16,809. Might I, Sir Frederick, ask a question there? Does not it really come to this, that the institution you figure is just another mental hospital? It is to have wards and staff, and grounds, and so on. It is just to be a mental hospital, but a mental hospital in which cases are to be treated without certification?—Yes, but excuse me, Sir, there are four highly qualified medical officers, and a number of clinical assistants, and a very experienced staff, and it is associated with the general hospital, King's College Hospital opposite, so that a specialist can be called in to see the cases, and so it is run on hospital lines. Of course I think there is a great improvement now in our mental hospitals generally throughout the country, especially in the London county mental hospitals, as regards those provisions.

16,809A. What I mean is this, that so far as outward semblance is concerned, the institution would to all intents and purposes be an asylum, but an asylum which contained no certified cases?—No, a mental hospital.

16,810. A mental hospital, but one which contained no certified cases, and no cases which were going to be certified there; but in outward semblance, and in equipment, it would only be a better mental hospital than the existing ones?—The wards are small, there are not more than 28 patients in a ward, whereas in the mental hospitals they are very large wards; I know some with 100 patients.

16,811. It does not quite meet my point that it is a mental hospital still, but a mental hospital where there is no compulsion, and where the equipment is better and the staff is more elaborate?—There is much more individual treatment.

16,812. We ought to have that in the mental hospitals also?—I quite agree with you, but can you do it? It is a question of finance. I would like to see Dr. Goodall's system adopted but it is impracticable at the present time.

16,813. Where you cannot have a Maudsley institution what is your solution?—I should like to see a scheme such as Birmingham might establish. I say here "Birmingham might establish such a mental hospital in association with either of the two great general hospitals in that city, and affiliated as a school of the University; or a group of authorities representing boroughs and county councils in the Midlands might combine with Birmingham for this purpose." I believe that would fulfil Dr. Goodall's idea. It is a question of finance mainly. I know that one hospital that was approached with regard to having a clinic and proper wards said, "Yes, we would be very glad to do this, but we have not the money."

4 May, 1925.] Dr. R. H. COLE, M.D., F.R.C.P., Dr. M. A. COLLINS, O.B.E., M.D., Dr. E. GOODALL, O.B.E., M.D., F.R.C.P., Dr. J. R. LORD, O.B.E., M.B., Dr. W. F. MENZIES, B.Sc., M.D., F.R.C.P., Sir FREDERICK W. MOTT, K.B.E., LL.D., M.D., F.R.C.P., F.R.S., and Dr. R. WORTH, O.B.E., M.B. [Continued.]

Then I suggested that possibly it might be financed, as Dr. Cole says it is likely to be at St. Mary's, on the same basis as the tuberculosis, or the venereal disease clinics. Then, thirdly, I suggest "The establishment of hospitals associated with, but outside the grounds of existing asylums, provided with properly equipped and staffed clinical laboratories under borough or county councils, and, where possible, affiliated with a general hospital of a medical school or university." For example, Portsmouth might have a clinic outside the mental hospital; I think it would be a great thing to have it outside. You would have an efficient staff. What is done in the mental hospitals, which is much better than it used to be, is to have separate villas within the grounds, so that acute cases never go into the general hospital among the chronic cases at all. I believe that is so, Dr. Lord, is it not? (Dr. Lord): Except perhaps to attend the cinema entertainments; they live outside as in a village. (Sir Frederick Mott): I think a good deal must be taken into account from the point of view of the district. (Dr. Lord): The great point is that we cannot as an Association recommend things we think impracticable economically.

16,814. And we cannot, as a Commission, do so either?—We suggest that you put an authority in each area, and that authority have wide influence, not only have on it representatives of the county council, but all sorts of authorities who are interested in mental health, and let them settle what the area should be—give them freedom on these points that we have suggested. If an area wants to have a clinic why should not it have it? If in another area they can do best with some special institution affiliated with several general infirmaries, or the Birmingham scheme, for instance, or the Cheddleton scheme—all these schemes are practical for districts, but they may be impracticable as general measures.

16,815. Then you do not think a uniform system is capable of construction for the country?—At the moment that is quite obvious from the practical point that Sir Frederick Mott has raised: Parliament could not suddenly order every general hospital in this country to build a clinic. The general hospital would say "All right, take over the general hospital; we cannot do such things." You can make schemes legally possible. (Dr. Goodall): That is what the Early Mental Treatment Bill did. (Dr. Lord): At present the authorities can do nothing. Whenever they try to advance early treatment they come up against the law somewhere.

16,816. Would you tell us exactly how you work at Cardiff, because I do not think we have got it as yet? I mean your method of procedure at Cardiff. Several of the witnesses who have preceded you have told us that at Cardiff there is a system in actual operation which works very satisfactorily?—(Dr. Goodall): I have only got an out-patients' department at Cardiff; there is no indoor provision.

16,817. You have the University College of Wales?—Yes, the Welsh National School of Medicine is there.

16,818. Then with regard to yourself what is your position?—I am Lecturer on Mental Disorders there and Physician to the out-patient department.

16,819. That out-patient department is an out-patient department of the general hospital at Cardiff?—Yes, one of the departments of it.

16,820. A voluntary hospital?—Yes.

16,821. Have you a ward?—No, but I have several cases in, in co-operation with the physicians.

16,822. Mixed with the ordinary cases?—Yes, we take that risk, but I have already said that that is not what I recommend.

16,823. Quite. I am anxious to know what you are doing. You have an out-patient department?—Yes.

16,824. Is it largely resorted to?—Not largely, because there is no indoor department. It would be about five or six times bigger if it was well known there was an indoor department. They will not go to the mental hospital; it may have a good name, it does not matter; they want to go to some place away from the mental hospital.

16,825. You offer them an out-patient department in the first instance? Is that known to the people in Cardiff?—Yes, and all round. There are two million people round Cardiff and they come from all parts.

16,826. Is the out-patient department separate from the ordinary out-patient department for ordinary patients?—No. I share a room with the gynaecologist.

16,827. Have you an assistant doctor there?—No, I have a clinical assistant if I want one, and a nurse I take down with me.

16,828. Do you attend there so many hours a week?—Every Tuesday afternoon at present.

16,829. Is it posted up that that is the time you will attend there?—Yes, and the doctors round the district know it.

16,830. Can you give us any statistics of the number of people who come to you there?—I do not have more than 90 to 100 a year at present.

16,831. What sort of person comes to your outdoor clinic? Do you get the incipient case we are in search of?—Yes, a great number of them. Of course I get defectives and epileptics, and all sorts of neuro-psychiatric cases and borderland cases.

16,832. You cannot take them in, I understand?—No, but I have very many early cases. As I say I am at my wit's end very often to know what to do with them.

16,833. What do you do with them?—You can only treat them in their homes.

16,834. Some you get in by hook or by crook?—Yes, and there are some there who ought to be certified; but we take the risk, because, of course, they will not take these people in if they know they are insane. The best I can do is to advise the doctor what to do with them, but it is a deplorable thing, because no case of mental disorder can be treated properly in a private house.

16,835. I am interested in the incipient case. Sometimes they arrive at your out-patient department, and you observe that the case is one of mental disorder, is one of delusion, at any rate, and you interview the case, I suppose?—Yes.

16,836. What facilities for treatment have you? Do you advise a régime of any sort, or what do you do?—There is nearly always a relative with them. We take a very full history to start with, family and personal; then I have always had a diet sheet typed ready, and one about exercise and hydrotherapy, and that sort of thing.

16,837. You really prescribe for the case?—Yes; they get their medicine out of a bottle the same as the others at the infirmary.

16,838. But you prescribe a mode of life as far as possible?—Yes, and I write to the doctor in every case.

16,839. And do you find that in consequence of the advice you are able to benefit those patients, many of them?—I am afraid I cannot say that, because seven-tenths of them want to come inside; it is a one-horse show.

16,840. Earl Russell: Do you ever recommend any of them to go to the asylum?—No; I always say "Do not send them there," but they drift there in the present circumstances.

16,841. What happens to them if they get really bad and you cannot take them in?—They have to come to the asylum, of course, many cases that should not come at all. I have set out here the cases that came during the last six months. I say they ought not to have gone there at all.

16,842. Chairman: You are, of course, Superintendent of the Cardiff Mental Hospital yourself?—Yes.

4 May, 1925.] Dr. R. H. COLE, M.D., F.R.C.P., Dr. M. A. COLLINS, O.B.E., M.D., Dr. [Continued.
E. GOODALL, C.B.E., M.D., F.R.C.P., Dr. J. R. LORD, O.B.E., M.B., Dr. W. F. MENZIES, B.Sc.,
M.D., F.R.C.P., Sir FREDERICK W. MOTT, K.B.E., LL.D., M.D., F.R.C.P., F.R.S.,
and Dr. R. WORTH, O.B.E., M.B.

16,843. But so fixed is your idea of the dissociation from the clinic that you do not recommend the patients to go from your outdoor department to your mental hospital?—No. I think most of us engaged in psychiatry will delay certification.

16,844. Do you never get a case of the type we have been talking about where immediate steps are required?—Yes.

16,845. What do you do with that class of case. Supposing an advanced case is brought to you, what do you do with that?—I get them into communication with the chief relieving officer. There is nothing else to do at present.

16,846. That case does become certified and is sent to your mental hospital?—Yes. It would not be if there were a clinic. I have heaps and heaps of non-volitional cases come in.

16,847. In Cardiff, suppose the matter were legalised, do you think there would be any difficulty in working wards for indoor patients in connection with your clinic?—No, I do not believe so, because as I have already said Cardiff cannot be unique, but the fact is that they are subscribing £2,000 a year to the Infirmary and have five representatives on it, and the local authority has worked excellently with the Infirmary people. I think if facilities were given to establish clinics, Cardiff would be one of the first places to have them.

16,848. It might, as Dr. Lord suggests, be one of the places to show the way how this could be done. It would be an example of actual working?—Yes. I may say that the facilities at the Cardiff Mental Hospital are only three miles from the Cardiff Infirmary; you could not have a closer association. It is about as good an instance of a halfway hospital between the ordinary mental hospital and clinic that you could get, but it is not sufficient, it is not what we want. We want nothing other than such clinics as they have in Germany and in America.

16,849. What is the view of the Association on Lord Onslow's Bill generally?—(Dr. Cole): We have put it down here in our report on page 18. First of all, we feel that the whole Bill is permissive. Unless local authorities are asked to do things and establish these places they will simply mark time, and do nothing. Under the provisions of the Mental Deficiency Act little has been done for a long time in consequence of the war; and here everything is merely permissive. It does not even encourage them in these things. For Clause 2 we suggest, "It shall be the duty of any local authority to arrange for the provision and maintenance of an institution or clinic for the treatment of incipient mental disorders." The view of the Association is that it shall be the duty of the local authority. If we make it merely permissive they will not do anything. That is our experience, at least when it comes to psychiatry; unless they are forced to do things local authorities will not do things—that is one of our objections. (Dr. Lord): Of course, it is recognised that we could not coerce the local authority, but they would have a choice of schemes.

16,850. Earl Russell: They have a statutory obligation?—They have a statutory obligation, but you would have some difficulty in coercing them. (Dr. Cole): On that page you will see some of the criticisms which our Association has made. We would rather it went through as it is than have no Bill at all. I know that the County Councils Association objects to co-option, but there we feel ourselves that Clause 1 is a very important one. We should rather like to see good people and well-informed people co-opted who are not members of a local authority.

16,851. Chairman: You have the advantage of getting women also on?—Quite so. Then the other criticisms, if you look at the Bill, subsection (3) "Receive and lodge as a boarder"—

16,852. If you do not mind, I would rather reserve that for the minute, because I want your views on that separately. It is the treating of incipient cases, and the voluntary boarder, that one is concerned with?—We object to the word "boarder." It is Clause 2, subsection (3), "receive and lodge as a boarder." We would like this word always used, "a voluntary patient."

16,853. There is a distinction taken throughout the Bill between the voluntary patient and the boarder?—Yes; we think that is unfortunate.

16,854. They are treated as two different kinds of people?—We do not like the word "boarder" in the Lunacy Act, we think it ought to be "a voluntary patient." We think the voluntary patients would be quite as numerous as the certified patients in the course of time, when the principle spreads in rate-aided hospitals.

16,855. The distinction taken in the Bill as far as I can gather is a little obscure; it is that a "boarder" may be a person who is not necessarily suffering from mental disorder, whereas a "patient" is a person who is suffering from mental disorder and is considered likely to benefit from temporary treatment; but the boarder is a person who may be received even although he will not admit he is suffering from mental disorder?—It says a boarder who is desirous of submitting himself for treatment.

16,856. I do not think I admire the distinction myself at all, but I was trying to see what was in the mind of the draftsman. I think, to do the draftsman justice, what he was thinking of when he used the word "boarder" is the person under Clause 2 of the Bill. When he talks of the "patient" he is thinking of the person under Clause 4?—Would anyone want to be a boarder in a clinic or a mental hospital unless he is mentally disordered? The word "boarder" is a mistake, both in the present Act and in this Bill. It savours rather of the commercial boarding house than of a clinic.

16,857. I do not say I admire it, but I find it there?—Where we maintain this Bill does not fulfil its purpose, is that it does not provide at all for private patients. As a matter of fact there is threatened opposition to the Bill under the aegis of the Board of Control if the private patient were introduced into it, but I understand that even so certain clauses are ready to be inserted in it.

16,858. Are you quite sure, because Clause 4, subsection 2 says: "For the purposes of this section the expression 'approved institution' means any institution, being either an institution under the control of the visiting committee, a registered hospital, or a licensed house." The licensed house is a typical place where the private patient is received?—I am referring to the patient in single care; that is not mentioned here. A very important modification of the law we consider ought to be brought about for the proper supervision of these people. A good many of them are not in recognised places, and they suffer from mental disorder. It really means another section, notwithstanding Section 315 of the Lunacy Act.

16,859. That is a different topic. That is a question of the amendment of the existing law for the better protection of single care patients. This is a question of what is the proper machinery to introduce to enable voluntary and incipient cases to be dealt with?—That is exactly what we want for nursing homes and for single care patients as well, which is not mentioned in this Bill.

16,860. You mean that single care might be approved, that is to say, that a particular house might be approved by the Board of Control as an appropriate place to receive a single voluntary patient?—Yes. We do not ask to approve of the place, so long as the medical man recommends the place.

4 May, 1925.] Dr. R. H. COLE, M.D., F.R.C.P., Dr. M. A. COLLINS, O.B.E., M.D., Dr. E. GOODALL, C.B.E., M.D., F.R.C.P., Dr. J. R. LORD, C.B.E., M.B., Dr. W. F. MENZIES, B.Sc., M.D., F.R.C.P., Sir FREDERICK W. MOTT, K.B.E., LL.D., M.D., F.R.C.P., F.R.S., and Dr. R. WORTH, O.B.E., M.B. [Continued.]

16,861. I see the hiatus you are pointing to. Among the institutions that may be approved there does not occur the home of a single patient?—It would be impossible to approve all the houses where single patients go to-day.

16,862. But at the same time you want some machinery devised whereby cases may be received without certification and kept?—Yes; our point is this that every certifiable patient does not require detention, and at present it is illegal for such a patient to be kept; we think it should not be illegal for a certifiable patient who desires treatment in a single house to be allowed to live there. That is what this Bill does not provide for. (Dr. Lord): Clause 4 you see we limit to non-volitional cases. It is a fault of the machinery that voluntary patients were included in both sections. For instance, the voluntary patient may go to any hospital, whether it is suited for the purpose or not, and offer himself as a voluntary boarder, whereas if he offers himself under Clause 4 they might say: "No, you must go to a place approved of by the Board of Control." (Dr. Cole): We object to the recommendation by two medical practitioners; we think one ought to be sufficient. (Dr. Lord): That is under Clause 4. (Dr. Cole): Yes. (Dr. Lord): Clause 4 would merely apply to clinics and similar hospitals, and the rest of the Bill would apply primarily to mental hospitals and also clinics in certain cases.

16,863. It is a little difficult to follow the scheme in the draftsman's mind in this Bill. I personally have some difficulty in following the distinction between the boarder and the voluntary patient?—(Dr. Cole): I think "boarder" was really copied from the Lunacy Act.

16,864. In Clause 5 it recognises two classes of persons?—(Dr. Cole): But "patient" really refers to a delirious patient, in which case the relatives act for him.

16,865. But it does not say so. Is not the distinction this, that the one person comes in with a recommendation, and the other without? The voluntary patient who presents himself at the door of the mental hospital and is received has not any recommendation. He is a "boarder" in the language of the Bill; but the "patient" in the language of the Bill is a person who has been recommended?—(Dr. Lord): We have had, of course, many meetings on this Bill, and that is a new explanation. Clause 2 deals with an Act of Parliament already in force, and therefore it uses the same term, it is merely extending the present clause of the Lunacy Act regarding boarders to asylums which exist under the Lunacy Act; while Clause 4 does appear to involve a new type of institution, places like the Maudsley hospital, and hospital clinics, and also possibly nursing homes; and possibly a new type of patient, and he is to be a provisional patient. Originally I should think Clause 4 was drawn up with a view to some form of detention. At the last minute courage failed and they left out the detention, but left the machinery there under a voluntary guise.

16,866. I dislike ambiguous legislation. I like to know where I am, and it does seem to me that the Bill, however excellent its motives, is not so clear as it ought to be?—(Dr. Lord): We have put it all right; it is all clear and logical in our notes. (Dr. Cole): The notice should be in writing. You will see our amendment on page 18. We think it is very important, because a patient may say he is leaving and the notification may never reach the proper authority. Also we would like to say "provided he does not give notice, afterwards withdrawing it." Some of these voluntary patients want to go one day and do not want to go the next day.

16,867. I have difficulty in calling that a voluntary patient at all?—But that is so.

16,868. Earl Russell: You have to make sure he has access to writing material?—Quite so, and the patient may be paralysed or have no right arm.

16,869. Chairman: It is uncommonly difficult to legislate for every type of case if you have to legislate in general language?—There is a provision that a patient may be discharged by a relative. Then there is sub-section (5) (b), a patient may be discharged by the superintendent or other person.

16,870. That is on the analogy of the present private patient who may be withdrawn, but the barring certificate is always available in that case?—Yes, I only point it out. We do not object to it particularly, but it is so.

16,871. Earl Russell: Sub-section (b) does not prevent his remaining as a voluntary boarder?—(Dr. Cole): I was mentioning (5) (b) "may at any time be discharged from the institution by the said superintendent or other person, or by order of a commissioner or on the direction in writing."

16,872. Earl Russell: Still that would not prevent his saying "I want to be a voluntary boarder on my own"?—He would have to go out and come in again. He is discharged. It is rather ambiguous. (Dr. Menzies): I think discharge means being taken off the benches, and not issuing from the front door. (Dr. Cole): That may be the explanation.

16,873. Chairman: At any rate these are matters that should not be left obscure in an Act of this sort?—(Dr. Lord): Nothing should be obscure in a Lunacy Act.

16,874. In any Act I may venture to add?—(Dr. Cole): I daresay you notice the principle of two medical men acting together. We recommend for treatment one medical man. This is a new principle introduced which we want to foster. We object very much that two medical men should have to examine a patient apart; we think it is a pity. We notice that under the Bill the two medical men are to certify together.

16,875. Yes, and I am rather interested in noticing that in America, in one of the forms, certification follows after consultation between the two doctors?—(Dr. Lord): I shall probably have an opportunity of telling you about that.

16,876. With regard to what Dr. Cole was saying, I see at page 48 where you have collected together a considerable amount of information of other places, you give the form which is in use in the State of New York, and I notice that the doctors certify "As a result of such joint examination," so that there the examination is a joint examination?—Yes. (Dr. Cole): That is so in Ireland now; two medical men sign one certificate for a private patient.

After a short adjournment.

16,877. Chairman: Dr. Cole, may I draw your attention to recommendation 30 on page 14, "That it should be made possible for rate-aided patients to be admitted to mental hospitals under a 'provisional order'." You then give a reference to recommendations 31 to 35. What exactly has the Association in mind as a provisional order, in contradistinction to a certificate?—(Dr. Cole): In the first place it was to take the place of the urgency order, such as we have now for private patients only.

16,878. On one medical certificate?—On one medical certificate. Another thing is that on that certificate we do not wish the patient to be styled as a person of unsound mind. What we wish to say is: "This is a patient who requires temporary care, observation and treatment," without specifying that he is a person of unsound mind, or even specifying that he requires detention. I know from the legal aspect no doubt you consider he is detained, and so he is, but we thought we would not mention the words, "person of unsound mind," and we would not mention the word "detention"; and this form should be used not only for urgency, but for practically all cases in the initial stage, for their reception into a mental hospital or anywhere else.

16,879. What power do you contemplate it would give? It would be addressed to somebody, of course; it would be addressed to the medical superintendent of the mental hospital where the patient is to be housed? — It would give him all the powers for three days such as would apply in the case of any other patient if he had a complete reception order on admission.

16,880. Only for three days?—Such as we have now for the urgency order, which lasts one week.

16,881. Do not you think that three days may be too short a period?—We think that in a number of cases at the end of three days, when the patient is once in a mental hospital, he will perhaps be content to remain, and might be a voluntary patient; but if he is not fit for that we might then call in a justice or two members of the visiting committee of the public mental hospital to sanction the prolongation of this provisional order for a further period of twenty-eight days. Then again he might be a voluntary patient; the acute symptoms might have passed off.

16,882. Then it is not a certificate of insanity?—No.

16,883. But it is a certificate which carries with it certain powers short of the powers which are given under a certificate?—We think that the powers would be exactly the same; it would require an order and a certificate; an order of a relative or public officer, and the certificate of a doctor.

16,884. Now you say that it should not authorise in terms detention, although it should have the effect of authorising detention. Do you think it is desirable to beat about the bush in that way? If it is going to give the power to detain, is it not better to say so frankly?—We leave the legal profession to decide that point.

16,885. Earl Russell: It is not altogether a legal question, but I understand from you that you are very much impressed by the effect upon the patient's mind? —Yes. A provisional order means that a patient is capable of detention, as he is now under the urgency order. It does not follow that every person who is certified at present is detained. He may be willing to remain now. There are plenty of patients quite willing to go to an asylum, although they are detained legally; and possibly every case under provisional order may not require detention, although, as you know, we want very much to foster the system of voluntary treatment for all cases, when possible.

16,886. Chairman: You see it would need actually to confer some power. Merely to say: "This is a case which ought to be treated," which is really what you propose, would not carry you very far. It would be no authority to the medical superintendent if that person said: "I am just going away." There would be no authority in terms to detain him?—We have not drafted the order and certificate, but we notice that it has been drafted by the British Medical Association, and with that we are in agreement. (Dr Lord): The urgency order orders the detention.

16,887. It does, but I rather gather from Dr. Cole that he wishes to evade the unpleasantness of detention. One can be too mealy-mouthed about things, you know?—(Dr. Cole): Yes.

16,888. Mr. Micklem: In those cases, supposing the patient ultimately has to be certified, do you propose, after the provisional order, that a petition should be presented?—If necessary, certainly, after 28 days.

16,889. Do you want all the formalities of a petition?—(Dr. Lord): They will be very much less. You would have all the particulars there in front of you. (Dr. Cole): We say: "That when a provisional order and certificate is about to expire, the following three courses should be considered, according to the exigencies of the case, namely: (a) that the patient be discharged; (b) that the patient may remain voluntarily, or be dealt with, if a non-volitional case, under some such treatment as that projected in Clause 4 of the Mental Treatment Bill, 1923; (c) that a judicial reception order for detention be obtained on petition, with two medical certificates." (Dr. Menzies): What was in our mind was to give the patient who objects altogether to detention the widest possible means of putting his views before his own legal adviser, to give a chronic delusional case every chance.

16,890. Earl Russell: And before the judicial authority?—Before the judicial authority.

16,891. You know, we have been told by so many doctors that all that would be very bad for the patient?—Not for the class of patient we are dealing with. These cases are those of chronic delusional insanity, and nothing would make them any worse. We think that they should be satisfied to the full.

16,892. Chairman: I think, Dr. Menzies, we are not going to face up to the question of classifying different types. In certain cases which you figure, a more or less forensic debate between the justice and the patient would be most detrimental, I should imagine? —I do not see that it does any harm to the patient; it does not apply to acute toxic insanities; it is the chronic delusional person that wants to argue the question of his detention.

16,893. Earl Russell: And he will not be the least bit more satisfied when he has argued it?—No, but he will have had his chance. (Dr. Cole): In the majority of cases it is merely formal. The petition is signed and presented to a magistrate, and the magistrate, if satisfied, signs it.

16,894. Mr. Micklem: Who presents the petition in these rate-aided cases?—We hope when the Poor Law goes, as it seems to be going, the officer of the local authority will take the place of the present relieving officer; in many cases the relatives of the patient will. (Dr. Lord): Police authorities might take action in criminal cases.

16,895. Chairman: The practical purpose of this provisional order is to interpose a period for observation, treatment, and possibly recovery, without certification, but under a minor form, and a form possibly less injurious to the reputation of the patient?—(Dr. Cole): A good many patients would recover in a month, and they would be willing to remain afterwards for two or three months.

16,896. You do not contemplate that the provisional order is to apply to people in clinics, do you?—Possibly, and single care cases and nursing homes.

16,897. Earl Russell: What is the objection to turning it the other way, to starting the whole thing just as if you were going to certify, and then arresting the process without certifying, or suspending the order?—(Dr. Lord): That is what happens at present.

16,898. But you cannot suspend it long enough?—You can suspend it for 28 days now. (Dr. Cole): In the first place we label the person as a person of unsound mind. (Dr. Lord): And you make him a pauper. (Dr. Cole): Secondly there is an order for his reception, although it is postponed.

16,899. But that might be modified so that the order was something to the effect that, without proceeding to adjudicate upon the case, none the less the patient should be detained for observation?—In that case it means that the judicial authority should sign the paper. In our recommendation we think it advisable that the judicial authority should always see the patient.

16,900. As against that you have got to remember that you are asking the public to agree to your detaining the patient without any representative of the public seeing him?—For three days; the same as is done by the Poor Law—the relieving officer.

Chairman: I think if it is to be extended to 28 days there is to be an interposition of the judicial authority.

16,901. Earl Russell: That is not much help, is it?—(Dr. Menzies): Yes, a great help. (Dr. Cole): We thought then that a man would not be stigmatised as a lunatic or of unsound mind for one month. That is why we should not like to use the words "person of unsound mind." It is quite true that the urgency order at present does call the person a person of unsound mind, and does use the word "detention."

16,902. Chairman: I think the urgency order is intended not for the purpose of dealing with the case provisionally, as you are looking at it, but rather from the point of view that you must get the case, just because of its severity, at once under control. Your provisional order is aimed at something quite different. It is rather aimed at the case which is not a very pronounced case, and which may recover rapidly?—(Dr. Cole): Yes.

16,903. The urgency order is to get a grip on a person who may be a very violent case, and must be dealt with by urgent measures?—We do not know whether that was the intention of the Act or not, but in many institutions 60 or 70 per cent. of the cases are urgency order cases; it is a very important and very useful provision. (Dr. Lord): In the Lunacy Act it was provided so as not to postpone treatment until the legal formalities in a reception order were completed. That was a recommendation of a House of Commons Committee sitting, I think, in 1876.

16,904. Mr. Micklem: The urgency order under the Act does not apply to the rate-aided patients, does it?—(Dr. Cole): No, but there we have the relieving officer's three days' order, which is without medical formality at all.

16,905. But will you not be very much increasing the expense in these cases? You will want a certificate at the beginning of the month and two at the end?—That original certificate might be allowed to rank as one of the certificates afterwards.

16,906. Chairman: But it will not be a certificate of unsoundness of mind?—No, that is perfectly true. (Dr. Menzies): There are many of us who think that a medical certificate should not express, at any rate in the first place, whether a patient is of unsound mind or not. It should confine itself entirely to medical facts.

16,907. Mr. Micklem: You will want a double appearance of the justice?—(Dr. Lord): We want the lawyer to pronounce him insane.

16,908. Earl Russell: You do not mean to say you want to throw upon the justice the obligation of saying whether the man is sane or insane?—We do. They are all suffering from mental disorders, which may not be insanity.

16,909. Chairman: Are the lawyers to define insanity?—(Dr. Cole): The doctors cannot.

16,910. If the doctors cannot, and the lawyers will not, where are we?—(Dr. Menzies): We want to get away from any medical man expressing an opinion as to insanity. Our field is to express the fact that he is suffering from a mental disorder.

16,911. Earl Russell: What you will say is: "He does such-and-such things, and thinks such-and-such things," and it is up to the lawyer to say whether it is insanity?—That is so. (Dr. Cole): Insanity is entirely a legal expression. (Dr. Menzies): The medical profession has stuck to that for many years. (Dr. Collins): It is suggested under recommendation 38 that there should be an additional statement by the doctor of the reasons for the necessity of detention, where he thinks detention is necessary.

16,912. Chairman: I have sometimes thought that the really critical thing is this, that the doctor should say that his patient, owing to his mental condition, requires, either in the interest of himself or in the interests of the public safety, to be controlled. That is a test, so to speak, from his conduct. I quite agree that no one can say whether a person is sane or insane; in one sense you cannot say that, because it is not a matter of precise definition. But the real thing that justifies the detention is that it is not safe for that particular person, having regard to that particular person's state, to be a free agent; that is the real thing. It is to safeguard him or others from injury that the detention is authorised. It is really an inference from his conduct. His conduct renders him a person unsafe to be a free agent?—(Dr. Cole): There is one further point: Would you limit insanity merely to those cases? If a person is suffering from mental disorder, say drinking and leading a riotous life, without injury to himself or the public particularly, but you feel that under control you would be able to cure him, surely then he ought to be certified, although he is not a danger to himself or to the public.

16,913. Ethically that might be very desirable, but again we are getting into this region: if it is a question of pathology, it is a question for you doctors to say whether that pathological condition renders him a citizen whose conduct is abnormal, a citizen to whom measures have to be applied which are not applied to an ordinary citizen. Are you not the best judges of the abnormality?—(Dr. Cole): We admit that. The point is that we want to dissociate psychiatry from the position, as it were, of being the governor of a prison; in other words, we want to state what the patient is suffering from, and treat that, and if it is necessary for the patient to be detained for that purpose, then we think some person other than the medical authority ought to step in and say: "This person ought to be detained."

16,914. Earl Russell: I understood you to say, Dr. Cole, that if the patient was of no danger either to himself or to other people, but none the less wanted restraint for his treatment, he ought to be restrained. You mean a man ought to be cured against his will?—I think so, in the interests of the State.

16,915. It may be sound, but it is new?—In the interests of the State these people ought to be cured. If we want to prevent insanity, we must treat it at the early stages.

16,916. You mean that every man who takes a glass too much should be prevented?—I think so.

16,917. I am inclined to agree with you, only it is a new view of legislation?—(Dr. Lord): It is only Dr. Cole's personal view. (Dr. Cole): I am glad to see that Lord Russell agrees with me. (Dr. Lord): Of course, Parliament did try to deal with them under the Inebriates Act.

16,918. Chairman: The whole purpose of certification is to authorise detention against the wish of the person. As long as the person is willing to be treated, you do not require those compulsory powers. A person's resistance is due to his own mental disturbance, and the doctor, who is the judge of his abnormality, says, "This person, to my knowledge, is abnormal." Your diagnosis may not be complete, but you are able to say that this person is abnormal, and you are further able to say that this person ought to be treated compulsorily, whether he likes it or not, and therefore that he is a fit and proper person to be admitted to an asylum and there detained. Is not that a proper thing for a doctor to certify? No layman can certify it?—(Dr. Cole): He has the most experience, undoubtedly. I think it is quite right that the State should expect him to express his opinion; it is his own opinion.

16,919. Then you object to attaching the label, "This is a person of unsound mind"?—For one month.

16,920. You would rather say, "This is a person who ought to be detained under observation and treatment. From the facts of the case I deduce from my knowledge that this is a person who for the moment is so abnormal that he ought to be subjected to detention, whether he likes it or not." All you object to is the categorising of him?—(Dr. Menzies): That is so. (Dr. Lord): The public strongly objects.

16,921. Mr. Micklem: Do you suggest that the justice of the peace should necessarily act upon that single certificate of the doctor for this temporary order?—He does now, practically.

16,922. Or should he exercise any judicial view about the case?—(Dr. Cole): If he is not satisfied we suggest that he can call in another medical man.

Chairman: Yes, but why should the justice say he is of unsound mind, if he says, "I agree"?

16,923. Earl Russell: That seems to be enough, if the justice says, "I agree"?—That is the term we use—"should have the sanction of the judicial authority."

16,924. Chairman: That is to say, neither the justice of the peace nor the doctor is to commit himself to the view that this is a person of unsound mind. All that either is to commit himself to is that this is a person whose condition justifies his temporary detention?—(Dr. Menzies): That is the position.

16,925. On the expiry of the period of treatment a conclusive judgment would have to be pronounced, and it would have to be pronounced, notwithstanding the period he has gone through, that he is now a person of declared unsound mind?—(Dr. Lord): That is right, unless he has recovered or has become a voluntary boarder.

16,926. But if he requires to be detained do you then contemplate that the doctor should pronounce upon the case?—As now.

16,927. Earl Russell: I am anxious that you should have more than 28 days. Do not you think that a longer period might be useful, and that more people would escape certification if you took a longer period?—(Dr. Cole): That is so, but what would Parliament say?

16,928. I know, but if you tell us 28 days is enough, obviously we cannot recommend more?—(Dr. Lord): Under Clause 4 of the Mental Treatment Bill that was extended to six months.

16,929. I should have thought a longer period was better to give you a better chance of discharging some people without certification?—(Dr. Cole): I really do think that if a person is mentally unbalanced and requires detention for three months, in spite of the stigma, it is justified by the facts. If a person is so ill, it seems to me it is only honest to regard that person as of unsound mind, and you cannot get away from it. Personally I should think three months would be too long.

16,930. It may be three months in an alcoholic case?—Yes. (Dr. Lord): I do not think we should raise any objection to the extension of the period. We put that period because it was hopeless for us to ask for more.

16,931. Chairman: Are you not apprehensive that this provisional certificate, which authorises detention in a mental hospital for 28 days, may not attract just the same stigma, if there is any stigma about certification? If a person is known to be a person who has been subjected to one of these provisional orders, and has been an inmate for 28 days in a well-known asylum, do you think people would draw a fine distinction and say, "Mr. So-and-so was a certified lunatic, and Mr. So-and-so was a person under a provisional certificate."?—(Dr. Cole): I think that is a matter of education. There are people in institutions who go to their business daily. 50 per cent. of these cases will be voluntary patients.

Earl Russell: I think the public do attach importance to the term "certified lunatic." They think it means something terrible.

16,932. Chairman: Undoubtedly?—I do not think they regard it so at the present moment in the case of an urgency order. There are cases admitted on an urgency order, and they become voluntary boarders, at the end of one week, and go away after a time; those people feel they have never been certified.

16,933. I was wondering whether it was not the actual residence in the institutions?—(Dr. Menzies): That is so at present, but we hope that with a larger percentage of recoveries it will not be so; we hope that with 50 per cent. of admissions of voluntary patients that distinction between asylum and general hospital will gradually fade away.

16,934. Do you think we shall ever be able to abolish what, after all, is a fact of nature: that there is a social difference between mental disease and other diseases which must be recognised?—We shall never obliterate it, but we shall diminish in the public view the stigma that attaches to it.

Sir David Drummond: As a matter of fact, amongst rate-aided patients the whole thing is "taken to an asylum." They never speak of certification at all; with the poor people that really is the stigma.

16,935. Chairman: Yes. One would like to analyse what the stigma really is. The stigma means this, that this person has, owing to his misfortune, or his fault sometimes, ceased for a time to be a normal, rational human being. No amount of beating about the bush, or calling things by different names, no amount even of humane treatment will obliterate the fact that in that person's life there has been an episode, a pathological episode, if you please, which to some extent will place him apart from others. Is not that almost inevitable?—(Dr. Cole): Yes. (Dr. Menzies): It may be, but the practical point of view of the poorer classes is that at present if a person has been certified he is unemployable. (Dr. Lord): I think the point is that once he has been a certified lunatic, wherever he goes everybody thinks: "Is this man going to go off again?" They have no surety about him; they feel an uncertainty.

16,936. But is it not a fact that a certificated person—?—That increases it.

16,937. Of course, it is a pronouncement upon the case, and therefore may, like a conviction in a police court, be brought up against you again?—That is just the point we are making. As soon as it is generally known that cases of "run-down" nervous debility and so on, are freely admitted and go in and out of mental hospitals, nobody will know, when a person comes out, whether he has been there as a certified person or not.

16,938. I think you are a little optimistic in imagining that the presence of those uncertified persons will permeate the atmosphere of the asylum. I should have thought rather that the real cases of insanity in the asylum would be more liable to spread their influence to those uncertified cases?—(Dr. Cole): That is not our experience. (Dr. Lord): I think after 26 years' experience that if permission were given to admit these people voluntarily, I should have at least 50 per cent. of my patients voluntary boarders, in the course of ten years or so.

16,939. You see, you gentlemen are able to appreciate this matter with a balanced judgment, but we are dealing with the public, and it is much more difficult to educate the public. Some people, for example, dislike the atmosphere of a law court; I enjoy nothing better. You probably enjoy the atmosphere of a mental hospital, but the members of the public may have a great distaste for it?—(Dr. Cole): Because they are not allowed to go there; they ought to be allowed to go there. (Dr. Lord): We do not want them shut up; it is you people who shut them up. You avoid the patients and the institutions. (Dr. Cole): Believe me, they are not such bad places as some people really think. It really is because they are so sequestered, and people are put on one side, that wrong impressions are allowed to be spread about as to what goes on in these institutions.

and Dr. R. WORTH, O.B.E., M.B.

16,940. At any rate we meet on common ground, and that is that it is desirable that there should be removed from the mental hospitals as far as possible all those elements, the prison element and the detention element, and so on, and that they should be so far as possible assimilated in character to a general hospital as a place of hopefulness and cure?—Yes.

Chairman: How is it to be done?

Sir Ernest Hiley: I do not quite see how they are going to achieve anything even by taking a man to one of these clinics. The man will become stigmatised among his neighbours if he is taken away by a sanitary inspector.

16,941. Chairman: That is a difficulty I have felt a good deal. People are a little merciless in their judgment of their fellows?—(Dr. Collins:) But he is moved to a fever hospital now.

16,942. But nobody thinks the worse of you for having scarlet fever? — Why should not the same person do it?

16,943. His destination would become known, because probably he has become eccentric first of all?—(Dr. Lord:) Unless we change these things we shall simply stick as we are. (Dr. Cole:) We feel it is a step in the right direction. It is perfectly true that at Maudsley Hospital patients have come back to me and said, "The place is only an asylum," and they feel it is a stigma in the same way as if they had been certified and gone to an asylum.

16,944. It may be an alleviation, but I do not think you would be able to eliminate it. I know that personally I should feel differently according to whether a relative of mine had gone to the Maudsley Hospital or the Royal Infirmary; that is the view merely of the man in the street, of course?—(Dr. Cole:) You are talking of a mental patient going to the Edinburgh Royal Infirmary or to the Maudsley Hospital. I must admit that the man in the street would think less of it than going to the Royal Infirmary, because he would think the person was less afflicted.

16,945. It would be no reflection upon his rationality anyhow. Suppose one is told of a friend of one's own, "He has gone into the Edinburgh Royal Infirmary"; I would say, "I am very sorry." If, on the other hand, I am told, "He has gone to the Maudsley Hospital," I would say, "Oh, that is that very interesting place in London."

Earl Russell: I should say he had got that fashionable disease—a nervous breakdown.

16,946. Chairman: The question is whether you can bring those types of public institutions on a level in the public estimation?—(Dr. Menzies:) We want you to help us. (Dr. Goodall:) Maudsley clinic, after all, is under the London County Council. If it were not under the local authority at all, if it were like Professor Winkler's clinic at Utrecht, or a pavilion in connection with the Cardiff Infirmary, what would be the difference? Only that he had an unfortunate disease that affects his highest organ. That would be the only difference then.

16,947. Sir Ernest Hiley: We have already had the objection put to us that even a ward in a general hospital becomes known as the "balmy ward." We had that from a doctor the other day?—(Dr. Cole:) Yes; we cannot obviate that. (Dr. Goodall:) That is no reason why all the benefits of treatment should be denied to a mental case; that is the only place where he is going to get it.

16,948. Chairman: We are on a different topic for the moment. The question we were considering was whether you can at any rate mitigate this stigma by opening the doors of mental hospitals to voluntary cases, to provisional cases, and also opening them more to public visitation. All those things would go in the direction of assimilating the mental hospitals to the other hospitals. Whether it would achieve your ideal of getting rid altogether of the stigma is a different matter. All that you can suggest and all that we can recommend are steps in that direction: the removal of features which are at the present moment objectionable and unnecessary from the point of view of the treatment of mental disease. Is not that what we are after?—(Dr. Cole:) That is so. (Sir Frederick Mott:) But where it is not possible to have a clinic, surely it is possible to have an acute block, preferably outside the asylum grounds, so that some distinction should be made, and those people admitted there would never mix with the chronic lunatics at all.

16,949. Yes, Sir Frederick, that is part of the general question, really, of classification, is it not?—It is more or less, but a great many of the mental hospitals have not that provision at all; they have put it up inside the grounds. I am of opinion that it would be very much better if it were outside, because the public would then differentiate at once. They would say: "He never went into the chronic hospital at all; he went to the clinic."

16,950. Earl Russell: Will not the public on the other hand say, "It is where the raving lunatics go"?—No; they are curable. Then if you had in addition a convalescent block, the patients would go from that acute block to the convalescent block, and would never mix with the chronic lunatics at all.

16,951. Chairman: I see you put it thus at page 20: "This mixing of acute and possibly recoverable cases with the chronic incurable is now being recognised as a thoroughly bad system, for it tends to a prevailing idea of hopelessness in recent admissions, and not infrequently of helpless despair of returning to their homes." A segregation of this type of case is what you recommend?—Yes.

16,952. I think that is really a branch of the general topic of classification: that the cases, as received, should be relegated to different sections of the mental hospitals?—It is more than that, because they might do that in the old asylums, but the new asylums have now been constructed with special blocks for acute cases; that has been so in the London County Asylums. (Dr. Lord:) Sir Frederick would like to see that particular acute block situated not on that portion of the estate on which the main hospital is, but at some distance away, yet in touch with the mental hospital, so that a patient might go to that particular block (it might be given a fancy name) and not be counted as having been to the chronic insane asylum. We are adopting that in London a good deal.

16,953. Earl Russell: You want the patient to say, "I have never been in the asylum at all"?—(Dr. Lord:) Practically no recoverable patients with me are transferred to the main mental hospital; they only come into contact with the better class of chronic patients in connection with such things as cinema entertainments and so on. (Sir Frederick Mott:) Would it not be much better if the building were outside the grounds? (Dr. Cole:) That is a further modification in principle, putting those buildings outside the mental hospital grounds entirely, half a mile away. (Sir Frederick Mott:) If there were a general hospital in the town, that block could be correlated with the general hospital. (Dr. Lord:) Between the two.

16,954. Chairman: I should have thought the acute recoverable case would have been the best case for your clinic?—(Dr. Cole:) It comes to having a clinic in connection with the mental hospital or with the general hospital.

16,955. Sir David Drummond: Is that the considered opinion of your Association, because we have heard from that chair the opposite opinion—that they should be associated with the general hospital?—Whenever possible, we think it should be in connection with the general hospital. (Dr. Lord:) We have put it quite clearly that wherever it is possible it should be in connection with the general hospital; but if not in connection with the general hospital, it should be a separate building, and that building you could link up with the mental hospital, or be affiliated with the general hospital at some distance. You have got that under recommendations 4 and 5. (Dr. Cole): On page 9, in the middle, we say: "They should therefore be established all over the country in large centres of population, preferably in connection with general hospitals."

16,956. Chairman: Recommendation 4, Dr. Cole, is "That such a clinic should be where possible an annexe to a general hospital, or housed in a special building."—Yes. That special building in some instances might be near the mental hospital.

16,957. But where there was not a general hospital, or where arrangements could not be made with a general hospital, then the next best thing would be to have it in association with a mental hospital?—Yes.

16,958. I mean we must take things as we find them, to some extent, and as Dr. Lord points out, the idea should be in the first instance permissive, by authorising the adoption locally, as circumstances dictated, of one or other expedient?—(Dr. Lord): It must be, from the money point of view. (Dr. Cole): Undoubtedly. If some of the Poor Law buildings were transferred to the local authorities, they could be made use of.

16,959. That is a very practical suggestion: that some of these reforms might lead to the releasing of premises which are at present utilised for the permanent detention of lunatics, and thus enable some of these institutions to be set up. For instance, some of the Poor Law infirmaries are not full, as we know, just now?—No, and some of the newer ones have excellent accommodation.

16,960. They are indistinguishable from general hospitals. That is an instance where the stigma has disappeared. The Poor Law is resorted to by all and sundry now, without any sense of stigma?—(Dr. Cole): Well, there is some stigma. (Sir Frederick Mott): Are they not pauperised?

16,961. They are not pauperised; we have heard evidence to the effect that the stigma is rapidly evaporating?—(Dr. Cole): In the case of the Paddington Infirmary, when it was labelled "Paddington Hospital" patients rushed to it to such an extent that they were obliged to put the name of "Paddington Infirmary" back again.

16,962. It is very curious that the name should have that effect. Of course, as you know, we reverse it in Scotland?—Yes. Here an infirmary denotes the Poor Law. (Sir Frederick Mott): I think these hospitals outside the grounds would be really valuable as clinics too, because the practitioners could bring their cases there for an opinion as to what was the best kind of treatment.

16,963. I want next to take you to your views on the question of rate-aided patients and private patients. Do I understand that the view of the Association is that the two classes should be assimilated as regards legal procedure?—(Dr. Cole): That is so, entirely.

16,964. And do you recommend that in every case there should be two medical certificates granted after consultation, and not as at present in isolation?—We can have consultation now. There is nothing to prevent two medical men talking about whether a person should be certified, so long as their examinations are separate.

16,965. But there again you recommend two medical certificates by medical men, who should be entitled to give their joint certificate?—Yes.

16,966. And again you propose the assimilation of the rate-aided patient to the private case in this respect, that there should be a petition in the case of the pauper patient, as there is in the case of the private patient, and that petition should be at the instance of a relative or official, or whoever it may be who has to deal with the case?—Yes.

16,967. All that one understands, because it is pretty simple. You equally object to the element of pauperisation which is associated with the lunacy administration?—That is so. Of course, a good many of these people would never be paupers. (Dr. Lord): You have got to become a pauper to be treated, at present.

16,968. What is your view as to that? How do you propose to eliminate that aspect of the treatment of the insane?—Much the same as happens now in our public mental hospitals; immediately the patient pays the full maintenance rate, he is transferred to the private class, and the county council recover the maintenance. On the other hand, if he does not pay up to that maintenance rate, the maintenance is recovered by the Poor Law.

16,969. May I put two cases to you: first of all, the case of a pauper who is a pauper, that is to say, an inmate of a workhouse; that person may become insane and may go to an asylum; he would go as a pauper, because he is a pauper; that is to say, he is a person in receipt of rate aid. For that class of case one might not have the same sympathy, because there would be no alteration in status in that instance; it would be merely a person who, being a pauper, has developed a mental ailment. The class of case that has appealed most to myself and to my colleagues is the case of a well-doing artisan, who has never had any association with the Poor Law, but who, by reason of this particular affliction besetting him, finds himself converted into a pauper, because the machinery of the law passes him through a pauper stage; and even if the efforts of his family are able to provide the necessary means of paying for him in the asylum, he has nevertheless passed through a stage of pauperisation, which to many people, I should think, would be an unpleasant feature of the whole episode. Have you discriminated in your minds between those two classes of cases?—The discrimination is this: of course, naturally, if the inmate of a workhouse had to go to a mental hospital, he would become a mental hospital patient, and the Poor Law authorities then would be the "friend" who would have to take out the petition, and they would pay for him; but he would be, from our point of view, the same as the other patients, even if he was paid for by the local authority.

16,970. His case would be really rate aided through the Poor Law?—Yes. I had a case the other day of a man occupying a high military position who had to go to all the trouble, a ridiculous farce, of a near relative having to go to the workhouse and become a pauper, and the day after she entered my institution she was made a private patient. She ought to have been able to come to me direct and pay the maintenance.

16,971. Earl Russell: What happens to a person who is taken to a fever hospital and treated at public expense?—They recover from the friends.

16,972. Supposing they do not recover from the friends: what is the authority that pays in a fever hospital?—The county authority.

16,973. So that they do not become paupers at any stage?—No.

16,974. Chairman: As far as I remember, in Edinburgh there is a well-known fever hospital; lots of people go there; it is supported out of the rates, but not out of the poor rates?—No.

16,975. They recover what they can?—Yes; and a great many well-to-do people go there.

16,976. And they pay?—Yes.

Earl Russell: You have not got our Poor Law system.

Chairman: We have the Poor Law system in Scotland for lunatics as well.

4 May, 1925.] Dr. R. H. COLE, M.D., F.R.C.P., Dr. M. A. COLLINS, O.B.E., M.D., Dr. E. GOODALL, C.B.E., M.D., F.R.C.P., Dr. J. R. LORD, C.B.E., M.B., Dr. W. F. MENZIES, B.Sc., M.D., F.R.C.P., Sir FREDERICK W. MOTT, K.B.E., LL.D., M.D., F.R.C.P., F.R.S., and Dr. R. WORTH, O.B.E., M.B. [Continued.]

16,977. Earl Russell: Now the maternity case is paid for by the guardians, and there is some special provision that that shall not pauperise?—I cannot say about that.

16,978. Chairman: Is there so very much difference whether the rate out of which your case is paid for is the poor rate or the county rate?—(Dr. Cole): All the difference in the world, from the point of view of stigma. What really pauperises the artisan you are speaking about is that, say, the artisan's wife goes to the relieving officer and says: "My husband has gone off his head. Will you make arrangements; something must be done," and he goes to a mental hospital or an infirmary, he is certified by the Poor Law medical officer, and he is paid for by the Poor Law. There is nothing to prevent the wife of the artisan consulting her medical attendant and using an urgency order for direct admission to Hanwell Asylum as a private patient; that is perfectly permissible under the present law, but it is not generally known and is not often done.

16,979. Mr. Micklem: At present where a person is visited by a medical officer of a union he is deemed to be in receipt of relief, and becomes a pauper?—That is so.

16,980. Supposing this were altered so that the provision was that the mere visitation by a medical officer should not constitute pauperisation?—That would make a lot of difference; that is really at the bottom of the whole thing.

16,981. Earl Russell: They would remain paupers afterwards if they did not pay the full maintenance rate?—Yes.

16,982. Chairman: Let me put the two cases: the husband, in the case you have figured, has become mentally afflicted, and the programme is as you have described it. The Poor Law doctor certifies, and the man becomes a pauper in an institution supported out of the poor rates. If on the other hand the same artisan had taken scarlet fever; he has taken a notifiable disease in that case also. The medical officer will go to see the case, and will arrange for its removal to an infectious diseases hospital. The man will recover, one would hope, in that institution, and would emerge, would resume his work, and would never have been a pauper at all. Is not that so?—Yes, that is so.

16,983. Earl Russell: I am not quite sure that the medical officer who sees him is not paid by the county and not by the guardians?—He is paid by the county.

Earl Russell: That is a difference, again.

16,984. Chairman: This is all on the lines of the assimilation of the two forms of illness, mental illness and physical illness. Why should the case of the mentally afflicted have to go through this process of pauperisation, while the person who is compulsorily removed in the case of an infectious disease to an infectious diseases hospital, and emerges, never has been pauperised at all, and yet has public service rendered to him at the public cost?—(Dr. Lord): Lord Shaftesbury fought that years and years ago, and it was incorporated in the second Bill of 1845. There were two Lunacy Acts passed in 1845, but in the second Act the mental hospital was to be divided into two: one for chronics and one for dangerous or new cases; so that they would not go, as the witnesses bitterly complained before the House of Commons Committee, to a Poor Law institution; they would go to a mental hospital. That demand on the part of the medical profession is as old as the hills.

16,985. Is there any inherent reason in the nature of this malady that should render it appropriate for treatment through the machinery of the Poor Law?—(Dr. Cole): None whatever.

16,986. Mr. Micklem: There is this, that at the present time under the Poor Law you have poor houses to which they can be removed, and until you have your clinics you have no other places for them?—They can and ought to go direct to the mental hospital. (Dr. Menzies): We are trying to get them to go direct; the Board of Control are doing their best to get them to go direct.

16,987. It is a great advantage to get them into the workhouse from time to time, because very often they come out discharged without having been certified?—(Dr. Lord): I think it is a historical legacy. The poor insane used to be housed in poor houses, in prisons and lock-ups, and they became the property of the guardians, and they remained the property of the guardians.

16,988. Earl Russell: The asylum was built as a clearing house for the wards of the poor houses?—Yes, and every Committee of the House of Commons that has met, and many have met since the Act of 1845, have all complained of the same thing, that a poor man must become a pauper before he can be treated for mental disorder.

16,989. I was in Sussex on Saturday, and I was informed that nearly the whole of them came direct to the asylum?—Yes, and in Cambridgeshire it is so, too.

16,990. Chairman: Now Mr. Micklem's difficulty, as I apprehend, may be solved in this way: it is true that at the present time, as between the patient's home and the asylum, the Poor Law institution has been interposed as the place where the patient is kept faute de mieux for certification; but is not that due to the circumstance that no one can enter the portals of a mental hospital unless certified? If you can take your patient under a provisional order direct to the mental hospital, you can avoid the Poor Law institution altogether. If you can provide, along with the present system, a system of provisional treatment, then it seems to me that you can take your patient direct from his home to the mental hospital, where he will be dealt with under this provisional system, and probably not become a fully certified patient?—(Dr. Lord): Certainly. It is quite open now under certain sections of the Lunacy Act for mental hospital committees to make contracts with guardians. Supposing they entered into a contract with Paddington to keep patients, we could say, "You keep these patients, but you must have so many trained nurses, and so much equipment, and so on." (Dr. Cole): All this is under recommendations 21, 22 and 23. As you know, the hospitals are supported by the local authority, but patients are paid for by the guardians; it is dual control. From the general public point of view it does not matter where the money comes from.

16,991. Earl Russell: You will destroy a number of very profitable actions as to pauper settlement?—That is a thing which the medical profession thinks most unfortunate. (Dr. Lord): The Legislature has always had in mind that Poor Law authorities were not the right people to have charge of the insane; the Poor Law had them originally by legacy; the next thing was to put them into the hands of magistrates, and then they were taken over by the county councils for care and treatment. So we think that the county should take over the whole of the duties in connection with those patients. We think it would be better for the patients, better for administration, and economic in the long run.

Chairman: Now, further, on this question of certification, you recommend, I see, that the justice of the peace, when invoked either for the 28 days' provisional order or for a permanent certificate, should be a specially appointed justice.

16,992. Mr. Micklem: You do not want that with a provisional order?—(Dr. Menzies): I think we do not say so with a provisional order; only for the permanent order.

16,993. Chairman: Then I see you want a special justice for that?—(Dr. Cole): If possible. (Dr. Menzies): It is possible always. (Dr. Lord): I think there ought to be a special justice.

4 May, 1925.] Dr. R. H. COLE, M.D., F.R.C.P., Dr. M. A. COLLINS, O.B.E., M.D., Dr. E. GOODALL, C.B.E., M.D., F.R.C.P., Dr. J. R. LORD, C.B.E., M.B., Dr. W. F. MENZIES, B.Sc., M.D., F.R.C.P., Sir FREDERICK W. MOTT, K.B.E., LL.D., M.D., F.R.C.P., F.R.S., and Dr. R. WORTH, O.B.E., M.B. [Continued.]

16,994. What do you mean exactly by a "special justice"? Do you mean one selected for the purpose by his brethren?—(Dr. Menzies): That is the way the appointment is made at present. (Dr. Cole): One who is capable of doing the duty, and has some experience. A man once a justice is always a justice, and will be entitled to act; such a man may be inefficient; there is a difference between justices.

16,995. And between medical men?—I think in Quarter Sessions they are very careful about it; in some instances they are merely taken in rota. Whether it is always so or not I do not know, but I think approved justices are better than justices who are not approved, as a general rule.

16,996. Mr. Micklem: In most counties all the justices are approved?—(Dr. Menzies): That is unfortunate, because we think if a certain justice is interested in this question, he will do his work well, and we think that by specially appointing them they will be able to select enough justices whose interests lie in this work.

16,997. Chairman: And who will gain experience?—Yes. (Dr. Cole): For instance, justices in connection with licensed houses in the provinces are men who take an interest in the matter.

16,998. Then, next, I understand you are in favour of the justice, be he specially appointed or not, seeing the case?—Yes. (Dr. Collins): He does or should see the patient in the case of a pauper lunatic; he is directed to do so. In the case of a private patient he need not.

16,999. The patient has to be told after admission of his right to see a judicial authority?—Yes.

17,000. Again, that seems rather a futile way of dealing with it, does it not?—It is better that he should see him originally, before he makes the order.

17,001. I cannot see any reason why in the case of the pauper the patient should be seen, and in the case of the private patient the patient should not be seen?—I presume it is because there is only one certificate. (Dr. Cole): Telling a patient that he has the right of seeing a magistrate is very upsetting to some patients.

17,002. You do not want to have patients badgered about their legal rights and the filling up of forms?—(Dr. Lord): And such a form, too.

17,003. At any rate your view is that every patient should be seen on certification by the justice who is to pronounce the order?—(Dr. Collins): Yes.

17,004. I suppose in many cases the seeing of the patient would be a mere formality?—I think it is for the justice to see the patient and judge for himself. (Dr. Menzies): There is a fundamental principle underlying our recommendations. It is to make the treatment of a patient as a sick man as easy as possible, and to make his improper detention as difficult as possible; all our recommendations are framed to that end.

17,005. Earl Russell: Why two medical certificates?—At the end of 28 days a justice steps in and signs a permanent order of detention.

17,006. In how many cases do you think the second medical certificate would be of any effect in preventing improper detention? You are adding a large sum to the rates for the extra certification?—But we hope that half our cases are going to be voluntary, and another quarter will be kept under the Mental Treatment Bill and will get better before they are certified; so we are going, in ten years time, we hope, to cut our permanent certificates down to one quarter.

17,007. Chairman: This assimilates itself to what we discussed earlier in our deliberations, that one medical certificate will be sufficient for perfectly obvious cases; but that, in cases that were at all difficult, the justice or the doctor certifying should be entitled to call in a second opinion, and in that way get better assurance. But if you are going to have a provisional period of detention on one doctor's certificate, then you achieve exactly the same result, because that person is observed for a time, and it is only after a period of observation has expired that you bring in two doctors, in cases which are really pronounced cases, because the other cases in the meantime would have all eliminated themselves?—Yes. (Dr. Lord): I think our feeling was that the general public will be much more assured if in all cases there are two certificates. (Dr. Menzies): I should have gone further—but this is my personal opinion—that the patient about to be certified should choose the second medical man.

Sir David Drummond: If the function of the doctor is alone to state the symptoms, as it were, not to offer an opinion as to whether the person is sane or not, surely one man could make that statement?

17,008. Chairman: But I understand the certifying doctor at the expiry of the 28 days has to certify unsoundness of mind?—Yes.

17,009. In the first place, as Sir David points out, he has only to certify that this is a proper case for care, observation and treatment. Do you need two doctors to say that?—(Dr. Cole): No; one.

Sir David Drummond: That is what I mean.

Chairman: That gives us some relief, Lord Russell.

17,010. Earl Russell: I still do not understand what the second one is for?—As you know, I am an expert, and a general practitioner calls me in, and he has made up his mind that this patient has got to be certified and got away; but he will not act alone. He can act alone by sending a patient away on an urgency order. He calls in an expert, and says: "Am I doing right or doing wrong?" Then he feels assured, if told one way or the other, and the patient is dealt with. It is difficult enough to get some men to certify at all at the moment, and they are calling in experts, even amongst paupers, very much more than they did before the recent law case.

17,011. I should have thought that you could get all that by leaving the power to the justice to call in a second opinion, if there were any doubt about the case, because surely there are 50 per cent. of the cases in which there is no doubt?—More than that.

17,012. Do not you get all you want by leaving it to the justice to take a second opinion if he thinks it necessary, or if the other doctor thinks it necessary?—We are perfectly willing to do it, but we thought that in the present state of public feeling people would be more assured if there were two certificates. The original intention of the Act was that most patients were to go under Section 13, with two certificates.

17,013. Mr. Micklem: Not in the case of rate aided patients?—Yes.

17,014. Sir David Drummond: Is it your proposal that the second doctor should be an expert?—No. We really have thought this out, and at our special committee meeting we thought that an approved doctor might be a good thing; we have thrashed the whole thing out since, and we have come to the conclusion that we should not take from any medical man the right to give a certificate. We feel that every medical man should be proficient in certification of mental diseases.

17,015. Earl Russell: That a little gets away from the medical practitioner calling in the expert?—I am talking now of the person of means. In a country district it is impossible to get an expert there. (Dr. Lord): I think permanent certification is a serious matter. I am quite certain from my dealings with the general public in these matters that they would feel it was a safeguard, and much more satisfactory, to have two medical certificates, when it becomes a question not of temporary treatment but possibly of retaining a patient for many years.

17,016. Chairman: We have your view on that. I want also to hear your views upon the question of the central authority. Dr. Menzies has been good enough to send us a supplementary memorandum on this subject. I do not know whether your views, Dr. Menzies, have the assent of all your colleagues, or not?—(Dr. Menzies): They have the assent of these witnesses—not of the Medico-Psychological Association.

17,017. We will take it with that note, but we are most interested in the question of the part the Board of Control or any other central authority is to play in any reformed system. Will you tell us what is your view of the function it should perform, on the outline of your memorandum?—It is in the summary on page 5 of my memorandum. "Paid Commissioners in ordinary to include at least four or five medical and two legal members, the former of whom shall have been medical officers of mental hospitals. One should have special experience in mental deficiency, another experience of private patients mainly. These commissioners may visit institutions once in two years" (I suggest two years, but that does not matter) "the legal members need not go on circuit."—I understand that is the position in Scotland to-day?

17,018. Chairman: Yes?—"The medical members to be paid at least £2,000 per annum and to count towards pension the years served under a local authority."—we look upon that as very important—"which would contribute proportionately towards pension."

17,019. That is a recommendation that the Board should be strengthened numerically?—Yes, as regards its medical members.

17,020. Is it your view, and the view of your colleagues, that the Board is under-staffed at present?—It is from the medical point of view. One knows of questions being held over at the Board for an undue time, two or three weeks or more, simply because the few medical members who had actual experience of mental hospital administration were on circuit and could not attend to them.

17,021. Have you considered the system of having district commissioners?—I mention it here—district inspectors.

17,022. You call them inspectors. It sounds as if it were rather a more subordinate person than I had in mind. I was wondering whether, in consequence of the large institutions in this country, and the large number of cases, instead of sending your medical Commissioners from headquarters en voyage all through the country, which is rather a disturbing thing in a way, you could not have a system of district commissioners?—I think not; not high commissioners; they will savour too much of provincial administration.

17,023. I was assuming that you would have a central authority on top as the co-ordinating authority to whom they would report, and who would send down in special circumstances one of their members.

17,024. Earl Russell: And also that they should be changed about on a sort of Wesleyan circuit?—Then they would not be district commissioners.

17,025. Chairman: Why not? Three years in Lancashire and then three years in Essex?—Yes, you could divide the country into a certain number of districts, but they would have to be very few. I get over the difficulty of the number by saying that these central commissioners need only visit once in two years, provided that the local inspector visited oftener.

17,026. But, after all, the gentleman coming down from London and going to the institutions once or twice in a year has not a great deal of time, and probably may not have a great deal of knowledge of the local conditions. I should have thought it would have been very valuable to have had responsible, highly-placed officials who would act as district commissioners, and who would have a comparatively limited area within which they could be not merely visiting once or twice a year, but moving about the institutions regularly; that the commissioners should be looking in and out more or less frequently, and keeping an eye on things?—I think there would be a tendency there to fall in with the views of the local authority.

17,027. It becomes subservient?—In sentiment only, of course. (Dr. Lord): You could not put up a man big enough; they would have to be men probably inferior in professional status to the staff of the mental hospitals, unless you pay enough.

17,028. Pay seems to be the criterion?—If you are going to put in a man who cannot teach me anything, for instance, what is the use?

17,029. Earl Russell: It is not necessary that a district inspector should be able to teach?—No, but he is to exercise authority over me.

17,030. Chairman: Take the gentleman who is to be local inspector in head (b) of your recommendations, Dr. Menzies: "Local inspectors to be appointed by the Minister of Health and be subject to the direction of the Board, one medical and one legal inspector together to visit each patient twice a year and oftener if required in individual cases." In a sense, you know, that is the same idea. It is that there should be on the spot persons who have official duties to perform—duties of inspection; to visit each patient. It is very difficult to keep the two distinct. Suppose the inspector goes and sees a patient, and the patient says, "I would be all right here if I could only get a decent dinner; the food is abominable." Is the inspector to say, "That is a matter of administration"?—(Dr. Menzies): I say somewhere that he should report to the Board on each occasion.

17,031. Then the third suggestion is: "Associate medical commissioners to visit institutions once in two years to advise medical officers as to treatment." These are intended to be high experts?—High experts. That is a recommendation of the Association—recommendation 20: "That the remuneration of the medical members of the Board of Mental Health should be increased. The State should require the medical members of the Board to be of the highest standard of scientific and professional attainments."

17,032. These are consultants, really, who are to advise the Board of Control or the medical superintendent on general medicine and so on?—Yes. You cannot expect them to be sufficiently highly paid to be permanent members of the Board of Control, I think, because the Treasury would never face the expenditure.

17,033. You suggest that they should be paid by fee?—Yes, by fee.

17,034. But can you get as consultants more qualified experts than you already possess at the head of the best mental institutions in this country?—We do not want necessarily experts in mental disorders; we want men eminent in the profession.

17,035. To be sent round?—Yes. I know of no more pleasant visits than when Sir Clifford Allbutt used to come and discuss advanced questions of higher medicine with the medical officers; I remember it quite well. (Dr. Goodall): That is the sort of man you want, of course.

17,036. Then the idea is that there should be a panel of these people; I mean half a dozen selected men because of their great eminence in their profession?—(Dr. Lord): And their interest in psychiatry.

17,037. And you say it would be an encouragement to the medical superintendent to be visited by such gentlemen?—Yes.

17,038. This is quite a novel suggestion, is it not, Dr. Cole?—(Dr. Cole): It is. Of course, the alternative to this is that a good many institutions have visiting physicians now, and visiting surgeons—Wandsworth, for instance, and several other institutions; but that does not quite meet this point of Dr. Menzies, with which all the witnesses are sympathetic, that we recognise that the Board of Control require for their ordinary work people who have had training in mental hospital administration.

17,039. Do not you think the public might apprehend, if you had too many medical superintendents at the Board of Control, that they might carry with them too much of the atmosphere of their training?—Originally there was always one general physician appointed, before Sir Clifford Allbutt; in my time, Dr. Southey, the last being Dr. Coupland. The present Board has not a member who originally was a general physician, but I put it down to this cry for economy. There must be at the moment at least three administrators, but the fourth should be a general physician, unless this scheme of Dr. Menzies is carried out.

17,040. Do you think the Board of Control should have enlarged powers? At present, as you know, its powers are largely advisory. Do you think it should have more executive powers?—I do not know if the Association has expressed any opinion upon that. (Dr. Menzies): Yes, the Association expresses the opinion that a grant should be in the hands of the Board of Control, and that gives sufficient lever. We do not see why it should be any worse than the main roads grant or the education grant.

17,041. Earl Russell: What grant are you speaking of?—The 4s. grant. (Dr. Lord): At present that 4s. goes to the guardians, but under our scheme the county authorities will become the rating authority. I believe at the time that 4s. was granted, it only cost 8s. to maintain a patient.

17,042. Chairman: I think what Dr. Menzies means is this: he is contemplating a State 50 per cent. grant similar to the Child Welfare grant, and if that were instituted then the power of withholding the grant would give sufficient lever to the central authority to enforce its wishes?—(Dr. Menzies): Yes. I cannot see why, for instance, some associations (the County Councils Association, I understand, is one) object to the suggestion of a grant; yet none of them as county councillors and as members of the main roads committee object to a grant towards main roads, and very few of them object to the education grant. I fail to see why they object to having a grant for mental health.

17,043. Is it not because it involves an element of control over them, which the other grants do not?—The other grants do demand efficiency; for the education grant they have to pass a standard.

17,044. Have the Association any views to offer us on the subject of licensed houses as a class of institution?—(Dr. Cole): We feel that in 1890, when the Act came into force stopping the growth of licensed houses, it was on the whole a mistake. We feel that the general public here in England want their relatives to go to places that they select; some people like private institutions and some people like public institutions.

17,045. In your professional practice do you find that there are a considerable number of people who prefer that type of institution?—Undoubtedly; and private doctors do, too, in influencing their patients.

17,046. Is the existing number of licensed houses, and the accommodation available, inadequate for the requirements of that class of patient?—They are all pretty full, I understand. There has been no great cry about this matter, but there is a tendency when they are rather full to an evasion of the Lunacy Act, that is to say, that people are managed outside and without certificates who ought to be notified to the Board of Control.

17,047. It is rather odd that with an increasing population and increasing means in the country, there has been a decreasing number of licensed houses?—The decrease in the accommodation has been rather anomalous; that is to say, large houses like

Bethnal and Hoxton House have taken pauper patients. There have been several small houses containing three or four patients closed, by reason of the owners not being interested enough. The number of beds in licensed houses just about meets the present requirements. But you are quite right—it is an extraordinary thing that in thirty years the accommodation in licensed houses should be sufficient, whereas the number of private patients in the public institutions has increased very much.

17,048. There is another feature of it, too, and that is that their distribution throughout the country seems to be quite accidental?—Yes, quite unsatisfactory. (Dr. Lord): Another point is the increasing number of voluntary patients in licensed houses; the increase is 50 per cent., almost, in some cases. (Dr. Cole): We think that the licensing methods are unfortunate. I am thinking of one or two houses, one at Bedford and one at Rotherham; they are all built round with houses, and there is no means of moving a house. At present a house cannot be moved out of the licensing authority's area. They want to go ten miles away, into the country, and at present that cannot be done.

17,049. No; the licence is lost then?—It would be very satisfactory if it could be altered.

17,050. That is a minor matter; but the continuance of the licensed house system is, of course, one of the matters we have to consider. We heard that in Scotland there is only one, a very small house, of about 50 patients. Apparently it does not seem to be required in Scotland?—But the Scots people have been brought up with the Royal Asylums having excellent private patient accommodation; for years and years—I am speaking now of my experience of 30 years—although many Scotsmen come south for the treatment of mental disorders, a good many English people also go to Scotland. What I want to say is that Sir John Batty Tuke's place at Saughton Hall is the only one there, and Scotland does not require another; and yet I think there would be a great outcry if our present private institutions were interfered with. It surely comes to this, that if you interfere with private asylums you ought to interfere with single private patients, and to carry the thing out logically to interfere with private practice as a whole.

17,051. I think perhaps there is this difference: there has been a certain amount of public feeling with regard to licensed houses in this respect, that there may be a conflict between interest and duty in such institutions. You see, after all, it is not merely like private practice; of course it may be that there is a conflict of duty and interest even in ordinary practice, that the doctor may pay more visits than are necessary for the patient's welfare; but in the conduct of a licensed house there may be special temptations which do not arise in ordinary practice at all, and a conflict between duty and interest?—The only one I can think of at the moment is a dishonest collusion between the medical officer of an institution and the relative of a patient. However, the safeguards are such that it is impossible for anybody to be detained unnecessarily in any mental hospital, private or public.

17,052. Of course, you are associated with one yourself, and it is not perhaps quite fair to ask you the question, but you do not think there is any risk of an exploitation of a patient?—Not the slightest; I am absolutely certain myself it is not so.

17,053. Earl Russell: As to the time of discharge, there may be a permissible margin of two or three months, may there not?—But fewer cases are discharged recovered. The recovery rate would be very much larger in licensed houses if the patients were not discharged earlier by their friends.

17,054. Chairman: In short, when convalescence is established?—Yes, because patients in licensed houses have means of completing the convalescence elsewhere, which is not so in the case of a public hospital.

17,055. Earl Russell: I was only putting it to you on the Chairman's point of the conflict between interest and duty. There is another possible effect: that where the margin of discharge might be either this week or this time three months, there might be a temptation to extend it unnecessarily sometimes?—I do not think so.

17,056. I do not say it operates, but obviously there may be a temptation to do so, if there is a highly paying patient?—I do not think so, because people do not pay longer than they can help.

17,057. People pay up to £2,000 a year sometimes?—Possibly, and more, but then the point is this: that money is being paid, and the relatives would like to save it. Why should they pay for their relatives more than they need?

17,058. The Master in Lunacy has something to say as to the amount?—Quite so, but I do not see why you think a patient can be detained on account of the money he is paying to an institution.

17,059. Chairman: Surely that is quite obvious?—A man has a rich wife, and the wife is in an asylum—

17,060. You have not quite got the point that the public look at. I do not say for a moment it is a sound point, but one must appreciate the public point of view. It is this: there is in a home a patient paying £2,000 a year; he has really recovered, and might quite well be discharged. Is there not a certain temptation to the medical superintendent to say: "Well, if we lose Mr. So-and-so and his £2,000 a year it is going to be rather hard to make our accounts balance next year"?—I do really say, reputation is at stake: it is absolutely impossible. I do not say that some recovered patients do not remain on as voluntary boarders, paying large sums of money; they do; but why should not they?

17,061. There is no harm in it at all?—There is no reason why they should not. But to say that any medical man is so unworthy as to detain a patient for the sake of the money being paid, I really repudiate that notion on behalf of people who have to deal with private asylums.

Earl Russell: I was putting it to you as an instance of the conflict between duty and interest which makes the public suspicious of these places.

Chairman: A trustee in law is not entitled to do certain things, although he does them in perfect propriety and honesty, simply for this reason, that the doing of such things may put a temptation in his way. The law will not allow people to be put into such a position that there may be that taint, even although on all hands it is admitted there is none.

17,062. Earl Russell: It is a question of "Lead us not into temptation"?—I think it is largely theoretical, and practically it is not possible.

17,063. Chairman: There is one matter I want to elicit from Dr. Goodall. You are anxious, Dr. Goodall, to put before us your views with regard to the employment of female nurses in mental institutions. We have heard a certain amount of evidence on that subject already, and of course we also have before us the 7th Annual Report of the Board of Control, 1920, from which you quote in the letter you addressed to our Secretary. We also have the report of the Departmental Committee of the Board of Control which inquired into the matter; but we should like very much to have your own personal view upon that question. First of all, when you recommend, as you do, the increased employment of women in the treatment of male cases, are you speaking for the Association, or are you speaking individually?—(Dr. Goodall): Individually.

17,064. Is it a topic on which there is a difference of opinion in the Association?—(Dr. Lord): It has not been thought to come within its purview.

17,065. It arises in this way, Dr. Lord, that one of the topics remitted to us is the care of patients; not merely the detention and the discharge, but also care, and of course "care" involves the question of the nursing, does it not?—Yes.

17,066. Whether it is precisely within our purview or not, I do not know. At any rate we have had some evidence upon it, and Dr. Goodall has sent us a letter in which he expresses, I gather, his own personal views on the matter, but it has not been thrashed out by the Association?—Not as a whole. Any member of the Association here is prepared to give his experience.

17,067. We have had Scottish evidence very favourable to it. Would you tell us, Dr. Goodall, what your own view is on the matter?—(Dr. Goodall): I have had, out of nine wards occupied by male patients (the other is shut for the present, or that would be under female nurses) six under female nurses, and in two of those wards there are no men attendants at all. Since 1920 and during the war I have had about seven years' experience of the treatment of mental diseases, some of them very severe, amongst the troops; half of our hospital was occupied for mental diseases amongst troops, and they were all under female nurses, trained, certificated mental nurses, a sister and a staff nurse in each ward, and men subordinate to them. 2,000 cases were nursed in that way. For seven years I have seen the male wards in charge of female nurses, under the matron, with female subordinate officers and no male officer of any kind.

17,068. There are two points: one is the disciplinary point, and the other is the therapeutic aspect. As far as the maintenance of discipline is concerned, do you find that women are able to exercise sufficient control over male patients?—Yes, there is no trouble in that. The only thing they may be lacking in is a small detail, like exercising in the gardens, and soon they do all that. But I do not think a woman has all the time the attention of a man; they are apt to fail in small things, but those are too minor to put against the value of their services.

17,069. From the therapeutic point of view, do you think women are able to deal with the cases?—I think they are far superior to men from that point of view.

17,070. Is it recognised that a woman's ability in these matters elicits the better side of the men, and is soothing?—That psychological matter is part of the sex distinction, and then when the patient is in any way ill she is so much better from a nursing point of view, especially when supervised by a trained nurse, like the matron and her assistants would be; and the trained nurses are going round the whole of the hospital.

17,071. The ministering angel has always been of the female sex, I understand; at least, the poet said so; but that is founded upon a real psychological basis, is it not?—Certainly, I think so.

17,072. I notice with interest that Dr. Winkler, in his account of the Utrecht Hospital, said: "No male attendants are admitted to the female wards. Male patients are nursed partly by women and partly by men, but the first nurse in every division is a woman. The administrative staff is responsible to the professor, but its chief, the adjunct-director, on principle not a medical man, is independent in all technical, financial and administrative affairs." The second sentence relates to another topic, but apparently in Dr. Winkler's establishment, which you hold up to us for admiration, there also women are employed for nursing male patients?—Yes. In the psychiatric clinics abroad you do not find men, except in a subordinate position, the same as they are at the institution where I am. I think you will hear from Dr. Mapother that they have trained general nurses all over the Maudsley Hospital; no men at all, except for very subordinate things.

and Dr. R. WORTH, O.B.E., M.B.

17,073. We have had evidence from the Asylum Workers' Union that it is undesirable to have male patients attended by female nurses?—Yes, I know. We have had a considerable amount of difficulty in Cardiff with the Cardiff Trades and Labour Council and the Municipal Employees' Association, who represent the National Asylum-Workers' Union in the boroughs—a very great amount of trouble and odium.

17,074. On this question?—Yes, from the trade union point of view. In fact the committee of visitors brought an action for libel against the secretary, but fortunately that was settled.

17,075. What was the view of the trade unions with which you found yourselves confronted?—They said it was not moral and proper for girls to be looking after these people. That was one point. The other was that it was ousting male labour. Both of those were entirely false, but on those they went.

17,076. The first point seems to be not tenable, but on the second point, have you in the employment of women actually displaced male employees?—Undoubtedly, we have to. There are 75 per cent. of women about the place, whereas before—

17,077. But I am thinking of displacing actual persons. Substituting is one thing, but displacing is another. Have you actually dismissed employees in order to take on women, or have you waited till a vacancy occurred?—We never dismissed anybody. In the three remaining wards the men are there, because they have had such long service.

17,078. That is a point one must distinguish. It is one thing to make a clean sweep of your staff, which I can quite understand would be resented; it is another thing, as and when vacancies occur, to employ women to take the place of men who have died or who have retired?—Of course that was done. The hospital was all cleared out after the War Office occupation was finished, and we had to start with a new staff. That gave us the opportunity to start with women.

Mr. Snell: It would be true that if the vast majority of attendants were to be female, the male attendants would be proportionately less; so that the trade union, from that point of view, were on safe ground.

17,079. Chairman: Whether on the other hand you would retain men always because of that reason is a different matter?—I deny that that was a fair argument at all. They said that the committee of visitors did this on grounds of economy. That was false. They did it for the benefit of patients.

17,080. Miss Symons: Were the rates of pay in fact different?—Of course the women get a little less, but there are more employed.

17,081. Chairman: The actual outlay for the attendants is about the same?—The men get more money, but the women are more numerous.

17,082. However, these complications are a little beside the general question as to whether it is desirable in the interests of male patients that they should be nursed by women, because if it is desirable for their cure, it is essential, I am quite sure, that no economic considerations should be allowed to stand in its way?—It is most desirable.

17,083. One would have to be assured first of all that for the care of male patients women can do the work better?—Certainly.

17,084. And that is your considered view?—Certainly, after seven years.

17,085. It would be rather interesting to know how far that view is shared by the representatives before us of your profession. What do you feel, gentlemen, about that?—(Dr. Menzies): I have had them for 25 years in certain cases in the infirmary with children, and to a less extent with fresh admissions. My personal view is that you must cut up your admissions into two classes. There are some fresh admissions which I have not found at any rate can be nursed advantageously by women; they are altogether too violent and delirious.

17,086. Apparently the matter has reached this stage, that there is a general feeling, as far as we can gather from the information before us, in favour at any rate of the increased employment of women in attendance on males?—Yes, I think my experience supports that.

17,087. Because of their greater therapeutic capacities and also their greater powers of sympathy?—Yes. (Dr. Lord): I have had experience since about 1900, and I have heard a good deal about it since. I must say there is a good deal of nonsense talked on both sides. I think the medical superintendent ought always to have at his command a nursing staff, in the same sense as he has medicine. In other words, he selects the nurse, whether it is male or female, like he selects his medicine. I mean, to have any hard and fast rule about the matter is against all principles of the doctors' treatment of cases. Certainly I should object to anybody else dictating to me as to whether I should employ a man or a woman on any particular case. Therefore my ideal is to have in a public mental hospital certainly a considerable number of women on the male side, so that I can treat by female nursing such male cases as are recommended by the medical officer or selected by myself that are suitable and do better under women. If they are not doing well under women, one would put them under men, and vice versa. Certainly healthy, well-behaved chronic lunatics, when they become sick, have a right to have the sympathy of a woman, as in a general hospital or at home.

17,088. Earl Russell: A superintendent told me the other day that men did not like being nursed by women, and he had much better, sympathetic men attendants, who were much more effective?—I say that there is so much nonsense talked about it. (Dr. Goodall): You know the Scotch experience, and that is good enough for me.

17,089. Chairman: I am not going to raise inter-necine questions among you. It is enough to know that there are many male cases which can with advantage be treated by female nurses? (Dr. Lord): That is it.

17,090. The method we have pursued to-day has been to select points from your memorandum which interested us particularly, and which we have discussed with previous witnesses. I think as far as I am concerned, at any rate, I have exhausted those topics. That is not to say that the other matters you deal with will be lost sight of. We wanted particularly to take advantage of our meeting with you to put to you some of those points which struck us in perusing your memorandum. As far as I am concerned I think I have put all the points which I wanted to bring out, and the difficulties which were present to our minds. If any of my colleagues have questions to put to you, on points that have interested them, they will take the opportunity now.

17,091. Mr. Micklem: There is one small point I think we have not mentioned yet. I see your suggestion, Dr. Cole, is that where continuation orders are made they should have judicial sanction, or the sanction of two members of the visiting committee. Is that really a necessary safeguard for the patient?—(Dr. Cole): Of course, the recent action at law has rather prompted us to make that recommendation, but still we feel that we do not want to be responsible for the detention of the patient purely and simply. You know it has been somewhat ambiguous in the Courts of Law as to how long these reception orders last, and we felt it should not be put upon the medical officer of an institution to be responsible for the retention of a patient when the original reception order comes to an end. It is the continuation of the original order, and we think it ought to be continued by a justice or two members of the public visiting committee of an asylum, so that the medical officer should not feel that he is really detaining the patient.

17,092. Earl Russell: He is not to feel that he is the man by whose order the patient is detained?—Yes. We feel the same principle applies in the workhouse case, where the medical man, by signing a certificate, detains the patient.

17,093. Mr. Micklem: What do you think of the power of the medical superintendent to discharge a patient? Do not you think he should have such a power?—In a county asylum?

17,094. Yes?—I do not think he wants to have that power. Some do and some do not. (Dr. Collins): It is rather a difficult point, in that you may have a man with 2,700 patients. If you give him the power to discharge, that is very nice, and one would be willing to accept it, but if he has the power to discharge he also has the responsibility of detention, and that I do not believe any man can take over a large number of people; you cannot do it for 1,000 people.

17,095. Earl Russell: I do not quite follow that last answer. You say he has a power of detention; but equally he would be responsible for bringing them up to the committee for discharge?—That is another matter. The committee have a duty to visit and discharge patients, and there are various ways in which patients can be brought to the committee, but if you have a power to discharge a patient no one can exonerate you for failure to discharge the patient. I do not believe it is possible; that is the only reason I object to it. (Dr. Lord): What we feel is that all these matters should be apart from the medical duties. (Dr. Cole): You have not heard Sir Frederick Mott's views about research and medical education.

Sir David Drummond: I should very much like to hear Sir Frederick Mott upon those points.

17,096. Chairman: I wonder if Sir Frederick would come to-morrow morning?—(Sir Frederick Mott): I think it is most important. I found it so during the war. (Dr. Collins): I think we want that particular view to be given.

17,097. Chairman: Then be assured that every possible opportunity will be accorded to you. In that case I think we had better adjourn just now to half-past ten to-morrow morning, and we understand that to-morrow morning Sir Frederick Mott will give us his views on these matters of research and medical education?—(Dr. Cole): Will you want all the witnesses to come to-morrow, Sir?

Chairman: It is just as you please. In case any of you do not come, I should like to express our thanks to you for the valuable assistance you have given us.

great work in educating the medical officers of the asylums, and has totally changed the atmosphere in the asylums of the London County Council of which I have knowledge. When I was appointed in 1895 by the London County Council to investigate the causes of insanity I noticed a totally different atmosphere from what I observe now. The medical officers were mainly concerned with administration, and not with the medical aspects of the question; and I felt as a physician to the Charing Cross Hospital that this was strange to me. I noticed in the reports that no mention was made of syphilis as a cause of mental disease. That was so contrary to my experience with regard to organic disease of the nervous system in my hospital practice that I set to work to find out whether there was any relationship. I noticed that alcohol was put down as the principal cause, so I investigated alcohol in relation to insanity, and syphilis in relation to insanity; and I observed that there were a considerable number of cases in the London asylums suffering from what I would term juvenile general paralysis, so that the causes that were assigned as being the factors in the production of general paralysis of the adult could not exist in the children. I gathered 20 cases; one or two of them had actually been under my care at Charing Cross Hospital, and I was assured from that that the main cause of general paralysis was syphilis. I worked for 20 years trying to convince the authorities that if they would only prevent syphilis they could prevent general paralysis. Eventually it came about that we had a Royal Commission, and then this view was firmly established. I believe Sir David Drummond considered all along that syphilis was the cause of general paralysis. Is it not so, Sir David?

Sir David Drummond: I believe I had the honour to be one of the early exponents of that view.

17,100. Chairman: May I just ask this question on the topic of education: You are in favour of a special course of medical education in psychiatric medicine, which I suppose would be a post-graduate course. The medical student would, in the first place, pass through the ordinary curriculum; and then would he take a special course in this subject?—I have mentioned these facts to show that the medical officers should have been trained in neurology.

17,101. As we know, at the present moment the ordinary curriculum of the medical student is a very full one?—I was going to say we cannot burden the medical student with more lectures than he has at present; in the five years he has too many, I think, and the text books are so exceedingly good now that really what he wants are clinical demonstrations rather than lectures. I do not think I ever attended a lecture on mental disease when I was a student. I used to go round Bethlem with Sir George Savage after I was qualified; I learnt a great deal from him. It is extremely important, as Sir George Newman said, for a medical man just qualified to have some knowledge of insanity, because the very first case he gets may be a case of insanity, and he does not know what to do with it. Sir George Newman in his admirable report referred to that fact, and he said: "It is deplorable that the English student of medicine should have no opportunity of learning modern methods of psychiatry, or of diagnosing incipient and undeveloped cases of mental disease." When I was Examiner for the Conjoint Board for the qualification of Licentiate of the Royal College of Physicians I said: "The first thing is to set a question"—and I set a question on adolescent insanity in the paper, and I took down two cases of dementia præcox—they were quite able to go—absolutely typical cases. It had the most beneficial effect, because everybody afterwards attended the lectures and attended the demonstrations, and that is the only way to get students to learn; if they think they are going to have a question then they will attend the lectures and the demonstrations. If they do not have a question for two or three times then they say, "It is no use reading up all that, because they will not ask it."

17,102. At the present moment insanity is not one of the definite separate subjects professed by a student, but I understood that he always runs the risk of having a question put upon insanity in his general medicine paper?—Yes. He should not run any risk. He does not know what to say, of course, if they ask what he would do in the way of certification, and so on. I think there are plenty of cases that could be taken down to the examination room and shown to the students, and you might say: "What do you think this case is, and what would you do with it?"

17,103. Is it not the case that even in the existing curriculum at most of the Universities there is a short course in insanity, both theoretical and clinical?—Yes.

Sir David Drummond: And in the examination paper, too?

Chairman: Not a separate paper?

Sir David Drummond: Not always, but there are always questions set in most of the papers.

17,104. Chairman: The practice will vary at different Universities, but I understand you are chiefly concerned, Sir Frederick, with advocating a special diploma for psychiatric medicine, which would be on the lines of the diploma in public health?—Yes.

17,105. One knows that the medical officer of health in the ordinary case passes through the usual curriculum with all its various subjects, and after that specialises in public health, and obtains the diploma in public health?—Yes.

17,106. Your conception is that psychiatric medicine should be dealt with in the same way, that the doctor who is going into that department should pass through the ordinary curriculum, which should contain some instruction in insanity, and after he has graduated should take post-graduate classes and clinical instruction in this subject, and obtain a diploma in psychiatric medicine?—Yes. In 1907 I advocated that unsuccessfully, but it came about first at Cambridge, and then during the war it was seen how necessary it was that men should be trained. So I started courses during the war for gentlemen to attend, and after that I started a course at the Maudsley Hospital, and this is the eighth course (handing in the same), which was very well attended indeed. The London County Council recognise the importance of it, and now they will not appoint anybody to a senior post who has not the diploma of psychiatric medicine.

17,107. Sir David Drummond: Have you any idea what proportion of medical officers of asylums at present hold the diploma?—At Birmingham every medical officer at the two asylums, Hollymoor and Rubery Hill, has the diploma.

17,108. But you do not know throughout the country what the proportion is?—I do not know what the proportion is, but it is becoming more and more recognised that it is essential for any medical officer who aspires to become a senior to have this diploma.

17,109. Chairman: I suppose we have not reached the stage at which it could be made obligatory that medical superintendents of asylums should have this diploma?—It is obligatory at the London County Council asylums. I know recently there was a post vacant, and they asked the two seniors whether they had got the diploma, and they said: "No," and they said: "We cannot appoint you."

17,110. Mr. Mickleth: Is that the diploma of the Conjoint Board?—There are many diplomas; there is the diploma of the Conjoint Board; there is the diploma of the London University; there is the diploma of Cambridge University, and I believe of Durham. Most of the Universities give a diploma, but unless there are a number of candidates they have no special course for it; and I know recently a course at Manchester could not be given because there were not enough men applying to attend. In

5 May, 1925.] Dr. R. H. COLE, M.D., F.R.C.P., Dr. M. A. COLLINS, O.B.E., M.D., Dr. E. GOODALL, C.B.E., M.D., F.R.C.P., Dr. J. R. LORD, C.B.E., M.B., Sir FREDERICK W. MOTT, K.B.E., LL.D. M.D., F.R.C.P., F.R.S., and Dr. R. WORTH, O.B.E., M.B. [Continued.]

London, of course, we have that great advantage; there are so many medical officers who attend, and the London County Council are very wise in giving study leave; they say: "Well, if we insist upon this we must give the men facilities for acquiring the knowledge," therefore they give them six months leave to study, at the Maudsley Hospital, laboratory methods; and they go back to their asylums, if not equipped (because it takes a long time to be thoroughly equipped in a science like pathology), at any rate, with an idea of the value of scientific work in the elucidation of disease, and they know all the routine methods, and know how to apply them when they get to be medical superintendents.

17,111. There is one other point that occurred to me; is it part of your contemplation that these post-graduate courses in psychiatric medicine should be associated with every medical school, or rather that certain of the medical schools should offer these facilities? I know it is part of the general University policy in this country just now not to duplicate or triplicate special courses in all the Universities, but rather to let one University, or a group of Universities become recognised as the proper place to go to for a particular subject?—I think you are quite wise there, because even at Manchester, which is a very first-rate medical school, they could not get enough men to attend the class to make it worth while to have a special class.

17,112. Then a student or a graduate who is going in for this special course is not tied locally in quite the same way, he may go to London or Cambridge, or wherever it may be, for this post-graduate course, and probably the matter might be more economically dealt with if certain of the medical schools specialised in this department, and got together in that way classes which would justify the courses?—There is one point I should like to emphasise, and that is the desirability of medical students having a course of lectures on general psychology at the end of their physiological course, because I think it is most valuable. At Manchester they have adopted that principle.

17,113. It would be in the ordinary curriculum?—Yes, because during the war it was really lamentable, the ignorance that was shown by medical men of functional neurosis and psychosis, and it meant an enormous outlay to the Empire in consequence, because people were kept in hospitals who need not have been kept there.

17,114. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Might I, before you pass away from the subject of diplomas, ask Sir Frederick Mott, because I think his opinion would be of very great value, a question as to whether it is desirable to have so many different examinations? I mean there is the Conjoint Board which, of course, probably has the largest number, and there is the Cambridge University, which I think has the advantage of age?—Yes, it was the first, you see.

17,115. Is it desirable to have so many different examining bodies? Is it not rather difficult to standardise them all?—I think it is: I quite agree with you, Sir Humphry. I think at Leeds the diploma is given to men who work in the Wakefield asylum only, and to nobody else; but I think myself that it would be desirable to have only a few recognised Universities, and I think you will have to keep the Conjoint Board. A man, I suppose, would be able to take a diploma at Cambridge without a degree?

17,116. Yes.—Cambridge has a great difficulty in not being able to give the clinical teaching. They could do the preliminary part extremely well, but they cannot do the clinical teaching there.

17,117. Sir David Drummond: I was very much surprised, Sir Frederick, looking through the syllabus, to see how much time is devoted to the theoretical work, and how little to practical work. There are only six demonstrations, and then twelve clinical demonstrations in neurology. I should have thought it would have been advisable to introduce a good deal more than that?—But you see, Sir David, the diploma is only given to men who have been a year or two years in an asylum. What they lack is a scientific knowledge to apply their practical knowledge.

17,118. Would it not be desirable to offer the diploma to men who are going to asylums, but who are able to pass the examination?—It would be, but you see there are many difficulties in connection with that. What we do at the Maudsley Hospital now is, we have a class of case there consisting mainly of borderland cases, so that we could not get really all the types that are required; but arrangements have been made by which cases are brought up from all the London asylums to illustrate the different mental diseases, and once a month every mental hospital in the service is requested to send up interesting cases for discussion, so that the students get plenty of opportunities for clinical investigation.

17,119. Chairman: With regard to Sir Humphry's point, I can quite appreciate the desirability of having a recognised standard for the diploma, because if different centres give a diploma it will be very difficult to value it unless the standard of teaching and examination is more or less the same?—I quite agree with you.

17,120. Now you mentioned Cambridge University. I think Cambridge was the first to institute such a diploma?—The first, as far as I know.

17,121. Since then have a number of Universities, and also the Royal Colleges, given diplomas in psychological medicine?—Yes.

17,122. So that the movement that you have done so much to initiate, Sir Frederick, is already well under way?—Well under way, yes.

17,123. And what you advocate, I take it, is a further development of that method of instruction?—Yes.

17,124. And the desirability of the diploma in psychological medicine being recognised as the proper qualification for those who are put in charge of our great mental hospitals?—Yes.

17,125. I think that this training is desirable, not merely however in the case of the medical superintendents, but in the case of all who have to do with mental ailments?—I quite agree.

17,126. And I notice you conclude your observations on this topic by pointing out that all those who are engaged in the care and treatment of the insane, and in their after-care also, would benefit by such instruction?—Quite.

17,127. This is the programme of the current course that you have handed me, is it not?—Yes.

17,128. It is not dated, but I take it it is 1924-25?—Yes; that is the eighth course that is being carried on.

17,129. Does a post-graduate student who has attended this course, which I see is in two parts, present himself for the diploma?—Yes.

17,130. Is there a single examination?—No, there are two examinations.

17,131. Then if he obtains the necessary marks he obtains the diploma?—Yes.

17,132. But this is the programme of the entire instruction?—Yes. There is one other point I should like to mention. London University gives the M.D. in psychological medicine—that is to say, that the candidate can take psychological medicine as a special subject, and a gold medal is given. Now it was decided at the University since they have altered the curriculum for it, and made it practical as well as theoretical, that that should stand highest of all—should stand before the diploma even.

17,133. There are no specific indications in this degree, are there? Take a doctor who has obtained the degree of Doctor of Medicine with a special distinction in psychiatric medicine—probably has written a thesis, or something of that sort, and obtained the degree, there will be nothing to indicate that he has specialised in that department, because he might have got his M.D. for specialising in some other honours course?—No, only in this way, that if he applied for an appointment, and the question was asked: "Does this carry greater weight than the diploma of the University?" the University will say, "Yes."

17,134. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Do they not sometimes put after their name, "M.D. Psychological"?—That is so.

17,135. Chairman: There may be an outward and visible indication?—I think really it does carry more weight, and it should do.

17,136. You put it at the top of the hierarchy in the matter?—Yes. (Dr. Cole): There are, I believe, only a few who have the degree in psychological medicine, and one member of the College of Physicians who has passed for this work in psychological medicine.

17,137. There are a few who hold the doctorate of the University of London in psychological medicine?—Yes.

17,138. Now I think we might pass, Sir Frederick, to your observations on psychiatric research; and first of all, I suppose you will have noted with satisfaction that in Lord Onslow's Bill provision is for the first time made for visiting committees to have power, among other things, to undertake research in relation to mental disorder and the treatment thereof, and to make contributions towards the expenses of any body engaged in such research. I take it that one of the obstacles in the way of such research hitherto has been that local authorities were doubtful as to whether they had any legal power to expend their money upon this matter?—Yes, that is so.

17,139. And if this Bill, or a Bill on similar lines, were to pass, the legal difficulty would be obviated?—Yes.

17,140. But that of course would be permissive only?—Only permissive.

17,141. And I understand that in your view research is so important in connection with mental science that you would like to see every possible means taken to encourage the local authorities to embark upon it?—I should; I think it would be a good investment for them.

17,142. Then here again one must consider the organisation of it; one does not want every small centre to engage in research, because it would merely be duplicating work done elsewhere?—And it would be of no use.

17,143. And probably less efficient?—Yes.

17,144. Here again we must contemplate some concentration of effort?—Yes.

17,145. Have you in your mind any concrete scheme of research?—Yes, I have.

17,146. Perhaps you will be good enough to outline it to us?—When I reached the age limit, the London County Council asked me to go on for a year or two, which I did. Birmingham was very anxious to obtain my services, and I said, "Yes, I will go to Birmingham, and become Honorary Director of Research of the laboratory if it is associated with the University." On no other condition would I go. A Research Board was formed consisting of members of the City Corporation and the University, and Sir Gilbert Barling, who has taken a great interest in the matter and who is Vice-Chancellor of the University, is the Chairman. A Research Board has thus been set up for Birmingham; a well-equipped laboratory has been established, and it is hoped that Birmingham may become the centre of the Midland mental hospitals for research and for carrying on the teaching of psychological medicine. The asylums cannot at present subscribe to this, because they have no powers to do so, but the Guardians of Birmingham have already taken the matter up and have subscribed a substantial sum of money to the research laboratory, in consideration of which we carry out any investigations that may be required at the colony for mental defectives at Monyhull. Recently there has been an outbreak of dysentery there, and we have examined all the cases from there; over 100 examinations have been made; so therefore they have really got all their money's worth back again, because it would have cost them more to have sent them elsewhere. We have a scheme there which I hope will be of very great service. The laboratory was opened two years ago by Mr. Neville Chamberlain, who is in great sympathy with the whole matter. The laboratory, which is very well fitted up, is at the Hollymoor asylum. Now I do not want to see the laboratory dissociated from the clinical work, but at the same time I want it to be made so that all these outlying asylums can utilise the laboratory both for teaching and research; and the University, we hope, in a year's time will have accommodation in the centre of Birmingham for laboratories for research, and for routine work in connection with this undertaking; and if the asylums, like Barnsley Hall, Powick, Hatton and Burntwood, and other asylums in the neighbourhood come in, then really a very efficient scheme can be produced there. Birmingham could give a diploma for the Midlands, at any rate do all the scientific research work under proper direction, and also the routine work which cannot be carried on in the asylums, owing to the fact that it would cost a great deal of money to set up a laboratory properly and efficiently equipped, and what is still more important, to provide the brains in the laboratory. It is not bricks we want, it is brains; and that is what people do not seem to understand. I am very sorry to say that in this country we spend no end of money on cancer research, on tuberculosis research, and there are many many generous laymen who come forward and give large sums of money for those purposes, but with the exception of Dr. Maudsley, who gave a half of his fortune which was earned in his practice, I know of nobody who has come forward to help the investigation of insanity. The difficulties are great. But I should like to mention one fact, that Sir Charles Hyde has founded in Birmingham a Lectureship on Morbid Psychology, of which I am at present the Lecturer, and he has given a sum of money, £250 a year, for a scholarship in this research laboratory. Outside that I do not know of anybody who has given anything towards research in mental diseases.

17,147. That is very remarkable, but as one knows recently there has been a great deal of generosity shown towards the Universities in various departments, but apparently mental disease has not received the same recognition?—I think it is the old metaphysical idea of mind; we have not quite got away from demonology yet.

17,148. You must make your subject more attractive?—I am going to get Miss Nethersole and the People's League of Health to preach a crusade.

Sir David Drummond: It has not advanced its claims up to now.

17,149. Chairman: I should imagine if its claims were made known generosity might be stimulated?—I should hope that the Rockefeller Institute, which has given enormous sums of money to various things might do something; and they certainly do in America help research in mental diseases. In 1912 I went out to America—I was invited to go to the opening of the Phipps Institute at Baltimore—that has not been mentioned hitherto, and I should like to mention it now. I went out with Sir William Osler and Professor McDougall and we were present at the opening. That was given by Mr. Phipps. It is a very fine institute in connection with the John Hopkins University, and is doing most excellent work there.

17,150. I am afraid your subject has been the Cinderella of medical science hitherto?—That is so.

5 May, 1925.] Dr. R. H. COLE, M.D., F.R.C.P., Dr. M. A. COLLINS, O.B.E., M.D., Dr. E. GOODALL, C.B.E., M.D., F.R.C.P., Dr. J. R. LORD, C.B.E., M.B., Sir FREDERICK W. MOTT, K.B.E., LL.D., M.D., F.R.C.P., F.R.S., and Dr. R. WORTH, O.B.E., M.B. [Continued.]

17,151. We can only hope the prince will come along?—I am very glad to hear what you say.

17,152. May I take it the essence of your recommendation is to be found on page 24, where you say: "In my judgment research would be most satisfactorily carried out by the provision of a central laboratory in association with a University for a group of asylums"?—That is the whole point. I want to say we began it at Birmingham and so far it is a great success.

17,153. Let me just take one point along with that. You speak of a group of asylums, and I quite see the desirability of having the research work for these asylums concentrated in one centre. I suppose however you do not contemplate that the asylums which at present do a certain amount of pathological and physiological investigation in their laboratories should cease doing that work?—Oh dear no. If they are going to call themselves mental hospitals they must be hospitals in fact, and in the possession of a laboratory where all the routine work can be done for clinical investigation.

17,154. I want to get the differentiation of function between the laboratory and the research department?—Supposing an epidemic occurred, as it very often does, of dysentery or typhoid fever, at present we have typhoid breaking out in one of the London asylums, there has been a carrier for some years; it requires a very long and patient investigation to find out that carrier. Every case in the several wards where that carrier has been has to be examined to see whether they are still suffering from the disease, or are likely to suffer from the disease, and that can only be done in a thoroughly well equipped bacteriological laboratory.

17,155. Then perhaps we may take from you this: that a central laboratory on the lines you have suggested is in operation, is it not, for the London County Council Mental Hospitals at Maudsley?—Yes, it is.

17,156. And is a similar laboratory in operation at Cardiff also?—Yes. Perhaps Dr. Goodall will tell us whether it is in operation for all the asylums.

17,157. Then you have described to us the Joint Board of Research at Birmingham with which you are more specially concerned. Does that represent the extent to which central research equipment has been provided in this country?—I think it does.

17,158. London, Cardiff and Birmingham?—I am not sure whether they have recently done it in Manchester in connection with Prestwich. (Dr. Collins): They are just starting at Bristol. It really has been partly covered by what Sir Frederick Mott has said. It is the difficulty in an outlying district of getting medical officers opportunities to be trained.

17,159. You need to give them study leave, I suppose?—Yes; but at the present time that is a rather difficult thing to get committees to do; it is not very easy always for the medical officers to be able to attend unless the committee can assist them in some way or other. Of course, in all these districts in the south there is no university other than London; London is practically the only place where you can go, and for anyone in a country district 70 miles from London daily attendances are impossible, practically, particularly with the small staff we now get.

17,160. You cannot afford to let one of your medical officers away?—I have only three to look after 1,140 people now. If one man is going to attend a course, it is really impossible to carry on.

17,161. Have you found your local authority reluctant to give you further assistance?—They did on one occasion give study leave with pay, and that medical officer happened to get another appointment and never came back. That was not a very fortunate example. I do not think he could really be blamed, because he had a long service, and he had to consider his future; he had been set back by the war, and at that age he must go on; but still it has not encouraged the view that it ought to be done again. They will give leave, but they will not help them with pay. But even then it is difficult, when you have a small number like that, to spare one man for a long period. I mean temporary medical assistance is not as good as a permanent medical officer.

17,162. That is a very practical difficulty, and again it is a financial one largely, is it not?—It is financial, of course, but in all the south there is no university. There is Bristol, and there is London, but I mean there are a lot of places in between that have no possible facilities unless they let the men go right away.

Sir David Drummond: Might we have Dr. Goodall's views?

17,163. Chairman: Yes, we should like to hear Dr. Goodall on his Cardiff experience in this matter?—(Dr. Goodall): I think some gentleman said that local authorities were not sure whether they could spend their money on research. That is news to me, because they can pay what salaries and wages they like out of the maintenance account. They appoint all officers, and they pay all the salaries and wages; and with us at the Cardiff Mental Hospital there is a matter of between £1,700 and £1,800 a year being paid by the Committee of Visitors of the Corporation upon pure research, chemists, pathologists, their assistants, radiologists, and others; and, apart from that, there is a grant from the Medical Research Council in addition which comes in, but all that comes out of the maintenance rate, which partly accounts for the high rate which we have.

17,164. I think I should take a point there. I do not think legally there would be any obstacle to a local authority expending money upon research laboratories, and so on, in connection with their own asylum; but there would be difficulty in their providing funds for the establishment of a research institute outside their own district to which all doctors might be able to resort. That would be the difficulty. Now, of course, Sir Frederick's conception of a central institution could not be carried out through the local rates of another district unless it was specially empowered?—Yes. Then, again, it may be said I have an obsession on this subject of psychiatric clinics in connection with University centres; but there again I would like to see the central laboratory to which Sir Frederick Mott refers in association with the University clinic. It would be just as useful to the asylum, and it would be more consistent and logical to have it at a psychiatric clinic at the University. On that subject I feel sure that had the Early Mental Treatment Bill passed before 1914, when there was plenty of money in my district, I could have raised between £40,000 and £50,000 by propaganda certainly for the purpose; and I hope there will be a revival in business in my district, to enable it to be done with this Early Mental Treatment Bill. Lastly, if I may cite this short paragraph on page 28 of my evidence, it bears upon Sir Frederick's remarks: "The practical teaching of psychiatry to students in England and Wales as at present conducted—and I write as one engaged in such teaching—is absurdly inadequate—nearly as much so as it was over thirty years ago, when I was a student"—that was at Bethlem. "They can (with the exception of Bethlem Royal Hospital, and now the Maudsley Hospital) only go to the 'asylum' where cases such as they will be required to deal with in practice are very rarely to be seen. Compare with this the teaching of students at the University of Utrecht, for example (probably the best neuro-psychiatric clinic in existence is at Utrecht). The same lack of teaching facilities results in the appointment of junior medical officers to 'asylums' who know very little of mental disorders. This absence of tuition is, of course, very detrimental to our people. As regards nurses, it will be seen that the above plan allows for a free interchange between the various hospital clinics, so that the nurse can receive general and psychiatric training—a great gain to the public.” As Sir Frederick says, at Cambridge, the University of Cambridge with all its traditions, they cannot teach clinical psychiatry. That is a fearful stigma, and, of course, that is perfectly true. They have to do their clinical work somewhere else. No more powerful argument could be adduced for psychiatric work in connection with the University than that, I think. The same thing obtains at Oxford, not quite so marked, but it obtains nevertheless.

5 May, 1925.] Dr. R. H. COLE, M.D., F.R.C.P., Dr. M. A. COLLINS, O.B.E., M.D., Dr. E. GOODALL, C.B.E., M.D., F.R.C.P., Dr. J. R. LORD, C.B.E., M.B., Sir FREDERICK W. MOTT, K.B.E., LL.D., M.D., F.R.C.P., F.R.S., and Dr. R. WORTH, O.B.E., M.B. [Continued.]

17,165. Sir Humphry Rolleston: With regard to Oxford, is there not very much more than there is at Cambridge?—Yes, there is the mental hospital accessible—not the same thing; in my opinion a better quality of mental hospital is to be found at the one place than the other; but to take students there, in my belief, is quite a mistake. I say to my students at Cardiff, “You cannot learn your psychiatry here.” As Sir George Newman truly said when he came round my place, “You cannot learn your psychiatry as you will want it here.” If they come round to the out-patients at the infirmary, they will see there what they want; they will not see here the cases they want, except occasionally.

17,166. Mr. Micklem: Has not Dr. Good opened a clinic in connection with the infirmary at Oxford?—Yes, the same as we have at Cardiff, but you want an indoor clinic, as I said yesterday, as well.

Chairman: I am very sorry to say I am called elsewhere by another engagement. I am going to ask the Deputy Chairman to take my place.

(Mr. Micklem took the Chair.)

17,167. Deputy-Chairman: I do not know whether Dr. Goodall would like to add anything as to education. I think your précis covers very much the same ground as Sir Frederick Mott’s does?—Yes. I entirely endorse what Sir Frederick Mott has said and he has more experience in that matter than I have. I want to see this education carried on in clinics, of course.

17,168. Sir Frederick, there is one question I wanted to put to you about the education, not merely of doctors, but of nurses. Your Association has done a very great work in connection with that, and you grant certificates from time to time?—(Sir Frederick Mott): Yes.

17,169. And we have had before us the syllabus of examination papers which are set. It occurred to some members of the Commission that those papers were, on the face of them, extraordinarily difficult?—I quite agree with you.

17,170. And the question arose whether possibly some nurses who might derive considerable advantage from training would be put off by the excessive difficulty of the examination. Is there anything in that?—I quite agree with you, Sir. I think that the book that the Medico-Psychological Association put forward is far above the heads of the nurses to whom it is supplied. I would make it much simpler. I think they give a suspicion of knowledge rather than actual knowledge. Really that book as regards the nervous system is one that I could very well put into the hands of gentlemen who are going in for the diploma in psychological medicine.

17,171. They look to me rather like papers that are set at the University of London examination?—I have never set a paper, and I have always protested against it. I think it is absurd to expect these nurses, seeing that they are not drawn from the class that one would expect to be able to answer questions like that, to know this book and profit by it. I think the great thing is to teach them to be able to observe. I have seldom, I do not think I have ever, met a nurse who could describe to me accurately what happened when an epileptic fit occurred.

17,172. There is one other matter that I do not myself quite appreciate with regard to your suggestions on research. You suggest that there should be a central laboratory at some centre like Birmingham, and that with that should be associated the asylums in the neighbourhood?—Yes.

17,173. From the point of view of the medical officers in the asylum, are they to take part in the research in the laboratory?—If they wish. They should be able to come up there the same as they do at the Maudsley Hospital. At the Maudsley Hospital a medical officer has an interesting case, or he is interested in some department of research; he comes up there and carries it out under proper directions, and with the facilities that he cannot obtain in a small laboratory such as would be provided at the asylum. He is directed in his research, and no research would be published that was not approved of by the director of the laboratory. I think that is most important, because, otherwise, research work may be published which is not really of any value.

17,174. But the main research would be done by the staff at the laboratory?—The main research would be done by the staff, but still we have had two workers from institutions at the laboratory for some time, and they have done very good work. I had men sent from all parts of the world to carry on research in the laboratory both at Claybury and at the Maudsley Hospital, from Japan and from America, from the Colonies, from Egypt—and the researches have been published in the archives of the laboratory. I have brought the last volume to show you, it will give you an idea of what has been done. (Handing in the same.)

17,175. Is it your suggestion that the local authorities in the different parts should be asked to pay money towards the upkeep of central laboratories?—Certainly. For that they would have this in return, that investigations would be carried on for them in regard to any question of epidemics arising in those asylums, or any research work that they required done, and their students would have the facilities of the central laboratory for research and for education.

17,176. Taking your particular laboratory at Birmingham, is that maintained entirely by the University there?—No, by the Corporation. The University does not contribute to the fund, but the Corporation supplies the money, and the University co-operates.

17,177. And contributions you say are made also by the guardians?—Yes, the guardians have made a contribution of £200 a year in respect to the Monyhull colony.

17,178. Earl Russell: I had not the good fortune to hear your earlier evidence, I had another public engagement; but there is provision in the Early Mental Treatment Bill enabling money to be expended on research?—Yes.

17,179. We had some very strong evidence here from a representative of Cheshire who objected very much to what he called “directed research,” and he suggested that if those provisions were carried out people would be ordered to research into certain things, and the result would not be so good as if they went on in their own way. What do you say with regard to that?—What I would say about that is this, that the director of the laboratory would never interfere with any research which he thought was likely to be of use, or promising in any way; but he would like to have some control with regard to what should be published as valuable work if it was done in his laboratory. I would be very sorry to see what happens in Germany: if the research does not agree with the professor, it is not welcome very often.

17,180. But I think he went rather further than that; he deprecated altogether what he called team work, and he seemed to think that research must be like an inspiration in the mind of an inventor?—Team work one might say is quite right, because the most valuable work that has been done in America on heredity by Professor Morgan has been done by team work. He could not have done it in any other way.

17,181. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Was not the evidence given by a layman whose chief objection was to control from a Metropolitan centre rather than control of the laboratory?

17,182. Earl Russell: I think his idea was that every county should be on its own. I wanted to have Sir Frederick's comment on that?—I do not think I should agree with the idea of the Board of Control exercising control over research at all, because I do not think that is their province.

Sir Humphry Rolleston: I think his point was not the control in the laboratory so much as the central control.

17,183. Earl Russell: He did not like the idea of two or three counties being linked together and having one good joint laboratory instead of three bad ones?—I am sure the former is the right principle. I can assure you that the value of being connected with the University is immense. I will give you an example. I was very interested in basal metabolism, and the Medical Research Council gave me a sum of money, and I have constructed a basal metabolism chamber. Professor Haldane is the great authority on basal metabolism at the Birmingham University. I said "We will go and see him, and see how he has constructed his chamber." He has afforded us every facility and it has saved us no end of time. It is an enormous advantage to be associated with the University. I consider that a laboratory cannot be successfully carried on unless it is associated with a university, and has all the advantages which a university affords. Therefore these small places should be linked up with a central laboratory connected with a university.

17,184. Mrs. Mathew: I am very much interested about what you said as to the examination for nurses being too stiff. Could you give us some idea of what you would consider the right sort of examination?—I think perhaps Dr. Collins would know more about that. I have not examined the nurses. I have always maintained, however, that the Medico-Psychological Association have aimed too high as regards the teaching of these nurses in psychological medicine. (Dr. Collins): Perhaps I may say this: there are questions which arise to which we take exception when they appear in the paper, as being too difficult; but, on the whole, over a good many years examining now I find that the people that can do reasonably well in the viva voce are the people that get through the paper; it is very rare to find that a person who possesses practical knowledge and the ordinary simple knowledge that we ask in viva voce examinations, fails in the paper because of difficult questions, and so on; in fact, it is, I think, rather the easy papers that plough most people.

17,185. Earl Russell: Could you give us an idea of the percentage of full marks that you pass them on?—I have never examined a written examination. The percentage of marks in the written examination is 50 per cent., and if they get 70 per cent. in the viva voce, then between 47 and 50 per cent. on the paper will pass. Of course, a good deal depends upon the way the examiners mark, and that is a very difficult thing to control—I mean the Education Committee that is responsible for the examination of course cannot control the way an examiner marks. You can say on how many marks he is to pass, and you can say how the thing is to be conducted, but you cannot possibly control him in the way he marks the papers.

17,186. Deputy-Chairman: Does the Committee consider the papers that have been set by the examiners before they come to the candidate?—No

We have always taken the view that we appoint the examiners, and we do not control them in any way.

Sir David Drummond: It is at the beginning that this kind of thing may act adversely, that is to say, you may pass them on a 30 or 25 per cent. marking if you like, but when a young woman first looks into the matter she says, "I should like to go on with the nursing, but I really could not undertake to do this."

Deputy-Chairman: The original syllabus is so difficult.

17,187. Sir David Drummond: It is at that end that I think it operates as a deterrent?—I remember speaking about one question which, had it been set to a medical student, would have been a very difficult one, but the standard and the answer required by the examiner from a nurse was practically nothing. I remember actually entering into a private conversation with one of the examiners about this particular question, and he said: "You have taken that as though I had set the question to you, which I did not; I have set it to people whose standard of education I know very well, and I want the simplest facts from them." I quite agree they are difficult sometimes.

17,188. Sir Humphry Rolleston: The schedule is higher than the standard?—The schedule has to include everything. (Dr. Cole): The nurses are very interested in the lectures. The medical officers in asylums spend a very long time in giving lectures to these nurses, and in their spare time. It is very good food for the mind for these people, both male and female nurses; and, after all, it does not matter so much what the question set is as long as you find a fit person to be passed as a mental nurse.

17,189. Deputy Chairman: I think you would be rather anxious that the syllabus for the nurses' consideration should not be such as to deter any of them from entering?—We still have in the service some nurses who are defective in their education, and cannot express themselves properly in writing. Over and over again we have most excellent mental nurses who do their work extremely well, but cannot write papers. What are we to do with them? Are we to pass them?

17,190. Mr. Snell: You would judge on the general capacity of the person rather than on efficiency on a technical point?—That is so. (Dr. Collins): The General Nursing Council have adopted the same syllabus exactly; I think it is word for word the same. I mean that it was adopted by people who could not be said to be biased in our favour.

Sir David Drummond: I have been informed by matrons of some of our largest and best hospitals that they have been obliged to refuse some of the most likely young women (I am not speaking now of mental nurses), because when the matter was put to them: "Remember, you will have to pass this examination," they have said: "Well, I am afraid I could not undertake that," and they have not proceeded further in the matter.

Earl Russell: There is something in Sir David's point that, if you present to persons a thing which absolutely terrifies them, it puts them off at the very beginning.

17,191. Sir David Drummond: Matrons tell me that that is so. I am speaking of general nurses?—(Dr. Collins): Do we offend any worse than the examination of general nurses on that point?

Sir David Drummond: But the matrons tell me they object to the kind of examination that is set.

17,192. Deputy Chairman: In your mental hospitals so many nurses now have a certificate that it is rather a serious disqualification for a nurse who cannot get a certificate, although she may be of extreme value in the asylum?—Yes; it is a very great difficulty which is rather hard to overcome.

17,193. Sir Humphry Rolleston: I would like for a moment to return to the question of control, or rather, the correlation of research, Sir Frederick. I am sure everybody, including the Board of Control, would feel that they would not want to have research controlled, we will say, by a lawyer?—(Sir Frederick Mott): Certainly not.

5 May, 1925.] Dr. R. H. COLE, M.D., F.R.C.P., Dr. M. A. COLLINS, O.B.E., M.D., Dr. E. GOODALL, C.B.E., M.D., F.R.C.P., Dr. J. R. LORD, C.B.E., M.B., Sir FREDERICK W. MOTT, K.B.E., LL.D., M.D., F.R.C.P., F.R.S., and Dr. R. WORTH, O.B.E., M.B. [Continued.]

17,194. At the same time there might be some advantage in having a modified correlation of research such as you pictured with regard to a centre like Birmingham, that would give a kind of hint to a man who was keen, young, and perhaps was going to investigate a problem which was really a barren one and had been worked out already; there would be an advantage in a certain amount of control, or correlation, of research?—It was exactly that I was referring to, namely, that a director of a laboratory would probably know if the research had been carried out before and would tell the candidate: "This has all been carried out, and it is no use going on with that," and suggest that he might think of something else to which he could apply his energies.

17,195. And in that way he would save expense?—Yes, save expense; but I think you will agree with me that research can only be carried on in a properly equipped laboratory, equipped as regards apparatus and also equipped as regards the staff, because you want an expert staff in a laboratory to carry out these researches. It is not only medical men that you want; you want really men you can train to carry out the technique. I have one assistant at the Maudsley who has been with me 35 years; he can do things far better than I can, but I look at them afterwards, and the same with the chemist. You must have somebody whom you can direct and control in that way, but who would carry out the researches for you.

17,196. There is one other question I would like to ask Dr. Collins. You raised the very urgent question of the shortage of medical officers in the mental hospitals. You have, I think you said, about 1,000 patients and four medical officers?—(Dr. Collins): We have myself and three others, and the Committee have now agreed to appoint another, and that is to go up to the number of 1,300 patients that we are increasing to.

17,197. In a general way in an average mental hospital, what would you consider to be the proper proportion of medical officers to patients, taking into consideration all the chronic cases?—Of course we have not got what I should like to get, that is a small clinical laboratory; we have to send everything to the Medical Officer of Health. I should like that remedied. If I had that then I think I could on the present numbers usefully employ five. If I had not got that work to do, then I do not think it would be any use, if it was not possible for them to do their clinical laboratory work, and so on.

17,198. The average proportion would be somewhere about one medical officer to 250 patients?—Yes.

17,199. That you think is really quite practicable?—Of course it would not work out that way. I mean to say the medical officers who have charge of the recent and acute cases would not have the charge of so many.

17,200. I mean the average?—The average.

17,201. Sir David Drummond: I should like to ask you gentlemen your opinion upon the desirability of so arranging matters that the superintendent is able to devote more attention to his patients than apparently he is able to do at present throughout the asylum. Perhaps Dr. Goodall would tell us what he thinks of the functions of a superintendent?—(Dr. Goodall): After 30 years as a Medical Superintendent in two mental hospitals I hold the same view as I did about 30 years ago; that is to say, there is no reason why the administration should not be divorced from the professional work. I consider that a clerk and steward should look after the stores and equipment and the farm and garden, and the workshops, and, in fact, the general administration, all to do with economy; and I see no difficulty in it. Difficulties have been mentioned in the way of friction between a steward and a medical superintendent. I deny that there need be any friction if these men are gentlemen of the same social position, none whatever; and the benefit of that would be that the divorce of administration from medicine would procure and keep a higher type of medical man. As has recently been grasped in the Army, the promotion of medical men on professional grounds will prevent able men from abandoning the professional and taking up the administrative side, which, of course, is easy in comparison with the following up of difficult medical problems. As it is now, committees are rather apt to look for administrative ability in the officers they appoint, that comes rather first. That is an entire mistake, and there again I would point to the higher example of the psychiatric clinic, because there it is inconceivable that the director should be mixed up with economic questions. He is never in that difficulty abroad, never, and that would be an example. I believe this question will largely solve itself in the future, when medical education in respect of mental disorders is on a higher level, because men will not seek administrative posts, they will go off on medicine and will require to be appointed on medical grounds; so gradually the administration will come, I think, into the control of stewards of a proper class to carry it on.

17,202. In Germany what is the arrangement?—I know at the clinics they have what they call an "ekonom," he does the whole thing; that is a steward, of course. I shall be very much surprised if you hear from Dr. Mapother that he is much bothered with administration.

17,203. Deputy-Chairman: Would you divorce the administration altogether?—Not the control of all medical matters and nursing matters, but in regard to these purely economic matters, which I mentioned, farm and gardens, supply of produce and stores. I should make the stewards responsible for them.

17,204. One can hardly compare a clinic with a large asylum, can one?—No, it is not a medical function in any sense, and it can be very well done by plenty of men who are available with business training who are also gentlemen. I am old enough to know that this question has been obscured and made unpleasant on personal grounds as between a steward and a superintendent who have not been of the same social class; that has been the trouble, one has interfered with the other. Where they are both gentlemen I fail to see any need for difficulty.

17,205. But do not you think the ordinary medical superintendent could delegate so much of the administrative functions?—At present he is not allowed to; the committee holds him responsible.

17,206. He is held responsible, but under him there are many persons acting?—I would have the steward brought before the committee for all the economy of the place, not the medical superintendent.

17,207. Earl Russell: You would relieve the medical superintendent of the responsibility of seeing that accounts were right, and that sort of thing?—Yes. That view may be entirely eccentric, but I hold it strongly, and, as I say, I have been 30 years at it.

17,208. Deputy-Chairman: It is held by a good many more people than yourself, but, on the other hand, we have had a very strong body of evidence before us on the other side?—I believe the other view is much stronger.

17,209. Earl Russell: Of course you give the medical superintendent complete control; he would be able to give orders as to how warm the wards should be, although the steward would have to carry out the heating?—Yes, they are bound to come into contact on such questions as you raise. I say again, is not that a matter which gentlemen could arrange between themselves? (Dr. Collins): In my experience it is perfectly easy to delegate all these things. I do delegate all these things. I do not interfere in the question of cost, and I do not interfere on the farm.

5 May, 1925.] Dr. R. H. COLE, M.D., F.R.C.P., Dr. M. A. COLLINS, O.B.E., M.D., Dr. E. GOODALL, C.B.E., M.D., F.R.C.P., Dr. J. R. LORD, C.B.E., M.B., Sir FREDERICK W. MOTT, K.B.E., LL.D., M.D., F.R.C.P., F.R.S., and Dr. R. WORTH, O.B.E., M.B. [Continued.]

The committee take separate reports from the steward (and see him) and from the engineer, and from the farm bailiff. They make no difficulty about it, and they recognise that those people are responsible. All they do hold me responsible for is this, if I think the heat ought to be on I say it should be on, and it is the engineer's business to see that it is on—that is all. With regard to the employment of patients on a farm, and so on, a proper supervision is kept over them, but I do not go round, or have anything to do with what the farm bailiff does as regards the farm. I have never found any difficulty in the matter. You can delegate all these things; at the same time I should be very loth to think that I was not able to give any order I thought fit to give to anybody.

17,210. Mr. Snell: Are you technically responsible, doctor, for all these things?—I suppose I am.

17,211. That is to say, if there is a last word, it is yours?—The last word is mine.

17,212. But yet, in spite of that, you find it possible to delegate responsibility without difficulty?—Yes, without difficulty.

17,213. Sir David Drummond: Are you able to devote sufficient time to your patients as a physician—are you able to give that amount of time to the study and work and interests of your patients?—The thing that really interferes most with my medical work is the legal work with regard to the detention and certifying of patients. That is to say, I have 1,140 people, and a very considerable amount of mental energy is required to keep those people in mind at all, apart from doing anything else for them.

17,214. You have not quite answered my question, you know?—I mean to say I am not hampered, except occasionally when something special arises, from devoting time to the wards as much as I wish.

17,215. You think you are able to give, as things are at present, sufficient time to your patients—as much time as may be expected from the medical superintendent?—Yes, I think so.

17,216. How often do you see your patients?—Some of them I try to see every day, the recent cases, as near as I can.

17,217. Deputy-Chairman: With regard to the questions of consideration of the detention and certification, and so on,—those all require your medical knowledge?—Yes, they do, but they interfere with what Sir David Drummond was saying about treatment. I cannot undertake to have a particular ward under my care and directly treat people in it. Of course the larger the institution gets, the less often you can see any particular cases.

17,218. Sir David Drummond: I am thinking of some large institutions of which the medical superintendent has admitted to me personally that he has not been able to give that attention to his patients that they require?—I think the solution to that is that the senior medical officers in large institutions should be adequately paid and qualified to carry out this work, and simply require the medical superintendent to assist them as necessary. I do not think that you can ask any man to look after 2,000 people.

17,219. No, I do not mean in that way exactly?—Of course, the law at present does not recognise anybody except the medical superintendent as responsible. Anybody who signs any document has to sign it as "Acting." (Dr. Goodall): Not only is there the care of the patients, but there is the direction of any laboratory and research work. I can say honestly I could do very much better if I were divested of these functions, I could put in very much more time in purely medical work.

17,220. Mr. Snell: Is it not a question really as to whether the medical superintendent has the power within himself of delegation—has the faculty?—(Dr. Collins): Yes, a lot of these are personal matters. You will never get two people to agree, that is my experience.

17,221. Supposing you have a medical superintendent who has not this power of delegation, then you have a problem arising, and when that problem arises what do you think ought to happen?—You must try and select the right people; that is the only way it can be done.

17,222. When you have selected him you have got him. He may be the best man in the world, but he tries to take too much work upon himself?—That is so. There is a difference, for instance, between Dr. Goodall and myself. He has a laboratory in which he could profitably spend his time; I have not. (Dr. Goodall): You ought to have.

17,223. Supposing you have a medical superintendent of this kind, an entirely all-round competent man, but who has not the power of delegation, what is the wisest thing to do—definitely to separate the functions, or take the other risks?—(Dr. Collins): No, I think he can very usefully do that work, but you must provide certain people to do other work.

17,224. That is to say the right thing would be for the committee to take from him the duties of administration?—No. I do say you must provide medical men sufficient and properly qualified to carry out the medical work, if you are going to occupy your medical superintendent entirely with administrative duties.

17,225. Is it not a very great waste of training and learning to select a medical superintendent because of his technical qualifications, and then to use those qualifications for the growing of cabbages?—Yes. At the same time you must have a medical man in power to say yea or nay to everything. Beyond that I am willing to delegate everything.

17,226. Earl Russell: May I take you back to the earlier question of Mr. Snell's as to incidence of responsibility? Do you not think that if you are technically responsible for the accuracy of accounts and things of that sort, it makes it more difficult for a conscientious man to delegate them all to somebody else, and not to concern himself with them?—I do not think I am technically responsible for the accuracy of accounts.

17,227. Supposing a contractor is swindling an asylum of its supplies, you are not responsible for that?—No, I do not have any hand in that at all. The steward would tell me that was so.

17,228. I am not sure that a superintendent is not responsible in a public asylum. It is very desirable he should not be, you will agree?—Yes.

17,229. Mr. Snell: Supposing anything were discovered wrong in the accounts, would you be held responsible?—I do not think so.

17,230. Sir David Drummond: Do you think, as things are at present, that the medical officers of asylums have sufficient experience in general medicine? I am not speaking now of psychiatry, but general medicine?—That varies of course a good deal. In some of the places there is a good deal of general medical work. I think the standard of the new men, the men recently joining, has been very good. (Sir Frederick Mott): Do you think, Sir David, it would be a good thing that before a man could be appointed to an asylum he should have held a resident post at a general hospital as a physician?

17,231. Sir David Drummond: That is to say, you think it is desirable that the medical officer in an asylum should also be skilled in general medicine?—(Dr. Collins): He must be.

17,232. But it is not so, as you know?—It has not been, but it is now, I think, very much better. Until just recently it has been practically impossible to get men.

17,233. I quite agree with Sir Frederick that it is most desirable it should be so.—(Sir Frederick Mott): I think it would be very useful. (Dr. Collins): Of course we now appoint a visiting surgeon, and that has done a good deal to increase the standard. (Dr. Cole): Might I make this remark: do not we think that really and truly it depends upon the mentality of the superintendent? Some men are interested in administration. They would have done well in other walks of life, but they happened to be medical officers. Another thing that appeals to me particularly is that committees of asylums are unduly prone to think about the maintenance rate, and they think a good deal of a superintendent who keeps down this maintenance rate. This maintenance rate can be kept down by very carefully looking to the farm, and other matters on the estate, and therefore he gets kudos for that. But all this, I submit, should not be. Really it comes to a question of economy. We ought to have scientific men at the head of our institutions. I speak now because I am not a public asylum man, but I am connected with Hanwell as a teacher, and with Bethlem, and ideally we want scientific heads of establishments. That is generally agreed to, but I think that they ought to co-ordinate the work, and that a great deal of the administrative work should be done by stewards. I understand it is possible. One member of the Commission thinks that a person may be deficient in being able to delegate these duties. Then it is unfortunate that that man was selected to be a superintendent.

17,234. Do you think that in the appointment of a physician to a general hospital a committee would ever take into consideration his administrative capacities?—None whatever.

17,235. His professional skill and experience would cover the whole thing?—Certainly.

17,236. Why not in mental medicine?—I just know enough to remember some of the experiences of the past when Hanwell at one time was under the lay administration of the steward, and all I can say is that Hanwell did not work so smoothly then, and there was much more friction than now with the medical superintendent as the head of the administrative departments.

17,237. Earl Russell: The point I rather wish to put to you is this, that these matters of economy under the maintenance rate are precisely matters for which the superintendent should get neither praise nor blame; they should not enter into or interfere with his professional work at all. Do you agree with that?—Yes; he ought to delegate it to others.

17,238. But he ought to receive neither kudos nor blame for it. He should not be considered as the person responsible for that side of the business?—Personally I agree. (Dr. Collins): I do not think all committees take administrative ability into consideration in appointing a superintendent. I think committees vary a good deal on that point.

17,239. Sir Humphry Rolleston: The medical superintendent ought to have a final veto on all matters?—He must have, I am sure, because of the peculiar circumstances.

17,240. Earl Russell: And of course committees vary in the way they deal with their superintendents. They may say: "We want you to be a doctor; we will not hold you responsible for what goes wrong in the administration." Other committees, as you say, attach importance to the maintenance rate. Obviously they vary?—They do. Everybody tends to get a little sore about the maintenance rate sometimes.

17,241. The superintendent ought to be entirely free from that?—Yes.

17,242. Deputy-Chairman: There is only one other subject which remains, I think, the question of after care, about which Dr. Worth is going to give us evidence. At the present time there is no provision whatever, as I understand, under the Lunacy law for after care of any sort after discharge?—(Dr. Worth): Except in the London district. There is the Queen Adelaide Fund which allows certain grants.

17,243. That is not in the Act?—Not in the Act; but it is available in the London district, London and Middlesex and the Home Counties.

17,244. Now would you tell us what provisions you think should be made?—I think you have had evidence from Miss Vickers, who is the Secretary of the After Care Association.

17,245. Yes, we have.—So you are quite acquainted with this work, but there are certain things which have proved to us invaluable, and especially a recent action on their part in visiting the homes of patients previous to discharge.

17,246. That is the After Care Association?—Yes. We give the Secretary of the After Care Association notice that such and such a case is likely to be discharged, and would they find out for us the home conditions? They do this, and do it very successfully, and we are made then aware practically of the type of the home that the man or woman will go to, what the means are, and so forth, the number of children, and so on.

17,247. You are considering the discharge of a particular patient; you are considering whether he is sufficiently recovered from the mental ailment to be discharged. Would your knowledge of what is going to happen to him afterwards have any effect upon the judgment you formed as to whether he should be discharged or not?—Yes, certainly, because if he goes back to the old home and surroundings which have been the cause of his primary trouble, it would be useless to send him back to those surroundings.

17,248. Are you not in some difficulty there? The patient should be discharged if he is not a fit patient for detention?—We assume the man is well, and that he is fit for discharge, but before his discharge we like to find out what the conditions are to which we are sending him back. We have no knowledge of them.

17,249. What I am putting to you is whether you have regard to that in considering if he is fit for discharge or not?—Yes, and no; very often the Mental After Care Association will help us out of this, because they will take a case out on trial; they will take that case for a month and report to us the improvement or otherwise during that month on trial. But there are other cases which, of course, I would like the Commission to know; it has been said that we detain cases unnecessarily, but, on the other hand, there are many difficulties in discharging some cases that are well, or to find a place for them to go to; the wife will not have the husband, or the husband will not have the wife, and it is extremely difficult to know what to do with them. The After Care Association again step in and help us, and they will take that case to one of their homes, and will find work for them. One of the good works that they go in for, which has not, I think, been mentioned before, and which I have had personal experience of, is a clinical out-patients' department; and it has been most essential in many cases to remove a patient from his or her present environment—that is, there is no chance for them, there is no rest or anything, no prospect of that incipient trouble stopping at that stage. The After Care Association then again step in by allowing us to send those cases to their homes. Unfortunately they cannot do this for nothing, but money has to be found to pay their expenses.

17,250. Those cases you are speaking of are "pre-care" cases?—This is the "pre-care" which it is the ambition of the After Care Association to legalise. This is done more or less as a favour at the time, but they hope in the future to legalise this. Another point I may mention is that there are some rather striking figures, and that during 1923 and 1924 the Mental After Care Association dealt with 1,986 cases. Then out of these we consider that we helped by advice, or kept from relapsing, 87 cases who applied there when feeling ill or worried, and were either seen by a doctor or given the necessary advice. That is a very great help, both to the county and to the rates.

17,251. Now, of course, all that is excellent voluntary work?—Yes.

17,252. Is it your suggestion that that kind of work should be made statutory—that there should be an obligation put upon the local authorities to undertake that?—That, again, is a very difficult question, whether it would be possible for the Government to make them a grant and keep the Association a voluntary one, or whether the rates should pay for the whole thing. It is a question which I do not need to give an opinion upon, because the Association itself, I gather, wants to remain on the voluntary basis, if possible.

17,253. Earl Russell: There is an intermediate course in which the county councils can be empowered to subscribe?—That they can do at the present moment. (Dr. Cole): It is not legal.

17,254. Deputy Chairman: There was provision made in the Early Mental Treatment Bill?—(Dr. Worth): We have applied to the Minister of Health, and he has sanctioned the granting by my committee, (and other committees, I suppose, do the same), of a certain sum to the After Care Association, but you cannot pay their actual expenses. But the Minister of Health has sanctioned this grant.

17,255. I have rather quoted the evidence that was given us on behalf of that Association. Do they act all over the country, or is their work rather confined to the London district?—It is a spreading organisation; they are gradually going farther afield. There are centres in some of the big towns, and it is a progressive thing. Then, of course, one of their works which helps us enormously is visiting patients while on trial. We frequently now, almost in the majority of cases, send patients out for three weeks' to six weeks' trial. We have not facilities to go and visit them while they are on trial, but the visitors of the After Care Association do visit them.

17,256. You give notice to the visitors of the After Care Association?—Yes, and they report to us the conditions.

17,257. There can be no doubt about the value of the work, but the difficult problem is how far that kind of work should be made obligatory upon the local authorities, whether it should be made a statutory provision?—Of course, there are a good many guardians and people who do subscribe towards their funds now, and I think it has the sympathy of nearly everybody. It would appear to me that if the Commission could recommend it, a Government grant could be made them according to the number of cases they dealt with, or something of that sort; it would be a very great thing, because they would be able to extend their energies all over the country.

17,258. Mr. Snell: Do you mean to be administered or granted by the local committees?—It is, to a certain extent, now; they do get their subscriptions from boards of guardians, and from county councils; but I was thinking whether there could be a central fund straight from the Ministry of Health.

17,259. To grant to the central After Care Association?—Yes.

17,260. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Would it not be reasonable to consider that the after treatment of patients who have been in mental hospitals, and the early treatment of patients who are attending the clinics, is really an essential part of the treatment at the clinic, or at the mental hospital, and that they ought to be under the same organisation? I mean the After Care Association has done an enormous amount of good; but, after all, it is more or less a personal administration; it is not so linked up as to be an essential part of the treatment in the mental hospital. Ought not the two things to be continuous?—We take things as we find them. The After Care Association is in being, the clinics are not. If these clinics are going to be established and supported, then a great deal of the work of the Mental After Care Association will not be required.

17,261. Miss Symons: I was wondering whether you feel that this work, particularly the visiting and finding out about the home circumstances, can best be done through a central association like the After Care Association, or rather in the way that it is done in the general hospitals through almoners definitely attached to the hospitals?—Yes, that is a point which has arisen, but the After Care Association, as I say, are doing the work; and we have relied upon them because they have already established their principles of visiting. I daresay each county, or each mental hospital, could establish and have its own almoner, and find out all the requirements; but it has not been done, and we have relied on the After Care Association up to date.

17,262. Mr. Snell: Is it your experience, Dr. Worth, that the ladies and gentlemen who do this work voluntarily are of the right type for the work they choose to do?—I think so, yes.

17,263. Sir David Drummond: Do you find their attentions are resented by friends and ex-patients?—Very, very rarely. I think there has only been one case in the last four or five years that I know of where it was resented.

17,264. Earl Russell: I think the Secretary of the Association gave us the impression that there were not infrequent cases in which they were asked not to call?—That is not my own personal experience. (Dr. Goodall): I could give you the local experience, if you like, at Cardiff.

17,265. Deputy-Chairman: If you please?—The After Care Association has been in existence for about 3½ years, and it is composed of the Cardiff League of Social Service, the Cardiff Guardians and the Cardiff Mental Hospital Committee, and there is a Committee set up representing these three. That Committee reports to the Mental Hospital Committee, who are affiliated with the central body in London by paying them merely a nominal fee. Miss Vickers came down and started this business with us. I recommended the Committee to be affiliated, I thought it was the proper thing; the actual work, however, is done by their own local organisation. Now, this body visits patients who are about to be discharged from the mental hospital, to find out about them, what they have got to say and what they want. The patients who might be found occupation, otherwise have to be detained, because they are not strong enough to face the worries of life. The most important function is what Dr. Worth has described, that is to say, visiting the homes of people who are about to be discharged, and also keeping an eye on them after they are discharged on trial, and working in co-operation with the out-patient clinic at the Cardiff Royal Infirmary, bringing these cases there and reporting upon them as to whether medicines are being taken and the steps are being carried out which have been recommended. The grant that the Visiting Committee is authorised under the Act to pay whilst a patient is on trial, is paid to the Secretary of this After Care Association and disbursed by her, not paid direct to the patient. Then our great difficulty is the hampering feature that there are no cottage homes to which these patients can be sent. We have arranged to send them to Miss Vickers' homes about London, but after the expense of having to fetch a patient back because he was still on our books, we do not want any more of it. We want our own cottage homes and our own organisations, and that is what the Early Mental Treatment Bill allowed local authorities to do, to set up cottage homes or incur any other expenditure in connection with the after care. That is Lord Onslow's Bill. Without cottage homes and convalescent homes the thing is enormously hampered.

17,266. Earl Russell: The advantage of a cottage home is that it enables you to discharge a patient where otherwise, the domestic surroundings being unsuitable, you would not be able to do so?—That is so. There is no place for convalescents, they simply go into medias res at once. (Dr. Lord): Some two and a half or three years ago we commenced, in the first instance at Horton, to try and throw open the hospital in a sense to the general public by the appointment of lady visitors, who should be ladies interested in mental work who would perform certain functions. One was to visit the homes of all patients admitted and tell to the medical officer (on a form which I drew up) the environment the patient had come from, hereditary points, and so on, and something about causation; and throughout that patient's time in hospital she was to be the link between the patient and the home. When the question arose of the patient's discharge we did not feel we were justified in interfering with the work so splendidly done by Miss Vickers, so our visitor's duties cease at the moment the patients leave hospital, and they are handed over to Miss Vickers. Lately we have completed that end of the scheme; and the programme is as follows, that when a medical officer views a patient as a possible discharge he sends off to Miss Vickers a form on which she has to make her comments on the environment and so on that the patient is going to. It is filled up by Miss Vickers' helpers in various districts. That comes back and is studied by the Medical Superintendent.

17,267. You know this already from your own almoner's reports?—The environment may be quite different; two or more years might have elapsed.

17,268. I thought you said they kept in touch during all the time in the hospital?—They do keep in touch with the home, so long as it exists.

17,269. Is not this duplicating work?—No, I will explain that. The particulars now sought are very different. For instance, they want to know now particulars of the income, the money coming into the home, the number of dependents; who exactly is going to be in the home to look after the patient; any views as to the possibility of employment. The environment report on discharge covers ground which is essentially different from that on admission, therefore two environment reports in any case would have to be made, whether they are done by the same person or not. Now this report comes in in due course, and is presented to me with the patient, and afterwards, if I think the patient is suitable for discharge on trial, it goes to the committee, so that the committee have a very full account of the patient. They have, in the first place, all the documents regarding the patient; they have a full and complete account of the environment the patient came from; from the notes they can judge as to the progress the patient has made, and then they have this other document showing the environment which it is proposed to send the patient to, with a lot of particulars which will help them in their disposal of their patients.

17,270. Do the people in the homes not mind having two visitors?—The experience of my hospital visitor and her helpers, is that they have never had a rebuff. Miss Vickers writes to me to the same effect. I did suggest that the friends might object to somebody from the After Care Association going to their homes, particularly if it got known in the neighbourhood; it might inform the public that a person was there who had been discharged from an asylum.

17,271. Deputy-Chairman: Would not the patients themselves sometimes take objection to that?—We have found no objection taken in any case. Miss Vickers tells me by letter that she cannot recollect any; there is no objection by the friends, and certainly no objection by the patients. All patients, whichever way the committee dispose of them, are included in the same scheme.

17,272. Is it the view of the Association that there ought to be homes for convalescents provided, or is it advisable to leave after-care really to voluntary effort assisted by grant?—The point was this: in the establishment of the hospital visitors we had to take into account, as Dr. Worth has mentioned, the general public, their prejudices and their views. Some of them are not very well informed, and we do know this that if I had to make Miss Dale an official and pay her through the hospital, then I should start trouble for her. In other words, she would be looked upon with the same suspicions as unfortunately many people attached officially to mental hospitals are now. She is an outside person. All we can do is to pay any legitimate expenses, railway fares, and that sort of thing, and I felt that the movement is best in the hands of people that do not occupy official positions in the hospital service. I also feel (I am speaking now for the mental hospital I am in) that as far as after care is concerned, it is best undertaken by an outside body. Contribute by all means, and that is what we do; we contribute expenses in one case, and as far as the after care is concerned at present we merely are able to contribute to the maintenance of patients, when out on trial.

17,273. Miss Symons: You think that the peculiar difficulties of the mental hospitals are really not comparable with the ordinary hospitals?—That is so.

17,274. On the face of it, apart from that, one feels that there might be something to be said for the hospital system of a trained almoner rather than a trained visitor, because with voluntary visitors you might not always be able to get the right type of person?—I envisage the time when perhaps there will need to be a paid official of that sort, but her activity would be strictly limited to inside the hospital, and she would be assisted outside by unpaid or partly supported helpers. In America all this is done by one service, which is established by the medical superintendent. He has three or four officials, who deal with the patients on admission, and the same set of officials deals with them on discharge. The patients are put on parole for 12 months, and during that period it is the business of the medical superintendent, assisted by all these helpers and agencies, to re-establish the patient in life.

17,275. Earl Russell: You appreciate Miss Symons' point about the difficulty with unpaid voluntary workers as to what you may get. You may get an angel of mercy, or you may get a very tiresome woman?—At Horton we have trained nearly all the visitors attached to London County hospitals. You have to select them, of course; but even your paid official might be very irritating and annoying.

Miss Symons: But you can carry on some system of training.

17,276. Earl Russell: And you can dismiss them more readily than you can a voluntary person who is trying to be useful and trying to do good?—Yes; but I do not think you will get that right influence in the homes in England if this work is done by paid hospital officials. You might just as well send a head nurse.

17,277. Deputy Chairman: Your recommendation, No. 50, Dr. Cole, made on behalf of the Association, is a little vague, but I suppose it is as far as the Association can go. You say: "That the after-care of rate-aided patients should receive due attention, and that the work done by the Mental After Care Association, or other bodies appointed to deal with after-care, should receive adequate pecuniary recognition by statutory committees"?—(Dr. Cole): At present we do not feel it is in the statute at all.

17,278. Earl Russell: No, it is not.—For many years nothing was done for after-care at all, and in the interests of the State it is most important that these people should be put in a condition that insanity should not recur. Their homes are very unsatisfactory places for them to go to. If we had these cottage homes about the country undoubtedly they could leave the county mental hospitals earlier. It is different with private patients, they need not remain so long, because their home conditions may be satisfactory. It is not so with the poorer classes. I do not know that anything more can be said. We ask that it should be a statutory permission to pay for them. It is quite true that at Wandsworth the Committee pays, but there are very few committees of asylums who do pay.

17,279. Your idea is to let it grow naturally and see how it works?—That is so. These cottage homes are very difficult to get hold of. I remember the Council of the After Care Association in connection with St. Mary's Hospital tried to use those homes for patients there, but they are always full. There are very few people who want to take in a convalescent patient of that class. They are retired nurses and attendants of asylums. You cannot send them to anybody. (Dr. Goodall): I have a list from Miss Vickers of about 25 local authorities who are paying a subscription to her Association. There is no authority for it, but it is done, and it is being done by us. (Dr. Cole): I do not know whether the Commission want to hear any of Dr. Lord's evidence with regard to the foreign systems, which your Secretary said the Commission would be glad to have some record of. It has been prepared by Dr. Edwards and Dr. Lord—Dr. Lord more especially; it is all here in print.

17,280. Deputy-Chairman: I do not think it is necessary to discuss with Dr. Lord the particular provisions in the different countries. We have this evidence that he has very carefully prepared, and this Appendix might perhaps go in as part of our evidence. I understood from Dr. Lord that he may have a further document from New York?—(Dr. Lord): Yes, I have got now a copy (which is just available for us) of the Law on Insanity for the State of New York. The State of New York is particularly interested in this matter and is the one, I think, having regard to the temperamental conditions of the people, their nationality, and so on, with which we are most readily comparable. It is very interesting, and I promised yesterday to send in a digest of this. It amplifies what I said about America.

17,281. If you kindly would, and if we add that to this Appendix, we shall really have the facts before us. Would you excuse me, Dr. Cole, going back to one point mentioned yesterday which I am not quite clear about. You make a good deal in your précis of the necessity of making further provision for paying patients. Is it the view of the Association that Section 207 of the Act, which restricts the number of licensed houses, should be repealed or modified?—(Dr. Cole): As I said yesterday we felt it was a retrograde step to have enacted it in 1890. It was done with a view of stimulating the growth of registered hospitals. It has done nothing of the sort. Registered hospitals, which at that date were 15, are now 13. I regret to say that there has been no public-spirited man come forward to do anything for the needy class of paying patients requiring care. It is left entirely to the local authorities to provide accommodation for them. The Chairman made reference to the Royal Asylums of Scotland which have been established at a very early date, and there was only one private asylum in Scotland. Here in England, as you are aware, the private asylums are the originators, excepting a few old places like Bethlem; but the growth of registered hospitals has not been stimulated by that section; and we think probably it would be better that there should not be a monopoly, that the Board of Control should be authorised to extend them, if necessary. As regards this Royal Commission, what we feel is that it has undoubtedly done harm to some patients by upsetting them, and unsettling them by reading the records, and so on; but, on the other hand, we hope that it has stimulated public interest, and that some philanthropic millionaire, will come forward perhaps to supply some of these clinics, the same as Dr. Maudsley has done.

17,282. Do you think it might be advisable in this country to make the same sort of provision for paying patients as is made in Scotland in some of the asylums, because, I understand, there you can have all kinds of different treatment in several of the asylums?—Yes. I will say this, that when the veto on the fresh licensed houses was established, a section of the Act allowed more than one patient to be in single care—Section 46. The Board of Control have rather read into that section the idea that there should not be more than two patients, and they have hesitated; and only on two or three occasions, I believe, have allowed three patients to be in a house. To my mind it is a mistake. Where a medical man is competent to treat patients, a retired medical superintendent, for instance, it would be a good thing that he should be able to take patients. It comes to this: it is making a licence during the life of the individual, as it were, which expires when he dies. It should not be so much of a business. I think the licensed houses should be allowed to go on as they are, and, if necessary, be extended.

17,283. You think there should be some modification of that section?—I think the wording of Section 46 is all right, if only the Board of Control would read it in a more liberal spirit.

17,284. Earl Russell: The Board of Control have rather strained the statute as it is?—More than one patient means 100 if you like.

17,285. Deputy-Chairman: You are on Section 46?—Yes.

17,286. I was rather on Section 207, which you see restricts new licences?—Quite so. We think that that was a mistake.

17,287. Was it not partly introduced because there was a strong public feeling against the licensed houses?—Yes, that was so, and we do not think the public feeling in any way represents the feeling that existed at that day. The Lunacy Act of the present day has done very much good. There is a good deal to be said for the Lunacy Act as it is, especially with regard to safeguards. I wanted to tell the Commission in thanking you for hearing us so patiently that our President this year happens to be the Superintendent of an Irish asylum, otherwise he would have been on our Committee, but it was impossible for him to attend. What we do press for is that you will do all that you can to ask Parliament to allow local authorities to promote research; and, if possible, to induce some philanthropist to help build the clinics if local authorities do not do so. People will spend money on cancer, on tuberculosis research, and also with regard to sanatoria, but they will not provide any accommodation for mentally disordered patients. It is a most extraordinary thing. So great is the stigma. Since Mr. Holloway built the Holloway asylum in the eighties, not a soul except Dr. Maudsley has done anything for mental disorders, in this respect.

Deputy-Chairman: I think we fully appreciate the views you have put before us, and have so clearly expressed. We are much obliged to you for giving us your evidence.

17,288. Chairman: This morning we have representatives of the National Council for Mental Hygiene who have been good enough to offer us their evidence. Perhaps I should say at once, gentlemen, that members of the Commission have read the précis with which you have furnished us, and in which your views are summarised. If you approve, we propose to take the same course with regard to your précis as we have taken regarding the statements of the British Medical Association, and the Medico-Psychological Society; that is to say, where a responsible body such as the body you represent has been good enough to formulate their views in their own precise language, we think it is valuable to put that on record as it stands, so that we may see the considered opinion of your body in the form in which you wish to present it. Therefore, if you agree, I think we should incorporate in our record of the evidence your *précis as it stands. We have treated, as I say, certain of the important and authoritative bodies in that way, differing from our course with ordinary witnesses from whom we have elicited information, merely using their précis as the basis of our discussion. May I say before we go into any details that most of the topics with which you deal are topics which we have explored very fully with preceding witnesses, and we do not desire to cover the same ground over again? You really come in with your opinion reinforcing views which have already been urged upon us very much on the same lines; and I think if we incorporate your précis in our evidence, we might usefully occupy ourselves this morning in eliciting from you any supplementary matters which you desire to bring before us. If you wish to enlarge upon any of the topics we should welcome that. I propose, first of all, to ask you to tell us a little about the nature of your Council and the scope of its work. You have furnished us with a little print which gives us, I take it, the outlook of your Council, and we recognise, of course, the very important membership of the body. Indeed, I see that one at least of my fellow Commissioners is a member of your Council. The Council is of recent institution, I see?—(Dr. Farquhar Buzzard): Yes, only in the last two or three years.

17,289. It was founded in 1922?—Yes.

17,290. And what is really its distinctive purpose as contrasted with the other bodies already engaged in this class of work?—I think the idea of the Council really originated from the formation of similar bodies in other countries, and the idea of those Councils has always been rather a co-ordination of various Associations and Societies interested in the question of mental hygiene with the object of promoting their efficiency and bringing them together, with special reference to the education of the public in regard to mental matters. It was, of course, a kind of international scheme by which there were conferences between the various Associations in different countries for their mutual benefit and learning what each other are doing.

17,291. There is one aspect of your work which strikes us as important, and that is the development of the academic side of the subject. So far as you can gather, the University education in psychiatry needs a good deal of development, does it not?—I think we hold the opinion pretty generally that the education of the medical profession as a whole is rather deficient in regard to psychiatry.

17,292. Of course, the difficulty with which one is confronted is that the medical curriculum is now so crowded that, as specialisation goes on, the unhappy student may find it very difficult to compress within his curriculum all the specialised subjects which he has to take. I suppose it must be recognised that this work to some extent must be specialised?—Personally, I think that in the long run it would be very much better if the student had not to make too much of a specialty of the study of the early mental disorders. I quite agree that a student has far too many specialties to take up separately, but I think what really happens is that in the general course of his work in the hospital he sees and hears extremely little about early mental conditions.

17,293. I notice you develop that point in your précis, that if the incipient stages of mental disease were treated in clinics in association with hospitals, the student would come to regard mental disease as just one of the ordinary diseases to which human flesh is heir, and would have opportunities of seeing mental disease at least in its incipient stages in a way which he does not at present?—Yes, and more than that of course, he does not realise as a student that a very large proportion of the work he is going to do afterwards is going to deal with the early stages of mental disease.

17,294. Then looking at it in the broadest form you deprecate the dividing line that has been drawn in the past between mental disease and all other diseases?—That is a very strong point with us.

17,295. You desire to obliterate that line as far as can possibly be done?—Yes.

17,296. Of course we have had borne in upon us throughout our deliberations the difficulty that there is a feature of mental disease which differentiates it from every other form of disease—I mean the aberrations of conduct to which it leads, the necessity for restraining liberty. That is a feature special to mental disease which really seems to be the origin of all the difficulties that have arisen in the past with regard to its treatment. Now you do not contemplate, do you, that in those clinics in association with general hospitals you would have cases treated which would require restraint?—Not for any period of time; they could not be kept in clinics of that kind, certainly; but, of course, in all general hospitals there are patients at any time who are affected mentally and have to be restrained to a certain extent.

17,297. Just as a concomitant of their physical ailments?—Yes.

17,298. The moment we get into the region of detention and restraint and compulsion then, of course, we come in contact with the difficulty of reconciling the medical and legal aspects of the case?—Yes.

17,299. One of your suggestions which is novel to us is the suggestion that all nursing homes should be under supervision?—Yes.

17,300. By that do you contemplate that every form of nursing home, all the nursing homes that are conducted in large towns at the present moment, should all be under some form of supervision?—Yes.

17,301. Do you think that view would be welcomed?—I will not say it would generally be welcomed.

17,302. Earl Russell: Not by the nursing homes?—Not altogether by the nursing homes.

17,303. Sir David Drummond: Do you think it is practicable?—I think so. We have mentioned the kind of supervision.

17,304. Chairman: It would involve notification, would it not, and it would involve inspection?—Yes; we refer to that in our memorandum. As regards the question of inspection, it does not necessarily mean a close inspection of patients so much as a medical inspection of the institution.

17,305. What is the idea at the back of your minds in that recommendation—is it this, that you want to obliterate the distinction between places where people are resident for mental treatment and places where people are being treated for ordinary diseases? Is that the idea at the back of your minds, to obliterate the distinction, or is it rather this, that you want to enable a larger number of places to be available for the treatment of mental disease, nursing homes of the ordinary type?—It really falls into line with what we say about the general hospitals, that is to say, where one kind of disease can be treated another can be treated under much the same conditions.

17,306. It is very undesirable you know to create unnecessary machinery. The present civilisation is almost encumbered with machinery of one kind or another, and one is not predisposed favourably to the creation of more machinery and additional forms; because we have heard a good deal about the number of forms which at present attend the treatment of mental disease. You surely would not suggest that the ordinary nursing home in which most of us have spent periods of retirement for one form of operation or another should be subject to inspection and report, do you?—I think we do. I mean that they should be registered, and that they should be open to inspection by some form of central authority.

17,307. Earl Russell: Have you thought of the difficulty of defining a nursing home in legal terms that would enable you to prosecute one that had not registered?—No, I have not.

Chairman: One has to think of these things when you come to make practical recommendations. One would require to set up a code under which, as Earl Russell points out, a nursing home would be a defined institution; then one would require to provide for the inspection of it, notification, and so on, and one would require to put penalties upon those who did not comply with the law. That is introducing a very large new feature into medical treatment which I should doubt very much that your profession would welcome as a whole.

Earl Russell: I rather want to put it to you, if you think it out as a matter of definition, may not a place get almost imperceptibly changed from a nursing home to a hydropathic establishment—how are you going to draw the line?

17,308. Chairman: Legal definitions are always very troublesome things?—I admit that aspect of the thing has not been considered in detail by those who have drawn up the memorandum.

17,309. What one is thinking of is whether any really useful purpose would be served by it; you do not want to embarrass life with formalities unless they serve some useful purpose. I am trying to get at the justification for new machinery. As far as I can see, the justification that is implied is that there should be no distinction between the nursing home where the mental case is treated and the nursing home for ordinary physical disease. Therefore you would assimilate the ordinary nursing homes to that in order to eliminate the distinction?—Partly that. I think most of us would agree that some kind of registration and supervision of nursing homes is rather desirable, I mean the standard of nursing homes; there are good ones, and there are lots of bad ones.

17,310. Earl Russell: Would it not be better achieved by some form of official recognition of them by some medical body than by legislation?—It is rather invidious for a medical body to do that, is it not?

17,311. Chairman: It rather looks as if you were going to encumber the ordinary nursing home with formalities, not because it requires the supervision, but merely because you want to put it upon the same platform as the mental nursing home. Intrinsically the ordinary nursing home will not require this supervision; in fact, it is outside the scope of our inquiry altogether, and we are a little at a loss to see why in your view the ordinary nursing home should be assimilated to the mental nursing home, when the conditions are really different. It would seem to be inventing new machinery in order to obviate any stigma that attaches to the mental home, because of its supervision, in contradistinction to the ordinary nursing home. I do not know whether I have really got the idea at the back of your mind. It struck me at once as a novel suggestion?—On the other hand, it would be difficult to enlarge the liberty with which mental cases are treated in nursing homes. We submit it might be difficult to do it unless all nursing homes came in the same category.

22 May, 1925.]

Dr. E. FARQUHAR BUZZARD, M.D., F.R.C.P.,
Dr. H. CRICHTON MILLER, M.D., and Dr. R. WORTH, O.B.E., M.B.

17,312. Yes, unless we have an extension of the licensed house system. At the present moment there are places where under licence treatment can be given. We have heard some evidence to the effect that there is not sufficient accommodation in these places, and they are not properly distributed throughout the country. If machinery were devised for the provision of nursing homes, certified nursing homes throughout the country, would not that meet your view?—Our difficulty would be the same as regards the patient, that those homes would be marked down as mental homes, whereas there are a number of patients we would like to see treated in their early stages in homes which are not marked in that way.

17,313. Then, of course, you get into that difficulty of the border line, that the unhappy practitioner does not know whether he is breaking the law or not, and you want some machinery devised to enable cases to be treated by the doctor without the fear of an infringement of the law.

17,314. Earl Russell: You could do that by individual sanctions from the Board of Control for a particular patient, that he should be treated in a particular place?—Yes, that does mean notification of the particular patient.

17,315. It does, of course, but the patient need not know of it, need he?—It is difficult to get out of it.

17,316. Chairman: I think one of the drawbacks of your suggestion would be that it would tend to institutionalise (if I may use the word) the nursing home. The attraction to many people at the present moment of the nursing home is this, that it is a place where you are not in an institution at all; you have merely gone there for treatment because it is more convenient than to be treated at your own house, and you are not "Case number so-and-so" reported on such-and-such a form. You are merely having treatment from your own doctor in his own home. Would it be desirable to convert a nursing home into an institution with all that that means, which is repugnant to many people, you know?—We rather want to get facilities for a patient suffering from a mental disorder to have what the other patients have, that is to say, the feeling that he is going to a nursing home and not necessarily to a mental institution.

17,317. Earl Russell: May I put it the other way round: What is it that you find would be lacking if you did not register nursing homes—what would your difficulty be if they were not registered?—We rather took it that there would be certain difficulty from authorities in the way of our treating such cases in nursing homes unless they were registered.

17,318. Chairman: Because they might be cases which were certifiable?—Quite.

17,319. And therefore there might be an infringement of the law in treating the cases in such homes?—Yes.

17,320. That is a problem which confronts the medical profession at the moment, that you are never quite sure whether you are or are not within the law?—That is so.

17,321. But I am not sure that the solution is to be found in extending supervision or registration to all nursing homes, or whether the remedy might not be sought in some other direction.

17,322. Earl Russell: Would it be a solution to give wider discretionary powers to the Board of Control so that they did not feel bound to take action in certain cases?—I would like Dr. Worth to answer that question because he is more conversant with the powers of the Board of Control than I am.

17,323. Chairman: What is your view, Dr. Worth? You see the nature of the problem we are discussing at the moment; have you any view upon it?—(Dr. Worth): Yes; it depends. If a person loses volition I am of opinion that he should certainly be notified. The Board of Control should be made aware of where that person is, whether he be in a nursing home or elsewhere; but as to the voluntary case who goes in voluntarily for treatment, whether he goes into a public institution or a nursing home, I think there is no necessity really for that case to be notified; but if any case requires at any time to be kept under lock and key day or night, that case should, in my opinion, be notified.

17,324. I appreciate that. You say the voluntary patient ought to be able to get treatment just for his mental disease, as any other patient is entitled to get treatment. But then you come across a difficulty there at once which is very present to our minds, and that is this: Who is going to define a voluntary patient? I have always felt the pressure of that problem very acutely. A person may be represented as voluntary, but the very nature of his ailment is such as to affect his volition, or it may affect his volition to some extent. It is doubtful whether in law the volition of a person who is suffering from mental disease can be treated as the full volition of an ordinary citizen, capable of estimating what he is doing and appreciating the situation. Who is to be the judge of whether the person is voluntary or involuntary?—I should say the doctor in charge of the case, whether it is a practitioner taking a case in a home, or a specialist called in to see that case. It appears to me that if any restraint against a man's liberty has to be thought of, that is if he is not an absolute free lance to come and go as he likes, or, if he is in a nursing home and takes objection to anything and says, "I am going to leave this"—if there is any restraint put upon him then I think notification is necessary, if it is for his good and the general public's good that he should be restrained.

17,325. But people do not unfortunately classify themselves with that precision which would be convenient, and you may have a person as to whom it may be doubtful whether he is a voluntary patient or not; he may have a certain glimmer of volition still, but his estimation and appreciation of the surroundings is a very difficult thing. He might have only a trace of volition and be very easily overborne by persuasion or pressure which would be resisted by persons in full possession of their volitional powers?—I think if a patient is fit to follow out instructions, that is, if a patient is asked to stay in bed and stays in bed, if he submits to treatment and does not resist it, whether his volition in other ways may be defective, he can be treated, we will say, in a nursing home.

17,326. We have had some instances of cases where a voluntary patient so called has found himself or herself really overborne by the pressure of the institution and really becoming an involuntary inmate, although professing to be a voluntary one. I can conceive that case, Dr. Worth?—Yes. I think when that stage has come that case should be notified as a case for certification.

17,327. Earl Russell: That is why I suggested you should give a very wide discretion to the Board of Control, because, after all, the thing depends upon the honesty and conscience and capacity of a doctor in the last resort. You have to provide for the exceptional cases where that may not be so?—Yes. Somebody would have to be in authority and to give an opinion.

17,328. Chairman: Of course the whole difficulty of the treatment of mental diseases would disappear if the British public absolutely trusted your profession. That, of course, is a thing which neither we lawyers, nor the doctors, nor any other profession is entitled to have—an absolute discretion. The law will not allow any of us to have that, therefore safeguards are required; but it is true that if you had an absolutely perfect medical profession, animated by the most perfect motives and consideration, there would be no need for Lunacy law at all. We have to assume the worst while hoping for the best?—If you were to take our police duties away, that is the power of detention, it would be a very great advantage, in my opinion, in the treatment of cases of insanity, if they would accept our therapeutic measures.

17,329. But again can you depend entirely upon your profession. Police duties can only be taken away if you have someone else in the position to judge whether the patient requires detention or not. Now we have to rely upon your profession to judge whether the case is one requiring, in its own interests, the protection of what you call police duties. So that again we come back to the medical man at the end of the day who is the key of the situation.

17,330. Earl Russell: You have to tell us whether the patient requires to be restrained or not?—Yes, we would have to tell you certainly, but generally the cases are so evident that I am certain that the mentality of lawyers would be quite sufficient to decide.

17,331. Chairman: Of course, out of the 130,000 certified cases in this country I have no doubt the great bulk are perfectly easily diagnosed—even a layman could diagnose them; but the public anxiety centres much more round the very small number of cases, borderland cases and so on; and all the instances of abuse that have arisen have always arisen round that type of case. The system works well enough on the whole, but every here and there you may have a case arising where something goes wrong. The whole purpose of the law is to prevent these things arising, or to provide the most adequate safeguards against their arising. That is really our task—to consider whether the safeguards are adequate or not?—Take persons in all spheres of life, we cannot all be perfect.

17,332. No, but we can see that you are as perfect as you can be made by the law.—If there are abuses, I think they are bound to occur whatever happens, but in cases of abuse there is sufficient punishment weighed out to be a deterrent to similar abuse.

17,333. But it is not really a question of punishment, it is a question of the perfect system. I have used the analogy more than once of the railway system. A railway system occasionally breaks down; you have an accident, but no one is going to say that the railway system is bad in itself. But when you have an accident you learn from that what new precautions to take, and safeguards are introduced by the Government, all kinds of safeguards with regard to travelling, which are the product of experience. What I think is one of our chief concerns is to see whether, learning from experience in the past, with the assistance of gentlemen like yourselves, we can devise further safeguards to satisfy the public mind that the administration is safeguarded in the public interests as far as possible. That is really our prime concern as you will appreciate. Perhaps we need not explore the nursing home topic further, we have your mind upon that. There is one other subject you touch on in your précis upon which I think you might give us your views, and that is the question of the medical superintendent and his duties at the present day. I know I am touching upon something that is rather controversial, and we have had different views upon it. Has your Council any view as to the delimitation of the duties of medical superintendents?—I do not think the matter has been discussed, but I am a medical superintendent myself, and, of course, one has thought a great deal about the question of the duties of a medical superintendent. I have had personal experience of a medical superintendent, who has had as a colleague a director who managed the institution. Well, they never spoke, they were not on speaking terms. The duties to my mind are so difficult to arrange that there must be one head, and I think that head must be a medical man. If you like to call that man a medical director and make it a special appointment well and good, but I do think that you must have a medical man at the head of an institution like a mental hospital. There are so many details, so many small things about which two heads would come into controversy. In these days I think that a medical superintendent has to have a knowledge of the ordinary administration. He has to have a knowledge of, we will say, some farm work, and so on, but that is his recreation more or less.

17,334. It may be his distraction as well as his recreation—that is the trouble. It depends upon the man, does it not?—Yes, it depends upon the man. There are men who make very good medical superintendents and men who do not make good superintendents, but I think there must be one at the head of these institutions.

17,335. Is that because in the treatment of mental disease the whole regime of the life of the patient is really part of the treatment?—It is so.

17,336. That is a differentia from ordinary medical treatment, is it not?—Yes; occupation enters so largely into the treatment in a large mental hospital, and, of course, occupation is medical treatment.

17,337. Not only that, but I mean the whole outlook of the establishment and the method in which it is run may itself be therapeutic, I suppose?—Yes.

17,338. Even such a matter as the colour of the wall paper may have a therapeutic effect?—Yes, very frequently, some people say.

17,339. That of course is a difference between the treatment of mental disease and the treatment of ordinary disease, that the treatment itself consists in the regulation of the life in an institution which is all directed to conduct?—Yes. Of course in the life in the mental hospital and in dealing with the mind personality counts a tremendous amount. Patients will take to some men where they will not take to others; they will do things for one that they will not do for others, and they are dependent on some people.

17,340. I am afraid it comes to this ultimately that some people can delegate and some people cannot?—I think that is so.

17,341. And one man may be diverted from his proper function as a medical superintendent with the emphasis on the medical, and vice versa?—That is right.

17,342. You suggest what may be a mitigation of that difficulty in two ways—you are anxious to preserve the contact between the patient and the general practitioner?—Yes.

17,343. You do not wish the family doctor to part company with his patient merely because his patient goes into a mental hospital?—No—that is what we advocate.

17,344. And secondly you wish closer association between mental hospitals and teaching institutions and universities and the resort to consultants?—Yes. Of course the work in mental hospitals has advanced enormously within recent years. There are very few hospitals where consultants are not called in. In my own hospital of course we are very fortunate in being so near London, but we have a specialist for everything.

17,345. One is familiar with the arrangements in an ordinary hospital in a town—you have a resident staff, that is to say, of young men who have recently graduated and are resident on the premises, and you have the various wards which are in charge of senior medical men, surgical and medical sides, and you have in addition generally very eminent consultants who are called in in difficult cases—that seems to be the sort of general equipment?—Yes.

17,346. Now you would desire in the case of mental hospitals to have something analogous to that; you would have a resident assistant doctor who is in immediate contact with the cases; then you would have the medical superintendent at the top of that branch of it?—Yes.

17,347. Then you would have the consultant called in, probably a professor of the University, or an eminent alienist called in to assist in the diagnosis of difficult cases?—Yes.

17,348. Sir David Drummond: Are you aware that throughout the country the consultant is almost never called in; the consulting surgeon and consulting physician is there simply in name? There is not one case in a dozen in a hospital where a consultant ever sees the patient?—I am quite aware of that. Of course, in my own hospital, we pay consultants a retaining fee. If that is done it is the duty of the consultant to pay his periodical visits. Now, for instance, the surgeon attached to my own hospital attends once or twice a week in the mornings to see any new cases or any case that is required, irrespective of whether he has been sent for. The dentist and the optician attend on certain days of the week.

17,349. Then you propose that the consultant should be a paid officer?—I am afraid he must be, because these are rate-aided institutions, and we cannot expect a man to do the work voluntarily.

17,350. Chairman: I think what Sir David has in mind are the ornamental names that one sees not infrequently in association with hospitals, which are really there because of the consultants' prestige or because they have been actually in charge of the wards in the past, and they keep that up, and it is thought pleasant to continue their association with the institution. That is not the kind of person you have in mind?—No.

17,351. Sir David Drummond: You would have to put them on a different footing altogether?—Yes.

17,352. Mr. Micklem: Would it be possible to arrange this in an ordinary asylum in the country which is frequently a very considerable distance from any hospital or any university?—My own personal experience is that the young surgeon not attached to a hospital is only too pleased to come out and see patients wherever they be, the young keen man. We cannot expect the fully-fledged senior surgeon to a hospital to come on to our staff, but it is the junior men we want who really come and see things which they have not seen before, many of them.

17,353. You spoke of collaboration between the patient's own medical attendant and the hospital, but would that be possible in the large majority of cases, the pauper cases?—No, I do not think so, because first of all the mental hospitals are generally removed some considerable distance away from where that practitioner lives, and, secondly, of course he is a busy man; and, thirdly, I suppose really in many instances he does not take much further interest in the case. He has certified a certain case, but except if he in a village he may know nothing of a case before that; probably he has never met the man before.

17,354. Earl Russell: He is not really what we mean by "the usual medical attendant"?—No, he is not, and of course in rate-aided institutions there are very few of that type.

17,355. Chairman: Of course, Mr. Micklem's point applies generally to the suggestion that you are bringing out. You suggest it is desirable to maintain and continue the contact between the patient's own doctor after the patient has been received into an institution, but if you are removing the patient to an institution fifty or sixty miles away from his home you can hardly expect a busy general practitioner to follow it up—it is not possible?—No.

17,356. Mr. Micklem: And the ordinary rate-aided case has no regular medical attendant?—I think that is so—the majority of them.

17,357. Sir David Drummond: What is the object of continuing the association of the doctor with the patient? He would not be allowed to have any say in the treatment of the patient?—No. I think it was more or less a safeguard. The original intention was that the private practitioner should see that that man was not detained unnecessarily.

17,358. That would depend entirely upon the superintendent?—I think it was an extra safeguard.

17,359. Chairman: Another critic?—Another critic, yes,

17,360. Earl Russell: In a case where the private practitioner was the person employed by the petitioner who wanted to keep the patient in, it would hardly be an added safeguard, would it?—No, it would not, but we send a notification; if a patient has a practitioner we send a notification to say that he is there and he can come and see him when he likes; but I must say it has been taken very little advantage of.

Earl Russell: I think it is desirable that if he wishes to see his patient he should be allowed to see him freely; that is a different thing.

17,361. Chairman: Indeed there is machinery existing for a visit by an outside doctor to patients in an institution, and that is eminently desirable, obviously?—Yes.

17,362. But I think it would be very difficult to get the ordinary panel doctor to make a round of institutions, possibly 50 or 100 miles away in order to see his patients. As Sir David brings out, what would he do when he got there? He might look at the patient and say "I think perhaps he might not be a fit subject for detention," and then he sees the medical superintendent who persuades him that he is, and then he goes away home again.

Earl Russell: And there are cases where he would not know the private family history as a private practitioner would.

17,363. Chairman: I appreciate that. You wish to preserve as many points of contact between the patient in the institution and the outside world, as possible. That of course is a very desirable thing, to make him feel that he is not segregated from the rest of the world—that is the root idea?—Yes.

17,364. Now I am much impressed, and I am sure the rest of the Commission are also, with some very interesting statistics you give showing the extent to which incipient mental disease exists in this country as exemplified in criminal statistics, statistics of suicide, and so on. These are very instructive figures for which we are much indebted to you. These are adduced, I take it, for the purpose of showing the desirability of getting at these cases at an early stage?—Yes.

17,365. The trouble seems to be now that a person must, first of all, have the disease in a pronounced and established condition before he can get the benefit of treatment?—Yes.

17,366. Now you want in common with the general development of medical science to go in for prevention rather than cure?—Yes.

17,367. You wish to get at the case at its earliest stage?—Yes.

17,368. And the fact that these cases, through the aberrations of their conduct, come in contact with the criminal law in various ways is used by you to illustrate the fact that these people are abnormal persons, who ought to have been in medical hands before they reached the hands of the law?—Yes, that is our point.

17,369. Now developing that, the practical suggestion you have to make, which is in line with the other suggestions we have received, is that facilities should be provided for the early treatment of mental disease?—Yes.

17,370. People should be encouraged when they feel mentally unstable to go to a clinic or an out-patient department, just as they do when they have any other form of ailment?—Yes.

17,371. And receive advice and medicine possibly, and in that way escape the consequences which are illustrated by your statistics?—Yes.

17,372. Now in that matter I gather that your Council is in favour of the dissociation of the institutions for early treatment from the mental hospital, on the one hand, and the general hospital on the other. I am not speaking merely of the out-patient clinics in association with general hospitals, but the provision of places where mental disease could be treated short of certification?—Yes,

17,373. Then you contemplate really the establishment of intermediate institutions?—That is rather a difficulty, because in my own county, which is Middlesex, both the mental hospitals are out of the county, and it is proposed to build a third, also out of the county. You want, it seems to me, to attack these cases at their own homes, and to give them facilities for attending a hospital somewhere in their own neighbourhood; and the Committee of the County Council with whom I have dealings are very concerned as to what is best to be done. At Wandsworth we are thinking of building an acute hospital for voluntary boarders, separate entirely from the institution, a very up-to-date place where students and so on can be taught; but we cannot expect the ordinary out-patient to come right from, we will say, Staines to Wandsworth for consultation, and it would seem that to attract that person you would want some local clinic with a few beds to deal with such cases.

17,374. Now may we envisage the situation practically and at large. You have the case of incipient mental disease, let us say, a person at home developing abnormal symptoms. Some mischief is at work; the doctor appreciates there is something wrong; it is not a certifiable case at all. That case, I take it, would be advised by you to go to the general hospital, and would receive there advice and treatment in an out-patient clinic, in the first instance?—Yes.

17,375. The doctor in attendance there would ordinarily be the resident doctor, with a visiting doctor present also, no doubt, and might diagnose that the case was on the road to become a serious one?—Yes.

17,376. And that it was desirable that the case should leave the home surroundings at once?—Yes.

17,377. That might be the result of the diagnosis?—Yes.

17,378. Then would you contemplate that case becoming an in-patient in the general hospital, or being relegated to some institution on the lines, for example, of the special tuberculosis departments which we have in most of our cities? You see, you do not want him to go to the mental hospital right away; he is not fit for that stage, and may never reach that stage if you are able to arrest the progress of the disease. Where would you send that case to?—I have had practical experience in this matter.

17,379. That is the very thing we want to get your help upon?—At Ealing attached to the hospital I have an out-patient department; it is rather more than a cottage hospital. Patients come there for consultation. If I had 20 beds attached there I could do quite a lot of good work, but it would have to be a separate building, in my opinion.

17,380. Why is that—is that because the conduct of the patients may be disturbing to the others?—Yes, and I think that the idea of mental patients being admitted into that hospital would rather tend to upset the other patients.

17,381. Do you contemplate that the mental hospital, which is at the end of the system, so to speak, is really to contain only those cases which are established cases of lunacy, cases as to which there is comparatively little hope from the treatment?—No, just the contrary; I cannot help but say that the mental hospital is for a mental case, and where there is any prolonged treatment, then I think that case should go to the mental hospital.

17,382. Right away?—Straight away.

17,383. Some view has been put before us to this effect that the mental hospital is really the last resort—I am not sure that that is a sound view?—That would be an absolutely fatal thing to do, because people would be under the impression that that was the last resort, and that they were finished.

17,384. It would be as depressing as the title given to some places—"Hospital for Incurables," for instance, which has always struck me as a most depressing name to put above the door of any institution?—Of course one must recognise that hospitals themselves have a high percentage of cures, and that cases are bad before they come to them.

17,385. Consider the classification of the cases for the different forms of treatment. I can envisage the out-patient department where the patient visits and gets advice; and I can envisage a place where patients are temporarily resident, they become in-patients for observation and treatment. Then I can envisage a mental hospital which is the normal place for the treatment of mental disease in all its stages, and curable cases as well as incurable cases. But the difficulty is to get your cases sorted out so that each would be relegated to its appropriate department. At each stage you will have to have a judgment passed upon the case?—Yes; I do not anticipate a great deal of difficulty in that. If you have a small ward attached to a hospital, if the case is going to be there for some time—that is a week or two, it must be moved on to a mental hospital. If it is, as so frequently happens, a mother at the change of life who is worried at home with lots of little children and lots of troubles at home, a little rest of a week or two is all that that woman requires, a little explanation of her symptoms puts her right.

17,386. Earl Russell: Rest her body and ease her mind?—Yes, but you just want to take that case out of its environment—

17,387. Chairman: And restore its balance?—Restore its balance.

17,388. But some of the cases, of course, are from their inception violent cases; I mean you may have an acute case of mania supervening with more or less suddenness. That case would not be appropriate for the out-patient department, but would go straight to the mental hospital?—Yes, under the provisional order.

17,389. Sir David Drummond: A case might recover in a fortnight—do you mean that should go to a mental hospital?—I think the mental hospital is the place for it.

Sir David Drummond: We have heard different views on that point.

17,390. Chairman: It has been suggested that in an acute case requiring detention at once, but nevertheless a highly recoverable case, as many of the acute cases are, it is unfortunate that the patient should have to enter the portals of a mental hospital as a certified case and for ever afterwards be known as having been certified?—We do not contemplate certification; we contemplate provisional detention for three or four days in a mental hospital.

17,391. They would not be voluntary cases, and therefore they are cases with regard to which the law would require some form of safeguard, because detention is going to be applied to them?—We suggest that that period of three days should be extended to 28 days by a justice, and if the case recovered in that time so much the better, or if the case at the end of 28 days had enough volition to decide for himself whether he would stay or not—

17,392. But you do not contemplate that class of case going to an intermediate institution short of a mental hospital?—You want a complete little mental hospital to deal with it; you want the equipment and the staff and everything.

17,393. Take the acute case, possibly recoverable, possibly not—your view is that that case should at once go to the mental hospital but under some form of provisional restraint, which would enable the case to recover short of full certification?—Yes.

17,394. Take the other case, the true incipient case, or the mild case; that class of case you contemplate should go to your outdoor clinics in association with the general hospital, that there should be a department of the general hospital dealing with these cases, giving advice and assistance, and so on, and provisionally diagnosing them. If the case were found to be one where it was necessary to remove the patient from the home environment you would wish in the general hospital, or in association with a general hospital, to have means of treating that case?—Yes.

17,395. This is not an emergency case, not a violent case, and possibly not a certifiable case?—Yes.

17,396. Which can be treated really more on medical lines without any legal flavour about it at all?—Yes.

17,397. Now would that place for in-patient treatment be a ward of the general hospital, or would it have to be a separate institution?—I should say it would have to be separate from the hospital proper.

17,398. Why is that—because there again you get the differentiation which one is rather anxious to obliterate?—First of all, I think, you would have to have some special nursing to look after that kind of case.

17,399. But you have in each ward of a hospital special nurses; you have the surgical nurses on one side and medical nurses on the other; they move about no doubt between the departments, but you have special surgical nurses?—Yes. Of course this is a very big question. I do not think you can in the ordinary way treat a mental case in a general hospital ward. There are very few that you can treat in a general hospital ward, the rather depressing surroundings of many hospitals are not conducive to the happiness of a mental case. In my opinion you would have to build a bright little sort of annexe to your hospital where these cases could be treated.

17,400. Sir David Drummond: Much brighter than the average mental hospital?—(Dr. Farquhar Buzzard): I am afraid I should not associate myself with that view. I think these cases could be treated in a ward of a general hospital.

17,401. Mr. Micklem: Has not the experiment been tried in Scotland with great success?—In special wards. I think if we start the special building we shall be doing exactly what we do not want to do, that is, emphasise the difference.

Earl Russell: It seems contrary to the basic principle of your Society.

17,402. Chairman: The obliteration of the distinction?—Yes. Dr. Miller has himself personal experience of treating the kind of case we are talking about in his own institution.

17,403. Chairman: Perhaps Dr. Miller might take up the story and let us have his views?—(Dr. Miller): I think it would clarify our ideas a little bit if we focussed them on one single case. When we talk of early mental derangement we are apt to be talking of cases, a group of cases that may require completely and utterly different treatment, and we really get no where. I think that if we focus our attention for a moment on the potential suicide which we have referred to, and you have seen the figures about it in our evidence, you will be able to realise the situation that exists at present. As far as the potential suicide goes he may need just the same sort of treatment Dr. Farquhar Buzzard has described attached to an ordinary hospital. He may need psycho-therapeutic treatment which may in some cases save him; but the fact that really matters is that in many if not most cases he needs a change of environment. I use that word on purpose to avoid saying either hospital, or mental hospital, or anything else—change of environment. The moment the change of environment is undertaken, instantly the doctor who has been treating him assumes very grave legal responsibility, and it is on that that the whole situation really turns, at least in regard to the potential suicide. It is that, I think, which reveals the anomalous position of the Board of Control, the statutory position of the Board of Control at the present time. You see Dr. Farquhar Buzzard may save a man from committing suicide by giving him suitable medical remedies at St. Thomas's out-patient department, very likely.

There may be others that having obviously announced their intention of committing suicide must necessarily be protected from themselves by being handed over to Dr. Worth. On the other hand there are a large number who do not give us any obvious indications of their intentions of that kind, and the physician who sees them may have the profoundest doubts as to their intentions, but he knows if he takes them into a nursing home, whether that nursing home be registered or unregistered matters not at all, he is instantly assuming a tremendous responsibility. He is playing a game in which his success counts for nothing—his failure counts for everything. If he cures his patient, nobody hears about it and he gets no kudos or anything like that. If the patient happens to commit suicide while he is under his care he is proved to be wrong, and the Board of Control then proceeds to apply legal criteria to a matter of opinion. It is all very well to say that if the doctor has acted in good faith he is immune. That is not so manifestly. The doctor if he commits a sufficient series of blunders pays for it obviously, he is prosecuted. In other words, as far as I know, not being a lawyer, it is always the endeavour of the Legislature to avoid applying legal and objective criteria to matters of opinion, and the position of the unfortunate doctor with regard to the Board of Control is that his opinion may ultimately, in this particular case I am discussing, be subjected to legal criteria post facto. Now I maintain that as long as that situation exists there is no good in our thinking of really encouraging any sort of institution such as Dr. Worth has been referring to, the nice little special ward attached to the hospital, and so on, because the doctor is always going to bear a perfectly unfair burden of responsibility in connection with any case that he may feel is suicidal. Now it is a very very serious thing, and I am sure that there can be no real progress in that department until what Lord Russell referred to, wider discretionary powers, have been granted to the Board of Control; until the Board of Control has emerged from the present state in which, to the horror of the medical profession, it was found that non-technical opinion could condemn a member of the Board for holding a certain opinion. We have got to get a little beyond that, to a point at which the Board of Control has statutory consultative powers, and then I think something will move. But otherwise I do not see that with regard to any early case of mental disorder requiring environmental, institutional nursing-home treatment, short of actual certification, there is going to be real progress in the treatment of that case. If I do see a case such as that, about which I have some slight doubts in my consulting room, I am frequently faced with the alternatives. I certainly do not want to take that man into my nursing home; I would like him to go into somebody else's nursing home.

17,404. Earl Russell: You mean the doctor now has to stake his career practically upon his treatment being right?—Certainly.

17,405. Of course, even a coroner is not quite non-technical; it is better than a mere Law Court in a sense?—Yes.

17,406. Chairman: Of course, has not every professional man to run risks of that sort? Take even an engineer. He perils his reputation on the stability of the bridge which he designs. If the Forth Bridge collapses, he may not be prosecuted, but at the same time his career is ruined, because he has pledged himself to an opinion and he thereby proffers his opinion as something upon which the public may rely. Every professional man has in a sense to warrant his opinion. That is the privilege of a profession, if I may say so, as distinguished from a trade; that we do take responsibilities in our profession. One may, as a lawyer, give advice which may mean the loss possibly of millions to one's clients or the gain of millions to one's clients. Similarly, the doctor in matters of health, which are perhaps even more cogent than legal matters but still are comparable in that respect, pledges his opinion for what it is worth. Is not that an incident of all professional men?—No. A surgeon advises an operation wrongly, the post facto proves his opinion was incorrect, and he loses a certain amount of prestige and a certain amount of prosperity, but he is not put in the dock.

17,406A. Then it is the criminal factor in the situation that you are apprehensive of?—Yes. A man who makes a mistake of opinion in connection with this particular type of case; and I repeat again when there are 5,500 suicides (successful or unsuccessful) per annum, it is a case worth discussing.

17,407. Certainly?—The man who handles that case and is proved post facto to have made an error of judgment is prosecuted, roughly speaking, approximately—not every time.

17,408. Sir David Drummond: As a matter of fact, does that occur—I am not familiar with these prosecutions you are referring to?—Yes, there are prosecutions on record.

17,409. Earl Russell: Surely much fewer than the mistakes which have been made?—Yes, fortunately.

17,410. Chairman: What kind of prosecutions are you contemplating? I can conceive a prosecution for giving an opinion which had been given recklessly. The Lunacy Act is full of penal provisions, but I am not sure that I have in mind the particular one you are contemplating. Supposing a doctor has a patient: somebody comes to your consulting room, and you have doubts as to whether it is a suicidal case or not. You say: "I think this is a case where I may risk it," and the patient leaves your consulting room and goes and throws himself in front of the first express train. You would not be subject to prosecution?—No.

17,411. You may not even have made an error of judgment. The jury might find that you had come to a perfectly sound opinion, but in point of fact the event disproves it. But what are you contemplating as the risk now?—Because if I make up my mind that that is a man who must at once be given rest and put in a nursing home—

17,412. An uncertified patient is what we are thinking of?—Exactly, the uncertified patient is harboured. Even supposing I send him to an ordinary nursing home where I know the matron, she after all depends upon my judgment, and if a man commits suicide in her nursing home, she is prosecuted, and of course I am brought into it.

17,413. Earl Russell: So that to play for safety you would certify them fully?—Yes, that is exactly my point.

17,414. Chairman: May not we link up what you are telling us with what Dr. Worth and what Dr. Buzzard have been saying? Would it not be to you considerable consolation if you were able to say "I am not quite sure about this case; I should like to have it under protective observation for a period, so that I may visit the case and make up my mind on better data"? Or if there were a place to which you could recommend that patient to go, and where under proper safeguards reasonable precaution could be taken, would not that largely meet your case? Then there comes in Dr. Worth's suggestion, that there might be, in association with hospitals, wards to which you could send such a patient where without certification—(the case might not be ready for certification)—observation might be secured, and the case might possibly recover. Or it might become a pronounced case, in which event you would certify and the patient would go to the mental hospital for the better and more prolonged treatment required?—Entirely, provided somebody else takes the responsibility. We rather contemplate that this ward of a general hospital would be a place which would be protected legally; it would be an institution which would be under some statutory warrant so that there could be no prosecution if there were a general observance of the law. The medical superintendent at the present moment, as you know, is not prosecuted, although he has cases as to which there is a doubt whether they are legally detained or not.

17,415. Earl Russell: And he has cases of people he lets out on trial—he has to take that risk?—Yes.

17,416. Chairman: But you must have a large experience of the class of case that would not go to a general hospital at all. Let us take the ordinary professional classes, and people who have reasonable means to have themselves treated; at the moment, that class of case in your hands, as to which you are apprehensive, must either be sent home with the risks attendant upon that, or sent to the nursing home with the possible risk that you may be detaining a person without legal warrant. I think there we may be able to meet your view by some provision for that class of case. It is an obvious case that must be met in some way or other, and if certain legal protection were given by way of provisional protection for nursing homes where such incipient cases were treated, (private cases yours would be, and Dr. Worth's would be the rate-aided cases probably) that would meet your difficulty, would it not?—Entirely.

17,417. It is along those lines I think that progress must be made. It is perfectly obvious that in a great many cases the best thing to do is to get the case out of its environment. As you say in your précis, the presence of a case in a home may permeate the whole atmosphere of the home and produce other cases. You want, therefore, in the interests of the patient and the patient's family, to get the patient away into a new environment, and get him to take a new outlook on life again, and to have the necessary treatment and rest. If you could have any institution which was, so to speak, a half-way place, a place for observation and treatment under precautions but short of certification, that would meet your view, would it not?—Yes, provided that the combination of restraint and ostensible freedom could be achieved, which is always the difficulty. That is to say, that if the patient knows beforehand that there is the possibility of restraint within that place, he is probably not going to go to it. At the same time you want the possibility of restraint in case of need, and you also want to feel that you are not landing yourself with grave responsibilities.—(Dr. Buzzard): I think behind that, what we all want to aim at is not to stamp the patient. Would not Dr. Miller for example, finding such a case in his consulting room, give a certificate regarding that case which would not be an ordinary medical certificate of insanity at all, but would be a certificate to this effect: "You have examined A. B., and you are of opinion that the case is one which should be under observation for a period in a nursing home"—or it might be a certified nursing home, a licensed nursing home, for a period which might be a fixed period of a fortnight or a month, and which would give the warrant to that institution to handle the case and if necessary to detain it. It seems to me that you must have a certain sanction behind you, because otherwise you are very helpless in dealing with the case.—(Dr. Miller): The Maudsley Hospital is really the only example we have. The Maudsley Hospital is more or less, I take it, run ultra vires, I mean very excellently, and very admirably and very desirably, but it is I suppose a legal anomaly to a certain extent at the present moment.

17,418. Earl Russell: If you saw our evidence from Scotland, it shows a good deal of restraint is exercised which you could not have justified in a court of law?—I know something about that.

Chairman: It was once said by an eminent judge that the best trustee was the trustee who knew when to make a judicious breach of trust, but you do not want an important profession like yours to be in the unhappy position of feeling that the law is not in sympathy with their aims.

17,419. Earl Russell: The doctor should not have to think of the law at all?—Surely that can only be done by our knowing that we have at our back a consultative statutory body.

17,420. Chairman: Yes. Then your solution is to be found along the lines of giving the Board of Control more executive power. You contemplate the reference of such a case as you have in mind to the Board of Control for power to deal with it, so to speak?—Yes, and I should like to say that already, without any change in the law, there is a very great change in the Board of Control—I expect Dr. Worth will support me there—in the last eight years. I have been at this work long enough to remember the day when I asked them a particular point, who was to certify a patient, and I was told laconically that “The Board of Control exists to see that the law is not broken,” and that was all. Those days are past, and I am sure we are all very grateful they are. At the same time, one recognises that their power of advising is necessarily very limited. They are very careful and kind nowadays but they cannot go beyond that.

Chairman: Of course you must remember that every Government Department is in that difficulty. We are all familiar with the fact that a Department, on being applied to, says “We cannot give an authoritative exposition of the law, but we think so and so.” No minister can declare the law; nobody but a Court of Law can declare the law.

17,421. Sir David Drummond: How is enlarging the powers of the Board of Control going to assist the profession of medicine?—By enabling a doctor to treat a case with a feeling that he has no legal responsibility.

17,422. How can you imagine the Board of Control having the power to do that? I do not quite follow you.—Well, they do it in point of fact now largely in certain cases. One of your witnesses some time ago said he thought the solution of the problem lay in certifying the doctor and not the patient, which I thought a happy expression, and I think that that in practice is what the Board of Control does to a certain extent. There are certain doctors who they think are more or less reliable, like for instance, Dr. Mapother at Maudsley, and Dr. Ross, and so on, and they are going to let them have rope; but in other cases, if disasters happen, especially with people new to the work, they have simply to come down on them and do prosecute from time to time.

Sir David Drummond: I cannot yet see how your proposed enlargement of the powers of the Board of Control is going to help.

Earl Russell: Because as it stands now, the Board of Control have no discretion as to whether they should take up or should not take up a breach of the law under Section 315.

Sir David Drummond: They exercise a discretion.

Earl Russell: But they exercise it without any right to do so. If you gave them the power only to prosecute in suitable cases—

Chairman: They need not and do not prosecute in every case; it is not an automatic prosecution.

Earl Russell: I can quite understand if you were a member of the Board of Control you would feel, after all, “The statute says we are to do so and so, and it is not for us to say we will not.”

Chairman: But as every prosecution must proceed, as we shall hear this afternoon from Sir Archibald Bodkin, upon an order by the Commissioners, the Commissioners need not make that order in a particular case. They have a discretion to direct or not to direct a prosecution, because every case of a breach of the law is not prosecuted.

17,423. Sir David Drummond: Is it only to that extent?—No. I mean actual consultative power. If you have a doubtful case, state the case, or possibly even ask a Commissioner to see him.

Earl Russell: Get leave to treat in a particular way?—Yes, and say: “Now my evidence is very slender; I am anxious about this case. I feel if he were certified and put under control, it would be very undesirable from a purely therapeutic point of view,” which it often is. “What do you think?”

17,424. Sir David Drummond: You do not mean to say that the Board of Control are going to assist doctors in outlying districts in that way?—I should have thought it was possible. I mean it is done already in an informal way. I have had cases in which they have been very helpful, but it is informal.

17,425. Chairman: I think your particular difficulty, Dr. Crichton Miller, is just this, that in your ordinary practice you come across cases as to which you have doubt and anxiety, and if you take that case into a nursing home, and the symptoms develop, you are in a dilemma under the existing state of the law. You say this case medically requires detention and restraint in its own interests. On the other hand, it would be unfortunate if the case had to be certified; it is a recoverable case, and possibly a fortnight's treatment here with a reasonable measure of care and restraint may result in a complete cure. Why should that person be removed to a mental hospital and certified, because after all it may be really an episode in the patient's life? That is your problem?—Yes.

17,426. And you want to have the scope for the medical treatment which you feel is in the interest of your patient, unhampered by the fear of legal risks?—It is enough for me to feel that my misjudgment may result in losing a patient, but to feel that I may also be put in the dock is a risk that I do not feel prepared to undertake.

17,427. Mr. Micklem: Do you want in a case like that every time to consult with the Board of Control, let them see the patient, and so on, because it would mean putting an enormous amount of work, would it not, on them?—The Chairman has referred to these special wards such as Dr. Worth mentioned as being protected and safeguarded, and, whatever that means, would satisfy me.

17,428. You would let them get into a clinic or a certified nursing home?—A certified nursing home, yes, I have no doubt that would answer the purpose.

17,429. Chairman: You are getting near the licenced house, are you not, but you want something that is short of that?—(Dr. Farquhar Buzzard): Any nursing home.

17,430. Then, again, that brings us back to your original suggestion, that all nursing homes should be registered, and that you would find in nursing homes a population of persons, some mentally affected and some physically affected?—Yes, otherwise the certified nursing home is going to stamp the patient exactly the same as certification. It does not make any difference.

17,431. Well, gentlemen, I have put to you the points which have struck me as of special interest in your précis; if we have not covered any point, please do not part from us without letting us have your view on it?—I should like to thank you for the way in which you have listened to us. I think we have put down everything we want to lay before you. We have not laid much emphasis on the question of the financial side of providing early treatment—I do not know whether that comes within your purview.

17,432. We will have to consider that, but I think that is more an administrative question about which we will hear from other quarters?—I meant the financial side of providing early treatment for poor patients at the general hospitals, and so on; it is a big question.

17,433. What we wish or you may wish is one thing; what we can pay for is another thing?—Quite. We do feel so strongly about the treatment of early cases.

(The Witnesses withdrew.)

The Right Reverend the LORD BISHOP OF CHELMSFORD (accompanied by the Rev. W. E. C. BARNES, M.A.); called, and examined.

17,434. Chairman: We are now to have evidence relating to a topic which we have not hitherto discussed—the functions of the chaplains in our mental hospitals and institutions for the treatment of the insane. My Lord Bishop, I understand that you are good enough to come this morning on behalf of the Bishops generally?—Yes.

17,435. And to represent their views to us upon the relation of the chaplain to the Lunacy law?—Yes.

17,436. You draw attention at the outset of your précis to the fact that the very first of the officials of a mental hospital who is mentioned in Section 276 of the Act is the chaplain?—Yes.

17,437. He is to be appointed even in advance, I notice, of the medical officer and superintendent, and therefore he has been put in the position, by the Statute at least, of prime importance?—Yes.

17,438. I think you have some views to offer us on behalf of the Bishops as to the place of the chaplain in the mental hospital, and we should be very glad if you would favour us with any suggestions which you may wish to make?—Thank you very much. As you have just reminded us, the chaplain is appointed first in the Statute of 1890. He is appointed, of course, by the visiting committee, which has power to dismiss him. He must be licensed by a Bishop, and the Bishop has power to revoke that licence. In actual working, although appointed by the committee, his position of influence appears to be very largely dependent at present on the good will or otherwise of the medical superintendent. There have been difficulties, of course all corporate work involves difficulties; but the little Committee of Bishops, in whose name and on behalf of whom I am here to-day through your kindness, would like to call your attention to the position and status of the chaplain, and to express a hope that in days to come the status of the chaplain should be recognised a little more clearly. Sometimes, to put it roughly, he does not quite know where he is, and sometimes at least his work appears to be made rather difficult owing to the fact that his status is not very clearly defined in relation to other people. Then we have been in consultation with a good many of the chaplains, and I think we all of us feel both for the chaplain's sake and for the institution's sake generally that the chaplain should be held responsible for the spiritual welfare of the staff, as well as for the spiritual welfare of the patients. It gives him variety of work, and therefore improves his work; it brings him into touch with the staff in a friendly and pastoral way, and therefore helps him with the patients.

17,439. I notice, my Lord Bishop, at the very outset the contemplation is that the chaplain must manifestly be a chaplain of the Church of England, because he is defined as a person who is in priest's orders, and shall be licensed by the Bishop of the Diocese. He is the official chaplain of the institution to be appointed by the visiting committee, but I suppose we must take it that the population of mental hospitals is not entirely composed of members of the Church of England?—Quite.

17,440. That other members of other denominations will find their way there also?—Yes, and in fact I think the visiting committee not only may, but actually does, appoint other ministers.

Chairman: You may rest assured that we have had that fully expounded before us, and that it has had our most sympathetic consideration. I can only thank you gentlemen for your evidence this morning, which has been most helpful and interesting.

17,441. One is struck with this, that the statutory provision is that the chaplain shall be a Church of England chaplain?—Yes.

17,442. It is quite true that provision is made for a minister of any other religious persuasion (subsection 2), but the official chaplain of the institution is a chaplain of the Church of England—that is the contemplation, I think?—Yes.

17,443. But ministers of other denominations may also attend and, as you say, such arrangements are made. Have you any idea as to the extent to which the asylum population belongs to the Church of England?—I have not, generally speaking, but I have in front of me the figures in connection with Claybury Asylum, which is one of the London County Council asylums, and happens to be in my own diocese. I think at the last census there were 2,700 inhabitants at the asylum, which I presume included officers, and the figures I have are that 80 per cent. of those are registered as Church of England patients; that 9 per cent. of them are registered as Nonconformist patients, and 11 per cent. of them are registered as Roman Catholic patients.

17,444. I wonder whether in compiling these figures the 80 per cent. said to be Church of England have been taken as they are sometimes in the Army, that is, that every person who does not belong to any special denomination is said to be Church of England?—I am afraid that is so.

17,445. We are all supposed by law to be members of the Church of England?—The Church of England is the last refuge of the destitute, and it is very proud to be so.

17,446. But the 80 per cent. are not necessarily members of the Church?—No, it is a very loose adherence, but being nothing else, they call themselves members of the Church of England, and we look after them; we bury them, amongst other things.

17,447. But you also desire to minister to them?—Quite; we much prefer to minister to them, but looking at the work, it does mean that a very large proportion of the work is naturally ours.

17,448. Also may one not say this, that it is not distinctively denominational work that you are concerned with in the asylums; it is really bringing relief to the suffering?—Quite.

17,449. I should imagine that the work of a chaplain is not distinctively denominational work; it is rather the work of helping and relieving those under his charge, irrespective of their sect or creed?—I think that is absolutely true. I have never been an asylum chaplain, but I have been a Poor Law chaplain for a considerable time, and that certainly was my purpose. I did not look at the character of the ticket always before I attempted to minister.

17,450. No, but it is of course desirable that the chaplain who has important duties to perform should have a position which will attract the best class of man. The labourer is worthy of his hire, and I notice that you draw attention to the fact that the present tenure of office and the emoluments of the office are not satisfactory to you?—In some cases certainly that is so, and the whole tendency seems to be in these days when we are all aiming at economy, instead of appointing a whole-time resident chaplain, to appoint a part-time and frequently non-resident chaplain; appointed only for a limited period of time, and so non-pensionable. There are I believe some cases where a house has actually been built for a chaplain when the institution was brought into existence, but the chaplain has been deprived of it, and it has been used for others.

The Right Reverend the LORD BISHOP OF CHELMSFORD.

17,451. Would you regard one of the large London County Council institutions as constituting in itself a sufficient parish for a chaplain?—I should certainly say that the Claybury Asylum with 2,700 people, most of them sick in some shape or form mentally or physically, is a very large cure indeed for one man; and if it be true that 80 per cent. of those 2,700 are patients for whom he is especially responsible, it seems essential that he should be a full-time officer. Indeed the evidence of my own little Committee had seemed to suggest that in all cases where the patients number 1,000, the chaplain should be a whole-time officer.

17,452. Of course his sphere of work differs from that of the ordinary parochial clergyman; his cure is concentrated in one place, and many of the activities of an ordinary parish would naturally be absent in this particular type of cure?—I think that is absolutely true. He saves a good deal in shoe leather compared with the parish priest, but as far as my experience of dealing with sick folk, whether mental or otherwise, goes, they take a lot of time. You must be very patient with them, and the small experience that I personally have of ministering to those who are mentally diseased suggests an enormous amount of patience, and consequently an enormous amount of time.

17,453. And a large outflow of sympathy?—A very large amount of sympathy, and you cannot show sympathy in a hurry, not as a rule. If a patient feels that he is simply a patient, that you deal with him and pass on to the next as quickly as you can, your chance of helping him becomes increasingly smaller.

17,454. You have been good enough to tell us that you have yourself done some work among the mentally afflicted. Have you found your ministrations appreciated by them?—Very much indeed.

17,455. Do you find that they will confide their troubles to you?—Yes. Of course one always has the kind of person who explains to you that he is perfectly sane and ought not to be there. But quite apart from that kind of explanation of trouble, I have had a certain amount to do with curable cases that have been cured, and have passed out, and I have kept in touch with them afterwards; and I dare to say that I think the kind of ministrations that one tries to give are ministrations that not only comfort the person, but do really help the recovery.

17,456. I can well imagine that a person who has possibly still a large measure of intelligence, although suffering for the time being from mental upset, might find much help in talking about himself and his affairs with someone who is not a medical man, someone whose relation to him is different?—I remember in Chester Asylum, when I was in Cheshire, there was a man who showed me a Greek book, he was a very bad tempered person, with whom the staff had a good deal of trouble; I taught him the Greek alphabet and to read the Greek Testament, and the medical officers told me it had made all the difference in the world to the management of him.

17,457. That is a very interesting case.—That of course took some time. It is indicative of the kind of thing I meant in saying that a man who is really to be of any use must have a certain amount of time at his disposal.

17,458. His relation to the establishment is entirely different from that of anybody else. His function, although it is not precisely defined, is quite different from that of anybody else in the institution?—Quite.

17,459. But you regard that as a function of great value?—Certainly I do.

17,460. Of course he will have, in addition to seeing the patients who wish to see him, and moving about what one may call his parish, the conduct of the regular services, I suppose. Most of the institutions as we know, have a chapel?—Yes. With regard to those regular services, there is one thing I should like to say. According to the Act, he must perform Divine Service according to the rites of the Church of England every Sunday, Christmas Day, and Good Friday (Section 277). Of course that is statutory. We think that greater elasticity should be allowed to the chaplain as to the type of service that he may take in the asylum, under proper authority. I am afraid most clergy, I hope under proper authority, do vary their services a little nowadays, but the Statute in the case of asylums insists upon the service from the Prayer Book, the whole service and nothing but it. We, as Bishops, would be quite prepared to grant, in fact we do, very much larger elasticity, but that elasticity is contrary to the Act as it stands.

17,461. Mr. Micklem: I suppose there are no prosecutions under that?—I think I should prosecute a person who adhered to the Statute if I could.

17,462. Chairman: Is that because of the words "According to the rites of the Church of England"?—Yes. I have the Chaplain of Hanwell with me, and he tells me he never takes the whole service; so if anybody needs to be prosecuted, here he is!

17,463. Of course it is not desirable that the functions of the chaplain should be defined by Statute?—No, I think not.

17,464. You want naturally that the chaplain should exercise his own office according to his own discretion?—Quite.

17,465. He knows his office better than anyone else can do. The relationship between parishioner and clergyman is not one susceptible of statutory definition?—Quite.

17,466. But on the other hand, the position of the chaplain is a secular matter as to which it may well be desirable to improve the conditions?—Yes.

17,467. Is the chaplain to an institution in your Diocese one of the regular clergy of your Diocese?—Yes, he holds my licence, and that puts him on the list of my regular clergy.

17,468. And to what extent does the Bishop of the Diocese come into contact with the chaplains of such institutions? Does he have opportunities of conferring with them from time to time?—Yes, I see them from time to time, just in the same way as any other clergyman. One of the chaplains came to see me only a fortnight ago, quite apart from my present position here, simply to talk over his work and things generally.

17,469. Then I understand that the Bishops do not desire that the Statute should in any way prescribe with more detail the duties of the chaplains. You are quite content that that should be left as it is?—Quite, I think.

17,470. Left to his own discretion, subject to the directions of his Bishop?—Yes.

17,471. But in the secular aspect of it your anxiety is that the present conditions, particularly in view of recent economies, are not likely to encourage the best type of man to take office?—That is so. The appointment of a part-time chaplain for three years is not the kind of appointment that you can expect a man who really means business quite willingly to accept, because a task of this kind takes some time to learn.

17,472. Do you find that this class of work attracts your clergy?—No, only very few.

17,473. It is obviously a very exacting form of work, and takes a man, I should think, out of the ordinary lines of promotion?—Yes; I think that has been true in the past. My own little Episcopal Committee, which was appointed before any thought came into our minds of giving evidence before this Commission, was formed with an idea of keeping an eye upon those who are doing useful service in a way that in the past perhaps has not been done, with a view to sympathy and presently possible preferment elsewhere.

17,474. Of course, in one sense the topic is not very closely related to our reference; it only comes in in this sense, that we have to consider the care of the mentally afflicted, and in that aspect any person who is concerned with the daily life of the patients is of importance to us; but the only practical matter with which we might be concerned would be to see that the best class of man was obtained. That is probably the only way in which it comes into our purview?—Yes, I quite see that, and it is on that point I desired to say things that I have said; that the chaplain's duties, not being very easily put into categories, may be to a certain extent disregarded, and paid very little for, with the result that at the same time they cannot be very adequately done by a part-time man, who has perhaps the whole of a parish. I have a case of that kind; it is a new appointment, so I do not know how he is faring, but he is chaplain to 600 or 700 patients, as well as vicar of a parish, and has a small remuneration. I am not putting this forward as a case where it does not work, because I do not know the details; it has not had a long time to run, but I should regard that as quite impossible in a place like Claybury, for instance. As Claybury has been mentioned—that is a London County Council case—the chaplain of Claybury is not paid a very large sum; I think it is about £200.

17,475. Mr. Micklem: How many chaplains are appointed; is there a Nonconformist and a Roman Catholic chaplain there?—At Claybury apparently half the money is given to the Church of England chaplain and the remaining half is given to the Nonconformist and Roman Catholic chaplains between them.

17,476. Chairman: Is there any objection to our having the actual figures?—No objection. I am not quite certain that they are absolutely accurate, but the actual salary at which the present chaplain of Claybury was appointed was £170, which, with war bonus, now amounts to £240.

17,477. Sir Ernest Hiley: Is that a whole-time appointment?—Yes.

17,478. Chairman: With residence?—He resides on the spot, but whether he has to pay for his residence I cannot be sure.

17,479. And what allowances are given to the other ministers?—The Nonconformist chaplain gets the same salary as the Church of England.

17,480. He is not resident, I take it, is he?—I think not.

17,481. And what is paid to the Roman Catholic priest?—The chaplain says he is paid per capita. I do not know what it means—at least, I know what it means—but I do not know what it works out at.

17,482. Mr. Snell: Are we quite clear, my Lord Bishop, that the Nonconformist chaplain gets precisely the same amount of pay for the smaller number of people that he attends?—I am not quite clear as to whether the whole of the half is given to the Nonconformist chaplain or whether it is given to the Nonconformist and the Roman Catholic together.

17,483. Chairman: In any event, it appears that of the total remuneration 50 per cent. is given for 80 per cent. of the patients, and 50 per cent. is given for the 20 per cent. of the patients?—Yes. The Chaplain of Hanwell tells me that it is exactly so in his case. You will quite understand, Sir, that my presence here is in no degree antipathetic to my Nonconformist brethren, with whom I am on the best of terms, and one wholly sympathises with the quite proper provision that Nonconformist patients should be looked after by their own minister.

17,484. One knows that in institutions denominationalism is fortunately largely lost sight of, because the people are there to get better, and therefore these elements are not unduly pronounced?—Yes.

17,485. Then may we take it, my Lord Bishop, that the point that you desire us to consider specially is whether in the first place the status of the chaplain could be recognised more clearly—that is, his civil status?—Yes.

17,486. Mr. Micklem: You are not suggesting, my Lord Bishop, that the chaplain who is named first in Section 276 should be the leading authority in the asylum, are you?—No. I only mentioned the fact that he is named first, as indicative of the view that the Legislature of that day took, that he was a very important functionary.

17,487. And is there really anything in the order at all?—I take it that the superintendent of the asylum is the principal.

17,488. Chairman: I think the Lord Bishop's idea is quite clear; it simply happens to be the first name that occurred?—If you have an asylum, you must have a chaplain; your also want a superintendent.

17,489. I do not think you consider that this is a carefully adjusted hierarchy in the Statute?—No.

17,490. Now you think that the status of the chaplain might be made clearer. That is really from the point of view, I take it, of tenure and emoluments?—Yes.

17,491. On this point about the staff, at present he is appointed, I take it, as chaplain to the asylum; and does he not at the moment concern himself with the staff as well as with the patients?—He very frequently does.

17,492. The staff will attend the services, for example?—Yes.

17,493. But it does not appear to be his business?—It is not clear as it stands. It merely appoints him as a chaplain, and I take it that is as chaplain to the asylum.

17,494. Mr. Micklem: One would be rather inclined to doubt whether that is not in the hands of the staff rather?—As long as it is quite clear that the chaplain is quite free to minister to the staff, I think our point will be met.

17,495. Sir David Drummond: Is the chaplain under the control in any sense of the medical superintendent, or is he entirely independent? His ministrations are as he wishes apart entirely from the medical superintendent's views?—I do not think anything is laid down definitely which answers that question.

17,496. Chairman: Let me put a practical question to you, my Lord Bishop. Suppose the medical superintendent said "I think it is inadvisable that the chaplain should see this particular patient." Suppose the patient's mental aberrations are concerned with religion, and it is found to be disturbing to the patient to meet the clergyman; in such a case I take it the medical superintendent would be entitled to say to the chaplain "You must not see that patient at present," and, I suppose the chaplain would to that extent be under the directions of the superintendent?—I should certainly take that view.

17,497. I am a little in doubt as to the position of the staff. If you look at the institution as a whole as the cure or parish of the clergyman, one would assume that he would attend to and meet with the staff itself as he would with the patients, and of course some of the staff would attend the services and so on. The sphere of his cure is the institution and all whom he finds therein, I should have thought. Of course he cannot compel any member of the staff to attend his ministrations?—No, I doubt if it would be desirable to make that more precise.

17,498. Mr. Snell: There would be no danger, my Lord Bishop, would there, in that being the beginning of some creedal test for the staff, as to whether they would or would not attend the service?—Nothing is further from my mind than that. I think it should be absolutely voluntary as far as the staff are concerned. As Vicar of Bradford I was chaplain of the various Poor Law hospitals and every year I prepared a certain number of nurses for confirmation, but it was absolutely at their good will.

17,499. Chairman: Then at the moment really the position is this, that no medical superintendent, I take it, would object to members of the staff conferring with the chaplain and attending his ministrations?—As long as he does not, we are quite content.

17,500. Sir Humphry Rolleston: I suppose the question is one of some practical importance, because if he attends to the staff, he ought to receive remuneration per capita in relation to them, ought he not?—I hope he will never receive remuneration per capita.

17,501. I thought you said they did?—That actually is done in the case of Roman Catholics, because there are very few.

17,502. Chairman: The measure of remuneration, after all, must have some relation to the size of the cure, and if you augment the persons for whom the chaplain is responsible, then he is a minister of a larger cure, and it might be said he is entitled to a larger remuneration?—That is not how we are paid in the Church of England. I have one of the largest Bishoprics and I am paid, I think, as little as any of the other Bishops; but our point would be that a whole-time man should be paid an adequate salary for his whole-time work, whether they be a little fewer or a little more.

17,503. Then you think that the scale should be this: that if you have an asylum with 1,000 beds or more, there ought to be for such a community a full-time chaplain resident?—Yes; that is our view.

17,504. That there is sufficient work for him to do there, really parochial work in the institution?—Yes. Taking that work in its broadest sense.

17,505. Then you raise a point with regard to the Bishop's power of licensing. Now the Statute provides that the chaplain shall be licensed by the Bishop of the Diocese. Do I gather what you have in mind is this, that you might make it a condition of granting the licence that satisfactory terms were given?—Yes, that the terms and conditions of his appointment should be satisfactory.

17,506. I suppose the licence at present is given by you in view of his qualifications for the work rather than in view of the nature of the appointment, the terms of the appointment?—Not wholly so. In other cases I reserve to myself the right, when I license a curate to a parish, to insist that he shall be properly paid, so that other considerations do enter into it. Only a few weeks ago I refused to license in a case of that kind.

17,507. Then you suggest this, that you should be entitled to withhold your licence from a chaplain who has been appointed by the visiting committee, on the ground that you are dissatisfied with the adequacy of the terms offered to him?—Yes. I think there would have to be consultation first, and one would only do that as a last resort.

17,508. Mr. Micklem: This asylum will be in a parish—suppose there is a vicar in a parish, does he require a special licence from you to undertake chaplaincy work at the asylum?—Yes, he would, under the Act.

17,509. Under this Act do you think? Does that mean shall be licensed ad hoc?—I imagine so.

17,510. I should doubt that, with great deference.—If he were being paid a salary.

17,511. Suppose you took the Rector of Claybury, and the London County Council asked the Rector to undertake the chaplaincy, would he have to get your sanction for it?—I do not think he would if the London County Council did not pay him, but if they paid him, I think he would have to be licensed by the Bishop for that particular post.

17,512. Do you mean he could not make money without the licence of the Bishop?—Not in that way.

17,513. But he could do it voluntarily?—When I was Vicar of Bradford I was licensed to the Poor Law Union by a separate licence.

17,514. You mean it is work that could not be undertaken voluntarily?—It could be undertaken voluntarily, but that would not be a person paid under the Act. I confess I do not quite know what would happen if the Bishop revoked the licence and the visiting committee continued the man in his employment.

17,515. Chairman: It is a little difficult to construe, as Mr. Micklem points out. Take the case of a vicar in your diocese; he is a person who is in priest's orders, and he is a person who has been licensed by the Bishop of the Diocese; therefore he seems to meet most of the statutory requirements, but you say there is a further requirement that he shall not only have been licensed by you, but shall be licensed ad hoc, that is to say, licensed for the particular office of chaplain to the asylum?—That is my experience.

17,516. That may be the reading of it, but I am not sure that it is.

17,517. Mr. Micklem: You see as the Act stands with regard to his stipend and so on, that has to be fixed by the committee?—Yes.

17,518. And you would wish to see that altered in some way to say that it must be fixed by the Bishop?—No, I would not go so far as that.

17,519. Chairman: Indirectly, you would?—I should ask to be allowed to refuse my licence in a case where an unconscionable bargain was being made between the committee and the man.

17,520. That, of course, is an indirect compulsitor?—It is.

17,521. They could not get a chaplain at all if you withheld your licence?—I do not know what would happen to me if I refused again and again men who were nominated to me. The Act says that the committee 'shall,' and says that I 'shall.'

Chairman: One does not contemplate the contingency, but still one has to envisage these things sometimes. It might be resented, you know, if you were put in this position of having really a veto upon the appointment, in the event of your dissatisfaction with the terms. We are dealing with the local authorities; they are made the judges of what is adequate remuneration, and it may be said that if they have fixed the remuneration the question for yourself, in licensing, is rather whether the person has the proper spiritual qualifications for his office.

17,522. Mr. Snell: Might I ask, my Lord Bishop, have you the power to revoke a licence already given for teaching or ministration of which you do not approve?—Yes. The Act says the Bishop has power to revoke his licence. Of course ordinarily that would prevent him from continuing to officiate, but I do not know quite whether that case has ever arisen or what would happen in that case.

17,523. Chairman: Then I see that you wish the appointment to be for a stated period of at least five years renewable at the end of each period?—Yes; on the whole most of us feel that it should be a permanent appointment, so that a man who feels a vocation for that kind of work may be attracted to it; at any rate we feel that three years is too short a period.

17,524. Is three years always the period in the present practice?—The practice until recently has been a permanent appointment; but recently, and I think the London County Council are especially concerned, they have appointed for three years only. A task of this kind requires a man to learn his job; he becomes useful as he learns it, and three years is a very short time for a post of this particularly extraordinary kind.

17,525. Of course, if the chaplain in the three years has learnt his job, and has proved himself, the renewal of his appointment is granted. On the other hand, the three years may disclose the fact that he is unsuited for it, and it is desirable that he should expend his energies in some other direction?—The three years keeps him out of superannuation incidentally.

17,526. That is a very important result. Still, if a man were shown in three years to be unsuitable for his work, it would be dangerous, would it not, from the patients' point of view, that he should remain there?—Absolutely, and I think that is sufficiently safeguarded by the committee's power to dismiss the chaplain, and the Bishop's power to revoke his licence.

17,527. These are very drastic powers. One knows in public life there may be an official as to whom you could not take such steps, but, on the other hand, you would never have appointed him if you knew what you now know about him?—Quite. Speaking for myself, if it were made clear to me that a man who was a chaplain in an asylum was an unsuitable person for that particular job, I should be very glad to go into partnership with the visiting committee in finding him a fresh one.

The Right Reverend the LORD BISHOP OF CHELMSFORD.

17,528. Mr. Micklem: I see you speak in the précis of specialised training for this particular ministry, but has the Church of England some specialised form of training for it?—I do not think we have for the moment, but that is one of the things which I think we are very anxious to try and find.

17,529. Has not the minister really to get his training from his experience in the place?—That is where most of us have learnt ours, such as it is, and I think that is the best training school, but in these days we are trying to begin to give some simple and non-controversial psychological instruction to our ordination candidates, and I hope that that may develop further than it has at present gone. We do not in the least want to instruct our chaplains so that they will interfere with the staff; that is quite alien to our minds, but simply to instruct them so that they shall be more capable of dealing with odd persons.

17,530. Chairman: On this matter of superannuation, at the present time if the chaplain remains in the service for 25 years does he mature a claim for pension?—I think so. (The Rev. W. Barns): That is so. It is the new idea under the London County Council that the man's appointment is for three years only, and he does not come under superannuation; he is not a permanent officer.

17,531. Mr. Snell: Is the suggestion, my Lord Bishop, that the County Council restricts the appointment to three years for the purpose of disqualifying him from pension?—(The Bishop of Chelmsford): I do not like to impute motives, but being appointed for only three years, he is a temporary officer, and therefore is outside the scope of superannuation.

Chairman: It seems rather unattractive to the young energetic man, if he does service on the basis of a three years' appointment and then at the end of 25 years' work, after enjoying the very exiguous emoluments you have referred to, finds himself with no pension rights at all.

17,532. Sir David Drummond: Apart from his religious ministrations, does he visit the wards?—He is supposed to visit the wards.

17,533. But at certain hours I mean.—I do not think he is tied to hours, but it must be at the convenience of the establishment.

17,534. Sir Humphry Rolleston: It is a very interesting question which Sir David Drummond raised as to the relation of the clergyman and the medical man; because there is a certain amount of overlapping, the spiritual comfort which the chaplain might give is related to some of the processes which are employed by medical men, such as psycho-analysts,—I mean, the treatment by some psycho-analysts is very much like the comfort which may be brought to a patient by talking over his troubles?—Quite.

17,535. I was wondering whether you have got any ideas with regard to combined action on those lines?—I think we should hope that there would be a happy partnership between the medical officers and the chaplain, as exists in so many cases between the parson and the doctor in ordinary homes. In my own experience, again and again the doctor and I have talked over particular cases with a view to my doing something as well as with a view to his doing something; and it was partly with that end in view that we hoped that the right kind of man would be attracted to this particular task, and that we might be able to help him, in the way of training, to become more adequate for it; but if he is only appointed for three years it is difficult for him to feel that it is a vocation.

17,536. Chairman: Do you think there is really a career in it, if I may so put it? Take a clergyman, for example, who takes up teaching, and many of the teachers in public schools are in Orders. He may look forward to very high promotion indeed; he may occupy an episcopal chair ultimately, as many most distinguished teachers have done; but it rather looks as if there was very little outcome in this profession for the asylum chaplain. At the best, if he has to be specially trained and to be sent there, so to speak, he is left at the peril of losing his superannuation, and there does not seem to be much to stimulate him. Would it not be better that persons should do some work of that sort, and then pass back into ordinary cures?—For most men I think my answer would be very decidedly yes. I think a period of something like ten years is probably all that a man ought for his own sake and for everybody else's sake to have.

17,537. One is apt to get stale?—Quite, because it is one kind of task.

17,538. And it may become routine, too?—Yes, there is a danger of that. Of course, the superannuation difficulty arises if you leave the service, even if you are open to superannuation; if you leave the service of your own free will, you lose all your rights, do not you?—Yes. That has happened to me, so I know, in connection with the Poor Law.

17,539. Sir Humphry Rolleston: There are not sufficient men in the Medical Mission to utilise for this purpose, I suppose?—There is a certain number of medical men in Holy Orders, but that is quite a new thought to me.

17,540. I was rather thinking of medical missionaries—are there not a certain number of clergymen in the mission field who have some knowledge of medicine, who are invalided home from China and places of that kind, and would not they be rather good people to put in asylums?—I think some of those men might be very excellent.

17,541. Chairman: The only fear is they might want to arrogate some of the functions of the medical superintendent.

Sir Humphry Rolleston: They would not if they had not medical qualifications. There are a good many medical missionaries who come back and are at a loose end.

17,542. Chairman: What rather strikes me is that looking at the secular aspect there is not very much attraction in it for a man. I can imagine a man saying: "I should like very much to spend a few years in doing that work, and I should like to help in it, take a share in it, and then pass on to other work", but to devote himself to the career of an asylum chaplain seems to me a rather depressing outlook, and he might soon drop into routine and the founts of his sympathy might dry up?—I quite agree.

17,543. Mr. Snell: In fact might it not be that the only persons who would spend a life at it would be those who have not particularly suitable gifts?—If you are only going to keep a man for a few years it rather points to making an effort to get a man who really does for those few years regard the thing as a vocation, and treating him decently while you have got him.

17,544. Chairman: Take the ordinary hospital, such as the general hospital; there the visiting clergymen of various denominations come in with a fresh breath from the outer world, so to speak, and they are in contact with all the interests which they have outside; but the asylum chaplain, immured within this very special parish of his, would, I think, be very liable to get out of touch with things and begin to lose freshness and sympathy?—Speaking solely for myself, and against the mind of some of my brother Bishops, the difficulty of the man outside, who might make a very adequate chaplain while he was doing other work, is that so many of these mental homes are so large that the task is a whole-time task.

17,545. There are two views, either it should be a part-time job, or it should be done as an episode in the career of a clergyman. He might be willing to do that work for a time just as he might be willing to engage in East End Mission work for a time before he got a more normal country charge; or it might be a service of a more or less specialised type like the Army chaplain, or the Navy chaplain, who remain in the services until they retire. I gather you rather favour the plan of making it a service by itself, because you say it requires special qualifications. The danger of that, on the one hand, is that the atmosphere of the asylum is an atmosphere of depression and difficulty, where a man may lose his usefulness more rapidly than he would in the other services.—I think that is perfectly true. I do not think at all, speaking for myself, that a man should give his whole life to it. I do think he should give a period of his life to it, if he is going to do it at all.

17,546. As a Bishop of a diocese, would you favourably consider the claims of an asylum chaplain who found in himself that he was less useful than he had been originally, would you consider his claims to preferment elsewhere?—I am doing that very thing at this very moment.

17,547. Mr. Snell: Do you think it is advisable to give the patients the advantage of experience? I mean I would rather like to have the chaplain to come to them at the other end of his experience when he has had a good deal of contact with humanity?—I do not think that an asylum chaplain should be a newly ordained man, and that is partly the reason why I deprecate the very meagre pay that is paid to some of them, because you are only likely to get newly ordained men, or quite inefficient men, at the kind of pay that is now being offered. I shall be ordaining a dozen men in a fortnight's time, and nearly all of those will be getting over £200 a year to begin with, and apparently there are some asylum chaplains who are only getting that after years of service.

17,548. But assuming that the chaplain in his ministration has some real comforting and steadying effect, some therapeutic value, if one may put it so,

(The Witness withdrew.)

(After a short adjournment.)

The Reverend W. E. C. BARNES, M.A., called and examined.

17,554. Chairman: Mr. Barnes, you are Chaplain at present at Hanwell and Cane Hill Mental Hospitals?—Yes.

17,555. And I think you have held your appointment as Chaplain to Hanwell since 1920, and to Cane Hill since 1923?—Yes.

17,556. Were you formerly for six years Chaplain to the British Embassy Church in Petrograd?—Yes.

17,557. You have had a varied experience, because I see you served during the war as a Lieutenant in the Royal Naval Volunteer Reserve, as Gunnery Officer attached to H.M.S. "M.25" in the White Sea?—Yes.

17,558. You must find your present life rather a change, I should think, from your previous pursuits?—Yes.

17,559. Now are you also a member of the Guild of Health?—No. I was merely asked by the Bishop of London to come and give my evidence.

17,560. I see that appended to your précis there is a statement by the Bishop of Kensington, who speaks as President of the Guild of Health.—Yes, we were called together there, and he addressed that letter to the Royal Commission, I believe; and I wish to identify myself with all that he said as regards the work of the chaplains; that is why I mention it.

17,561. What happened was that the Bishop held a meeting of chaplains?—Yes. He is President of the Guild of Health, and he called together this meeting at their offices; but none of us belong to the Guild of Health, as a matter of fact.

17,562. It was a meeting called at the offices of the Guild of Health?—Yes.

17,563. And they invited a number of you to meet and express your views?—Yes.

17,564. May I take it that you and your colleagues who attended that meeting find your views adequately expressed by the Bishop in his communication to our Commission?—Absolutely, yes.

upon the patients, it is advisable that the chaplain should be almost as efficient as your medical superintendent should be in his own line?—Quite, in his particular sphere.

17,549. Chairman: Then, I think, my Lord Bishop, we have covered the various points which you have been good enough to bring before us in your précis and, unless you have anything else you would like to bring before us, it only remains for us to thank you for your kindness in coming here and assisting our deliberations?—I am most grateful to you, Sir, for allowing me to come.

17,550. Mrs. Mathew: I should like to ask you, my Lord Bishop, do the local authorities invariably fix the salaries?—Yes, I think so.

17,551. And what is the rate of superannuation, do you happen to know?—That depends upon the amount that they are paying, and the years of service that they have rendered. It is according to scale.

17,552. The other question I wanted to ask you was this: Would you do away with all chance of superannuation and just raise the yearly salary—would you recommend that?—Some of the chaplains would prefer that, and some of them would not. Personally, speaking only for myself, I should prefer proper remuneration, leaving the pension question to be dealt with by the Church. We are in fact dealing with it, and I hope we shall deal with it successfully. I believe that is the better way in the long run, because then it does make it easier to move a chaplain who has fulfilled his term of service as a chaplain; but if you take him away, and he thereby forfeits all his superannuation payments, it is a thing that he sometimes does not feel inclined to face.

17,553. On the other hand, he would be leaving a much better salary if you took him away?—Yes, that would be so in some cases.

17,565. We need not go into them in detail; but I think you might help us by giving us some idea of your daily work as chaplain in the institutions with which you are associated. One wants to see the sphere of your activities, and what work you can do, and what help you can give. Would you mind telling us the nature of your day-to-day work?—Of course, my evidence is that I am a friend to the patients; the patients look upon me as a friend, in a different way from the way they look upon the doctor; so that anything I may say will be from the patients' point of view. Of course, they come up to see me; I go in at odd hours of the day, I see them socially and spiritually, I am at their dances, and I look after them in church, and I see them in the wards and the airing courts, and when they are sick; and of course they would speak to me naturally on all that happens to them. The public, I suppose, is interested anyhow in their treatment—is that so?

17,566. Yes, but I would like to know a little of your daily routine. First of all, do you live in the institution?—No, I do not. I have to find a house outside.

17,567. Do you go daily to the institutions?—I go four days a week to one and four days a week to the other.

17,568. That sounds like eight days.—On the Sunday I am alternately in the evening at Hanwell and in the morning at Cane Hill.

17,569. Do you find that the work which you have to do takes all your time?—All my time now, because I run the two institutions. Before, I was only chaplain of Hanwell, and also chaplain to the Malvern College Mission down in the east end. I felt I could not keep the two going, so when Cane Hill fell vacant I happened to get the appointment.

17,570. Can you manage all the work of those institutions?—I can, because the day I am at Han-well I am not wanted at Cane Hill; it is only part time at each place, of course.

17,571. I forget for the moment how many patients you will have in the two institutions?—2,500 at Hanwell, and just under that, I think, at Cane Hill.

17,572. That is a very large number of people to have under your charge?—Plus the staff, of course. I am in very happy relations with the medical staff and the nursing staff on both sides, and I look after the nurses socially, because I am chairman of their social club; so that it is the staff as well as the patients.

17,573. What takes you to see any particular patient, if there are 2,500 patients? When you arrive there in the morning, what is your routine work; do you find that certain individual patients wish to see you?—I find on my office table a number of envelopes which have arrived, giving the cases of sickness. The relatives of certain patients are notified that their friend is sick or is ill or is dying, as the case may be, and a similar notice comes to me. I deal with that, and naturally take my routine of going through a certain number of the male wards one day and a certain number of the female wards; it is a regular routine. I make a point of doing all I can in the time, seeing the patients both in the wards and also in the various workshops. It is like a parish, really. You have certain cases; your communicants come first, of course. I have quite one hundred at one place, and not so many at the other. It is like parochial work, exactly.

17,574. Apart from those who are sick, and who require special ministrations, in what degree are you brought into contact with patients individually?—I was going to give you the case of a man named W—. I get interested in these cases, like you get interested in people in parochial work. I first met W— when I became chaplain of Hanwell, in No. 7 ward. He is a man without a leg; he tried to put an end to his life, and lost his leg in the attempt. He insisted upon being put into a padded room—padded all round, with only just a certain amount of light coming in; he insisted on living in that dark little place; he was there the whole of the winter; he is an intellectual man, well educated, and a journalist. I was interested in the man. I was talking to him quite naturally from a religious point of view, and also on all kinds of matters, and then he expressed a wish for his communion. I went into the details as to whether he had been confirmed, and so on, and I said, "Look here, I cannot give you communion in this dark little hole; I could not put a table in here, for one thing." There was no light, or very little light. I said, "If you want your communion, I know you can come out; there is no need for you to be in this room. You must ask for a lighter room, and get out of this." After about a fortnight he asked for a lighter room. He got into a lighter room, his condition improved, but he was still in bed. Then I said, "It is no good your remaining in bed. You come along out to church." He is coming out to church now, and he is coming to his communions and taking them himself. There are other cases like that. There was a case of a man named R—, who complained to the doctor of his heart; the doctor said there was nothing the matter with his heart, but he insisted upon remaining in bed, and he wanted his communion. I said, "You must come out and get it." He ended by coming out and getting it. Those are two cases where the patients have improved merely because of—call it auto-suggestion, or whatever you like. Anyhow, he had to come and make use of his faculties to get what he wanted. I was not going to give it to him otherwise. I am very friendly, of course, with all the doctors. If I want to know what the condition of a patient is, I ask the doctor in charge.

17,575. Do you find that you are able, through spiritual ministrations, to help many of the cases that are in a distressed condition?—A great number; because religious mania forms a great part of their difficulties. Take the case of a man man who will say, "Shall I always be like this in the after-world?" and things like that. My answer to him, of course, is "No." I comfort him in that way. It is a tremendous comfort to the great majority of these people.

17,576. Then do you find that they use you to any extent as a link with the outer world, that is to say, as a means of communicating with relatives?—Absolutely. Another thing is this: I come across various patients whose relatives, possibly, take very little interest in them. I write to those relatives and tell them they ought to do so, and in a certain number of cases that has been instrumental in the patients getting out. Otherwise, if a patient remains in, and his relatives take no interest in him, he may remain in for the rest of his life; so that in a great number of cases I have been a help in getting the relatives to take the initiative and come and bother the medical authorities about the condition of the patients. It is a tremendous help to those men and women to know that they have got a person who is their friend. They do not look upon me as one of the staff.

17,577. Your position is distinctive in that respect?—Yes.

17,578. Then of course you will hold the regular stated services?—Yes, regular stated services; of course, it is up to the medical superintendent to say what sort of services should be held. I mean I can always go to him and say, "Is it convenient to have a service on Tuesday instead of Wednesday?" and so on, and it is up to him to say whether it is convenient or not. He is the absolute authority. In both the institutions the medical superintendents are tremendous friends of mine, and I find the relations between us are extremely friendly in every way.

17,579. Have you ever had cases where, because of the medical specialties of the patient, it has been thought undesirable that the patient should have spiritual ministrations?—Never.

17,580. What one had in mind (you heard us putting the question to the Bishop of Chelmsford this morning) was that certain cases might possibly be excited by controversy on religious matters, if they chose to become controversial?—No, I do not think so, unless there happened to be a chaplain who stirred people's emotions up so. I did hear of a case at one of the hospitals where the medical superintendent, when the chaplain was appointed, told him that he must not do that or must not do this in the pulpit, or say that or say this in the pulpit. Of course the medical superintendent has no right to say anything of the kind, or to interfere with his work like that.

17,581. How many actual communicants have you under your charge?—I have got 100 at Hanwell and about 50 to 60 at Cane Hill. That is a fair percentage, when you come to think of what it is outside; it forms about one-third of the church-going population at Hanwell; they are tremendously responsive; the patients get confirmed. I am an extreme church man, and I make use of various other sacraments. I baptise babies. It is all the usual work of a parish, as a matter of fact.

17,582. I do not quite understand. Are babies born in the institutions?—Yes, babies are born to the staff as well as to the patients sometimes, so I mean there are all sorts of things to think of.

17,583. To what extent are the patients in these institutions under your charge members of the Church of England?—They are fully 75 per cent.; I do fully 75 per cent. of the work.

17,584. Do ministers of any other denominations attend at all?—There is a Free Church minister at both institutions, and also a Roman Catholic.

17,585. Do they come at intervals?—It is half-time work with the Presbyterian minister; he is paid exactly the same salary as I am. As a matter of fact it is the old sum of £400, plus a house, which the old chaplain got, and which was not divided up. It does not work out at so much now. There is a saving on the religious side of the hospital. We each draw £170 a year, of course plus war bonus, which will drop in time. But he is half-time with me. However, it means that in the case of funerals and all kinds of work like that, and sickness, I get 75 per cent. of the work. He takes a funeral once or twice a quarter, and I take during the winter, anyhow, a great number.

17,586. May one ask, if it not trespassing upon your conscience, what attracted you to this work?—When I came home—my own home was broken up in Petrograd, and I lost everything; I had just been newly married in 1913, and I lost everything I possessed—I came home after demobilisation I was out there all through the Bolshevik business with Lenin and Trotsky. I came out in 1917, then I joined the Navy, and went to Archangel; I volunteered my services. When I was demobilised I had to look round for something, and I found there was an ex-service man wanted as a chaplain to a hospital, and I applied for it.

17,587. You had not had any previous experience?—No. One of the people said to me, "All your work has been among the lunatics outside."

17,588. Now you have had some years' experience of it, do you regard it as a sphere of work attractive in itself?—I certainly think so; of course I have come to like it very much, but it cuts one off entirely from the church outside, as far as the bishops are concerned and preferment is concerned. It is a special form of work. It is the same with the doctors; the medical staff will tell you you are an outsider, almost.

17,589. One wonders whether there is a sufficient career to attract clergymen to join it?—I certainly think so, because it is a thing that is going to increase; the institutions are going to be enormously on the increase. It is only a question of pounds, shillings and pence. It is not a career at present. Down in the East End I was chaplain of the Malvern College Mission, and I got paid for my half-time job very much more than I do where I am at present, although I am running both. I am prepared to work seven days a week. I make enough to live on, and my wife works as well; but so far as attracting a man is concerned, of course it would not, especially now they are making it not a permanent job. I would not have looked at it if it had not been a permanent job.

17,590. What are the terms of your appointment?—I am at the mercy of the committee. I might be turned off at a month's notice, but, of course, coming under the superannuation, they could not turn me off unless for some offence. I suppose that is so; I do not know.

17,591. Is your appointment subject to a month's notice?—A month's notice on either side, yes.

17,592. You are not even under a three years' engagement?—No, I am not under a three years' engagement. Supposing I was found incapable one Saturday night, or something of that sort, and the committee thought fit to turn me down, they might give me a month's notice. If they make other arrangements, if they wanted a chaplain under the new conditions, I do not know whether they could turn me off, but they would have anyhow to pay my superannuation, because I come under certain terms.

17,593. Mr. Micklem: Would they have to return your contributions, or more than that?—More than that. A case occurred in one of these other chaplaincies, where the place was pulled down. The chaplain there got a sum of £300, or something of the sort.

17,594. Have not you got a written contract with them?—No, I have no written contract. I do not know what that month's notice on either side really means, except that it is so.

17,595. Chairman: Do you contemplate remaining on in this irksome work?—I contemplate remaining on till I am 65.

17,596. And do you feel (again one is asking rather a confidential question) satisfaction in your work; have you the satisfaction that a man has when he feels he is doing useful work?—Most certainly. At Hanwell I have seen a tremendous difference. The patients are so very responsive. The importance of the chaplain's work lies in the fact that he is a permanent officer, and does not change; the medical officers change. In the wards for three months there will be one of the young doctors in charge; the three months come to an end, and he is changed, and another comes on, but he has not got time in those three months to know his patients. I know them, because I am there year in and year out.

17,597. You move about throughout the institution, and without any notice, of course, as to when you are coming; you are at liberty to go anywhere in your own institution at any time?—I do at all odd times.

17,598. And, therefore, you must have opportunities of seeing the institution as it is working in ordinary routine?—Yes.

17,599. I would like to know, from your observation of the way in which patients are treated, and your observation of their day-to-day life, have you seen anything in the nature of ill-usage of a patient?—No, not to my knowledge. I have heard of cases where there has been ill-treatment, but, of course, I have only heard of them because they are cases which have come before the notice of the authorities; they do occur; they are bound to occur; but, personally, I have not seen any.

17,600. You have moved about at all hours of the day?—At all odd times, in and out, in every place—every ward.

17,601. And so far as your observation is concerned, you have not seen anything which called for comment in that respect?—No. I have, of course, seen patients suddenly become violent, and it means there is a rush to get them under, otherwise they would put their heads through a window, or something of that sort, and there are all sorts of funny things, of course, with funny patients. You have to take all things as they come. There was a case of a woman who came into the field and jabbed a pin or something sharp all down here, across my coat (describing). I did not do anything, until she passed on. But these patients become suddenly violent, whether they are women or men, and they have to be got under. They have to be taken forcibly under the arms and put into the room where they came from, or put away somewhere.

17,602. I was thinking rather of ill-usage, either malicious ill-usage or punitive ill-usage. Have you seen anything of that sort?—Never.

17,603. Do you take an interest in the general intellectual life of the institution?—I do, yes.

17,604. Is there a library, for example?—Yes; I look after it with the medical superintendent; we agree together what is wanted, but I do all the work there, with a patient under me.

17,605. Do you find that the library is taken much advantage of?—Certainly, in some wards; in other wards they do not care a bit. You send them down something to read and they tear it up; but otherwise the books are used tremendously. They are changed every week; we have got a very large library.

17,606. Is there a demand for religious works at all?—Except for bibles—not for reading purposes.

17,607. You were present while the Bishop of Chelmsford was giving us the benefit of his evidence this morning, and he put forward various views as to the improvement of the status of the chaplains in asylums. We need not cover that ground again, because I take it that what he has said has your entire agreement?—Yes. I thought I was coming to give evidence of my work there; but I personally wanted to press that home, because I think it is very important, and I feel that this change that is taking place, making the chaplain no longer a permanent officer, is absolutely wrong. You will not get the best type of man, and it wants the best type of man, because the patients derive a tremendous amount of good from the work of the chaplain, if he is permanent. You asked me whether there was ill-treatment; but on the other hand, I go in on a Monday, we will say, when all the friends and relations are there, and I hear nothing but praise from the friends and relations of the treatment of their friends. Only the other day a certain patient, called E. B., died in No. 3 ward at Hanwell. Her relatives wished to express their thanks to the medical staff, and also to the chaplain for the kindness she had received whilst she was in the institution; and I received the other day a crucifix to be placed in the chapel in memory of their relative. That shows anyhow that there is the other side to it. I have told you that, because one reads a lot in the papers about ill-treatment going on. I must deny that, knowing the staff as I do, both the nursing and the medical staff, intimately. Of course, cases do occur when you get a person who is cruel by nature; they are eliminated if the case comes before the authorities; but I have never seen during the whole time anything untoward happening.

17,608. How many cases have there been during the time you were there which were investigated by the authorities—if you knew about them?—I just happen to hear of them if I happen to be in the medical superintendent's house at the time, or in the doctor's house, when the case is on. I have known of two.

17,609. When was the last one?—About two months ago, and I think there is one coming on now.

17,610. These are official investigations into cases where cruelty is alleged?—They are coming before the medical superintendent, yes. But in the kind of ward, where the other case occurred, it is very difficult. I will just tell you the difficulties. We get a strong man—a tremendous chap, I am thinking of; his great idea is that the people who are keeping him there are the doctors. He says: "I am going to get so-and-so in time"—thinking of a certain doctor or a medical superintendent. The other day he did get the medical superintendent; he met him in the field, and he gave him a tremendous blow here—(describing); it took eight men to get that man under. Those are the difficulties we have to put up with; and sometimes a patient comes up against a young attendant, very likely. I do not know what class the male attendants are taken from, but the females are taken from the servant class. If you get a malicious attendant she is going to take it out of the patient, until she is found out. With a tremendous staff of 500, cases do occur, but when they are known they are tried, and the evidence is all for the patient and not for the nurse.

17,611. Of course, it is quite obvious that you cannot eliminate every possible chance of ill-treatment occurring, because there are so many people, but what one is desirous of achieving, if it is possible, is to have it ensured that when such cases do occur they are brought to light, and the persons who have been found in the wrong are properly dealt with?—Yes.

17,612. Such cases of course will occur, and will occur under any system; but so far as your experience goes, have the cases which have occurred been brought under the cognisance of the authorities? Take the case you spoke of as occurring two or three months ago?—Certainly; the man was dismissed, and they are very, very severe when it does come up.

17,613. As long as it is clear that the cases, when they do occur, are investigated and dealt with, that is the important thing to ensure?—Yes; but it is wonderful, really. I must tell you this. When I was first appointed at Cane Hill I was in one of the infirmary wards there, and there was an elderly man out of bed. I said, "Is that the remains of a bed-sore?"—I could see he had a sore on his back. The attendant said to me, "Bed-sore? Bed-sore? We never have bed-sores here. He has been in bed 16 weeks now, and he has never had a bed-sore." There are a great number of hospitals—I mean private hospitals—where the patients do get bed-sores. But they are very careful with the nursing, and I must say as far as the cleanliness of the patients is concerned, and the care they get—well, I mean, you could not get better care or more comfort.

17,614. How many attendants have you at Cane Hill?—I cannot give you the exact numbers of the male staff; they are pretty large, because you have to have three shifts nowadays. It is about the same as, perhaps a few less, than at Hanwell.

17,615. Do you move about among the staff as well?—Yes, at all odd times.

17,616. And do they take advantage of your spiritual ministrations?—Certainly, yes.

17,617. They attend the services, I suppose?—Yes.

17,618. Will you tell us what impression the staff has made upon you? You have said that there are some cases, as in every large community, where the staff is not satisfactory; but what impression have you formed of the type of men and women engaged in this service of nursing?—Very excellent, considering, as I say, the type from which they are drawn. I mean, supposing a nurse is not cut out for it, she goes on probation for a short time, and is turned out. But they are an excellent set of girls and an excellent set of men. I am chairman of a social club called "The Nightingale Club" at Hanwell, and I have to arrange all their particular entertainments, both in summer and in winter, and I know them pretty well. I have an excellent choir of men and women at Hanwell. They are awfully keen.

17,619. They have a difficult class of work to do, and they must be subjected very often to very provocative treatment from patients?—Absolutely; most trying circumstances; they have to put up with a good deal. I can think now of a nurse with her finger bitten through; it was not her fault. She will always have a deformed finger until she goes down to her grave. I should be very sorry to put up with some of those patients, and it is wonderful what the nurses do with them, and how kind they are with a great number of them. Of course, numbers of the patients are very, very difficult, those cases who never come out of their rooms, for instance. Of course, a great number of them are absolutely senile.

17,620. Then I think, Mr. Barnes, that with your evidence and that of the Bishop we have had a very full account of the chaplain and his functions in the asylum, and also the points with regard to which you think the present system might be improved—unless you have anything further to add?—No, nothing.

17,621. Sir David Drummond: During the course of this inquiry we have heard that it is desirable, or probably will be desirable, to reduce the size of the asylums, to reduce the numbers. In your opinion, if they were reduced, say, to 1,000, would it be necessary to appoint a whole-time chaplain?—I do not know, except that I think it would be most desirable to reduce the numbers.

17,622. We have heard that the asylums at present are perhaps too large, and that it might be desirable to reduce the number in any institution?—Not necessarily a whole-time officer, I should think, except that if you are going to give care to these people you must not get a man who is just going to make it part of his work, and drop in when he likes, and that sort of thing.

17,623. There is one other point I would like to elicit from you. Does the doctor make use of the information that you acquire in your process of interviewing the patients? You probably get a lot of information from them. Does the doctor make use of that information?—Most certainly he would, if I thought fit to pass it on to him. As I say, when

I go to see him, which is pretty often, I discuss things with him.

17,624. So that you are able to furnish him with useful evidence?—Yes. I just want to put right what the Bishop said this morning. He was wrong about Claybury. I do not think the chaplainship at Claybury is a whole-time job; I think it is only, at the very most, three-parts time—I do not think it is even that.

17,625. Chairman: We can ascertain that, of course?—Yes, only I heard it stated this morning, and the statement is not accurate. It is an appointment the same as mine; anyhow, he draws the same stipend.

17,626. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Can you give us your idea as to what percentage of the inhabitants of mental hospitals really come within your purview? I mean, the Bishop said that a parish of 1,000 required a whole-time man?—I get 500 to church; of the others, there are certain cases which never come out of their rooms, and there are a certain number who cannot leave the wards, but I deal with the whole lot of them. I deal with them in their side rooms, patients lying in a bed, and never leaving it, and I deal with the bed cases in the ordinary dormitories.

17,627. How many of those, do you think, are capable of receiving any benefit from your ministrations?—A great part of them.

17,628. 50 per cent.?—More than 50 per cent. I should think. I mean, there it is like being in a parish. You might have a parish of 10,000 people. It is only so because it happens to be divided up into parishes and there are 10,000 people. You look upon them as belonging to you, but there are some you never see; they belong to other denominations. I say prayers in the dormitories and for the bed cases, and talk to them, and see their relatives when they are there.

17,629. You do not think it necessary to make any modification in the statutory directions for the performance of your office?—I think that is the Bishop's point of view. I do not take the full service, merely because it is too long. Where there are four Psalms I only give one; where there are two Lessons I give them one.

Chairman: Thank you very much for your attendance, Mr. Barnes.

(The Witness withdrew.)

Sir ARCHIBALD BODKIN, K.C.B. (Director of Public Prosecutions) called and examined.

17,630. Chairman: Sir Archibald, we are much indebted to you for coming to see us this afternoon, and there are some matters within your province upon which we should like to have your assistance. I quite appreciate that your relation to this branch of the law is a limited relation, but a very important one. I gather from your précis that there are various points, some of them of a technical character, where you think the law might well be amended?—Yes. I think Part XI of the Act of 1890 might well be re-drafted, and very much condensed. I have not pursued the history of each one of these sections, but I have some reason to think that they are survivals from the earlier statutes, and they overlap in certain cases. Their phraseology is not what is usually met with in more modern Acts of Parliament.

17,631. I think that is characteristic of the Act of 1890; there are vestiges in that of previous stages of civilisation which have been carried forward, which is so often the case in a consolidating measure; but now that we have had over 30 years' experience of the 1890 code I gather that quite a number of points have arisen in practice where it would be desirable to effect improvements?—Yes.

17,632. Now Part XI is your province?—Yes.

17,633. And I think we might just go through the sections and obtain from you your suggestions as to the points where amendment is required. If we start with Section 315 that certainly at once strikes a lawyer's eye as an odd provision?—Yes. Might I before dealing with Section 315 mention, in the order in my précis, a point that really is of practical importance?

17,634. If you please.—When the Legislature passed the Mental Deficiency Act, 1913, they repealed a section which provided that the Order of the Commissioners should be accepted without further proof; and the result is that as the cases in Part XI are criminal cases, where an Order of the Commissioners is necessary, you have to call somebody from the office of the Board of Control, say, to prove the Order instead; whereas previously to the Mental Deficiency Act, 1913, it proved itself.

17,635. I am quite familiar with that difficulty, and if you omit to prove the Order the proceedings will be quashed for informality?—If the gentleman on the other side, if I may use the expression, spots it.

17,636. Earl Russell: You do have to prove by-laws if you proceed under them?—There are various provisions which enable you to get out of that. You have a sealed copy which you keep, and there are provisions for proving Statutory Rules and Orders which relieve you very often of the necessity.

17,637. It seems childish to have to prove this?—Yes. There is a clause in a Bill now before the House, called the Criminal Justice Bill, which is to do away with the necessity of proving signatures and Orders of public authorities. For instance, as you know, Sir, there are cases where the Attorney-General's fiat is necessary; some cases where there has to be a certificate or a consent of the Board of Control, the Inland Revenue, the Customs and so forth. That clause sweeps all these matters up into one and enables the document to prove itself; and this defect, which has resulted from the Mental Deficiency Act, will be cured if that passes into law.

17,638. Chairman: Is it Section 152, the repeal of which has caused the trouble?—Yes.

17,639. Probably the point which you have in mind was not adverted to by the draftsman when he repealed Section 152?—No; perhaps he did not visualise the really practical difficulty. I have no doubt it is a very pleasant holiday for somebody from the Board of Control to go down to a place in the country, prove a document, and go back again.

17,640. Therefore you would desire that these Orders should be dealt with by legislation and put in the position of proving themselves?—Yes.

17,641. Just as one knows the King's Printers copy of an Act is evidence, so you wish an Order to be evidence that such Order was made?—It proves itself with all its mistakes, one of which appears in this part of the Lunacy Act.

17,642. Then we might look at Section 315.—The first subsection of Section 315 deals with two groups of offences. The first is "receiving or detaining a lunatic or alleged lunatic in an institution for lunatics"—otherwise than in accordance with the Act. Now the words "alleged lunatic" of course are inserted because it was necessary to meet the case of a person who is dealt with as a lunatic but is not one, who is alleged to be one, who is treated as one in relation to his reception or detention, although he might not be a lunatic at all.

17,643. Earl Russell: Who do you think it is who is to make the allegation? The person detaining him?—It is a difficulty, the alleged lunatic, but I think it means, and is generally accepted to mean, a person who has been treated as a lunatic, the subject of some kind of order or procedure under which he finds himself in an institution for lunatics, but is in fact not a lunatic.

17,644. Mr. Micklem: Supposing the certificates are wrong he is an alleged lunatic?—Yes. That is

Sir ARCHIBALD BODKIN, K.C.B.

one branch of the subsection. Then the second branch is "for payment taking charge of, receiving to board or lodge, or detaining a lunatic or alleged lunatic, but in an unlicensed house." The great distinction between those two is that the first requires no payment; it implies some irregularity or non-compliance with the provisions of the Lunacy Act in regard to the person's reception or detention. The second one postulates a payment, doing it for money, and in an unlicensed house; and, as I have said in my memorandum, the second group is far more serious than the first group of offences, because in the first the person goes into an institution for lunatics which one assumes (with the strict control of the Board of Control) is a proper place where a person will be properly treated and have proper accommodation; the second is a case in which for money somebody who does not keep a licensed or recognised house at all takes in a lunatic or receives to board or lodge, or detains a lunatic. Therefore the second group of offences I submit involves much more serious matters than the first. But then if you read on in this section you find that the person who offends against either branch is to be guilty of a misdemeanour, and in the latter case shall also be liable to a penalty not exceeding £50. So that in the second group, the more serious cases, those last words "and in the latter case shall also be liable to a penalty" expose him to a pecuniary penalty recoverable before the justices; and the person who offends against the first and less serious part of the clause must be dealt with as for a misdemeanour.

17,645. You do not think the first head is, so to speak, cumulative?—No, because under the criminal law, as the Commission will appreciate, a misdemeanour is an offence which is not a felony, and for a misdemeanour in English law both fine and imprisonment to an unlimited amount may be imposed; and, as I think I said in my memorandum, the only restriction on the amount of the fine or length of the imprisonment is that it should not be unreasonable.

17,646. It is very oddly expressed "in the latter case shall also be liable"?—It is.

17,647. Would not the most appropriate amendment be to split up that subsection into two heads, and then assign a proper penalty to each head?—Yes.

17,648. This attempt to do the two things, to link up two things which are really different in character, as you have pointed out, with differing penalties in one subsection, is very liable to lead to difficulties?—Yes. I was going to suggest a little later that when you come to subsection (2) of this section we get a third group.

17,649. That is so, yes.—"Except under the provisions of this Act it shall not be lawful for any person to receive or detain two or more lunatics in a house" unless it is an institution. In respect of that offence you see they have attached a separate clause to provide for the punishment, subsection (3).

17,650. Earl Russell: These are not alleged lunatics?—No, and no payment is necessary under that. I have got one or two criticisms about that clause in a moment, but I was going to suggest that the proper way to deal with this section, as your Chairman has suggested, is to split it up into so many sub-clauses as there are offences, and if the punishment attached to one is to differ from the punishment attached to another, make it perfectly clear. But I think in such cases, as I have said, it would be quite possible for any offences under Part XI to provide a comprehensive punishment of a fine of £50, or whatever the pecuniary penalty is, and/or imprisonment for three months on summary conviction; or if the case is a serious one, provide that it be dealt with on indictment, when the maximum pecuniary penalty shall be X pounds and/or imprisonment.

17,651. Chairman: With whom would lie the discretion to direct that the matter be dealt with summarily or on indictment?—Usually it is the prosecution who submit to the Court that the case is a serious one, and the matter should go for trial. There is a very little, but there is a little, difference in the initial stages of laying the information, and so forth, for a summary offence, and laying the information for an indictable offence; there is a very little distinction. If a precedent is wanted there is a precise precedent that just occurs to me, the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, Section 2, or 3 I think it is, which provides for the offences being summary offences, but allows the magistrate to commit for trial.

17,652. Earl Russell: The discretion would reside with the justices.—Yes.

17,653. Chairman: I think under the Merchandise Marks Act, if I remember rightly, the person accused is entitled to ask that his case be submitted to a jury.—Yes, he has that in addition; but if he consents to a summary jurisdiction after that option has been given to him, and the punishment is more than three months, he then has a right to claim a jury; but even if he elects to be dealt with summarily, the magistrate may say "No. I think I shall send this case for trial."

17,654. Earl Russell: But you leave the option with the magistrate?—Yes, I think so.

17,655. It might scarcely be safe in these cases. I have known cases, and so have you, where magistrates ought to have sent cases for trial and have dealt with them too lightly?—Yes.

17,656. Mr. Micklem: Under that first clause, supposing you recovered a penalty by summary proceedings, say £50, would it be possible to indict for the same offence?—No; he would plead autrefois convict, and the way we look at things in these non-technical days, even if the offence were not technically the same but arose out of the same set of circumstances one would regard it autrefois convict.

17,657. In taking summary proceedings, could you apply for the penalty plus imprisonment?—That would be in the discretion of the court; one would not make for an application for a man to be punished in any particular way, but I think it would be well to provide that the Court of Summary Jurisdiction might both impose a pecuniary penalty and in addition imprisonment in some serious case; and there are numerous precedents to that effect in statutes.

17,658. Earl Russell: In statutes, but it is unusual to give a sentence of both fine and imprisonment in this country?—I think not.

17,659. Chairman: It would not be fine and imprisonment, it would be penalty and imprisonment—it is not quite the same thing?—I think "fine" and "penalty" are interchangeable in connection with criminal matters. You get the word "fine" under a conviction, or "penalty" under a conviction. I do not think there is any technical distinction between the two.

17,660. Recurring to Section 315 one cannot but notice, and indeed your memorandum draws attention to the curious variation in terminology through it. The language used has not the precision with which one expects a criminal offence to be described. Take the words, for example, "receives or detains" in the first group. In the next case it is "takes charge of, receives to board, or lodge or detains," and in the third case it is "receives or detains."—You revert to the first clause in the terminology there.

17,661. Expressions like "takes charge of," "receives to board or lodge or detains" I should have thought were very difficult of precise ascertainment.—Yes, and it has a very practical result. I have taken the view for what it is worth that a person who receives a lunatic, or receives a lunatic to board or lodge, or takes charge of to board or lodge, if he otherwise contravenes Section 315 has committed the offence on the day that he receives him.

17,662. And the six months' limit will apply?—Therefore the six months' limitation in all summary proceedings dates from that date.

22 May, 1925.]

Sir ARCHIBALD BODKIN, K.C.B.

17,663. The act of reception being the offence?—The act of reception, the act of taking charge of, is the offence.

17,664. That is in contradistinction to "detains" which contemplates a continuing act?—Continuing detention.

17,665. "Permits the continued residence of a lunatic or alleged lunatic," is your equivalent for receiving?—Yes. I should keep the language of the clause as it is, but I should add "or permits"; and then I thought this afternoon, on just looking at this before coming here, of a little addition "or permits or is a party to the continued residence of a lunatic or alleged lunatic." That would get over the obstruction of the six months' limitation in regard to the act of receiving, or the act of taking charge of, which perhaps one does not hear of for a year afterwards.

17,666. How does this relate itself to the voluntary patient who may be a new feature in lunacy administration? Of course he already exists in certain types of institutions; but it seems to me you might have a person who was a lunatic taken charge of, without committing any offence, if that was a voluntary person and (though a lunatic) desired to enter an institution and was there taken charge of and received. We would need, if we are introducing the system of voluntarism to take care that Section 315 did not forbid that; would not that have to be guarded?—Yes, I think it would. I am not familiar with the administration of this Act, but I know of one institution in London where frequently people who are a little on the border line voluntarily go for care and treatment and receive very considerable benefit there, but they perhaps do not go as lunatics or alleged lunatics. If they go as lunatics there must be reception orders I think.

17,667. Of course the safeguard is to be found in the words "except under the provisions of this Act," and therefore there are certain ways in which persons may be received or detained lawfully. This is striking at unlawful reception or detention, otherwise than under the provisions of this Act?—Yes, or if in the earlier part of this Act, or any new Act, there were provisions recognising voluntarism, then it would not be contrary to the provisions of the Act to take a person for care or treatment.

17,668. That is exactly what I have in mind. If you amended the body of the Act, then of course the amendment would form part of the Act and anything done would be done in pursuance of the provisions of the Act?—Yes, and, in compliance with them, would be legal.

17,669. Earl Russell: Supposing a fraudulent relation puts his brother away with a corrupt doctor, the brother being perfectly sane, you would take the view that he could not come under this section as an alleged lunatic if he held no certificate of insanity. You would go for him in the ordinary way for false imprisonment?—If it was for payment would it not be taking charge of?

17,670. But who has alleged that he is a lunatic, that is my trouble?—If he is not treated at all as a lunatic?

17,671. No?—The criminal law would probably meet that by a prosecution for imprisonment.

17,672. No doubt it would, but this particular section would not hit that?—I do not think it would.

Chairman: Section 317 would catch him;—"Any person who makes a wilful misstatement of any fact"—this would be a wilful misstatement that A.B. was of unsound mind.

17,673. Earl Russell: I am assuming there was not any petition—that he was put away?—A mere incarceration.

Earl Russell: Yes.

17,674. Sir Humphry Rolleston: But the word "alleged" there would cover the case that Lord Russell suggests?—If the wicked brother affected to deal with his brother as a lunatic, I think he might then be regarded as an alleged lunatic.

17,675. Is not that why the word "alleged" is put in?—Yes. I think it was put in because, if it were not, the subsection would only deal with lunatics as defined under the Act. The person who is being wrongfully detained might not be a lunatic as defined by the Act, but yet have been purported to have been sent there as a lunatic; therefore, they adopted the phrase "alleged lunatic" where something like the procedure of the Lunacy Act was adopted in regard to him, but wrongfully, so that while he was not a lunatic he was being incarcerated as if he were one.

17,676. Earl Russell: Of course, we have similar words in the earlier part of the Act where the relieving officer can take charge of people on his own motion when they are alleged to be lunatics?—Yes, until the justice supervenes.

17,677. Chairman: You have not any difficulty with the words "takes charge of," have you, Sir Archibald?—That again is in the present tense, and it is in conjunction with "receives." I do not know what a court would say.

17,678. "Has in charge" would rather be your idea?—Yes; that is not the expression used.

17,679. Mr. Micklem: There has not been a decision on the section, has there, to which you refer?—There have been decisions, but not on this language.

17,680. Chairman: In actual practice, have you found difficulties such as you are discussing with us?—I have found difficulties. For instance, it is contended that those words "and in the latter case shall also be liable to a penalty" put a limit upon the penalty even where the trial is on indictment.

17,681. Earl Russell: It does look like it when you say "not exceeding"?—Yes. First of all, you are met with a little difficulty in the English language. Under subsection (1) you have got five different things provided against: receiving and detaining a lunatic, for payment taking charge of, receiving to board or lodge or detaining a lunatic in an unlicensed house—and yet it goes on to say "and in the latter case." Personally one has a little difficulty in finding out which is the latter of five.

17,682. Chairman: But it is comparatively easy to proceed to tear to pieces any section of almost any Act; yet we are perhaps more concerned with whether in the actual administration of the Act these are practical difficulties which have been encountered or are merely theoretical ones which you and I can rear up out of the Act?—I have to think of them beforehand, but I do not want to conceal from the Commission that they are very often rounded off with the good sense of the tribunals of the country. There is no reason why they should not be put in such language as even an alleged lunatic can understand.

17,683. Have you ever found yourself debarred from instituting a prosecution, because of the six months' period which applies to summary prosecutions, in the case where a patient has been received unlawfully, where you would have thought it desirable to have prosecuted were it not for the phraseology of the section?—I have taken the view more than once that a case which may be a contravention of Section 315 was of such a character that it would be proper to prosecute it summarily; but with all the expense and delay and trouble involved in an indictable procedure, which was the only course possible because of the six months' limitation, did not think it was a case which would justify such expenditure.

17,684. Then you have had actual practical cases?—Yes.

17,685. Earl Russell: Cases not very serious, but cases in which there should have been prosecutions if you could have proceeded summarily?—Yes, you must have a sense of proportion, of course, and in a slight case you ought not to have to go for trial to the assizes and face a grand jury and a petty jury.

22 May, 1925.]

Sir ARCHIBALD BODKIN, K.C.B.

Chairman: I think we have your criticisms both on the structure and the terminology of Section 315.

17,686. Earl Russell: Just before we leave that, does not Sir Archibald think that there is a reason for the difference between the words "receives and detains" and the other words? Do you not think "receives and detains" were meant to be applicable to the institution?—When you come to subsection (2) you get "receives and detains" in a house which is not an institution.

17,687. Yes, you do, that is quite true.—The word "detains" is the word that ought to be there, but I am bound to say I very very rarely hear of any case of actual detention.

17,688. Chairman: That is interesting. All cases would not necessarily reach you, would they?—The Board of Control generally, I think always, send their cases to me.

17,689. Earl Russell: Do you find as a rule that these cases are cases of real wrong-doing, or that they are more technical breaches with good intentions?—I think the cases in which there is any hardship or improper treatment of patients are very very rare. Of course there are houses that you would not like to see relatives housed in, they are rather bare and scanty, I hear, sometimes, but, speaking generally, the old days of any cruelty have long since passed. You get males using the same public rooms and sitting rooms as females, and things of that sort, but generally the cases that I see are cases that might be almost called borderline cases of insanity.

17,690. Chairman: The gravamen of the crime, of the offence, under Section 315, really is detaining as a lunatic a person who is not a lunatic, applying the coercions which are legitimate in the case of an insane person to a person who is not insane. Is that case frequently brought under your notice?—No.

17,691. Have you very few cases of it?—I have been functioning for five years, and I suppose I have not heard of more than eight or ten cases in those five years—about two or three in a year. Then a year passes.

Earl Russell: The mischief I think is the secrecy—that is the mischief the Act aims at, the fact that no authority knows where these people are, or what is happening to them.

17,692. Chairman: Have you no duty of investigation? These cases reach you on report, so to speak?—I have to get satisfactory evidence together.

17,693. You do not initiate investigation until the matter is brought within your official cognisance; therefore there may be cases, of course, which do not reach you. You address yourself to your task after a case has been brought to your notice by somebody else?—Yes. Now and again the Secretary of the Board comes and sees me about a case with regard to which the Board of Control would like to hear anything I should have to say about it, before they send it to me. One works in the greatest harmony with, and receives the greatest assistance from, the Board.

17,694. Then under Section 317 one finds you mentioned by name in subsection (3)—I think you have some comment to make upon that?—I do not know why I am dragged in there; that must be more or less a modern clause.

Earl Russell: Is that the only place in the Act where you are mentioned?

17,695. Mr. Micklem: Do not some of these ex-patients come and worry you, and try to make you take prosecutions?—They do not come and worry me; my room is upstairs; there are various Rubicons to pass.

17,696. Have you not communications with them from time to time?—Oh yes.

17,697. Is not this intended to give them the right to come to you as their adviser to direct proceedings?—Under Section 317?

17,698. Yes.—No, I think if you look, it prohibits a wilful misstatement in the petition, or in some formal document. I never get those formal documents.

17,699. Do not some of the ex-patients communicate with you and suggest that false statements have been wilfully made under which they have been certified, and that some prosecution should be taken?—Yes, sometimes; very rarely. Then I should ask the Board of Control if they would be good enough to let me see their file relating to that person.

17,700. Chairman: Supposing you found that, in fact, there had been a wilful misstatement of a material fact in a petition, would it not be useful that you should be in a position to direct a prosecution to proceed?—Yes, but the section also contemplates that the Commissioners or Board of Control shall make an order for it, and they would be much more likely to hear it; of course they get the official papers and I should refer any such complaint, if I thought there was any substance in it, to them; then they would consider it and assist me by looking into the question as to whether there was in fact any false statement.

17,701. Earl Russell: Unless it is suggested they are not doing their duty, there is really no point in putting you or the Attorney-General in?—No, not in putting me in.

17,702. Chairman: Of course, again in this case, if you were instituting a prosecution for such a wilful misstatement, you would have to produce in the proceedings an order authorising the prosecution?—Yes.

17,703. Earl Russell: Would he, under this?—No; my powers are only limited to Section 317.

17,704. Chairman: That section begins, "A prosecution for a misdemeanour under this section shall not take place except by order of the Commissioners." If I were defending a person I should ask, "Would you be good enough to produce an order by the Commissioners or a direction of the Attorney-General, or a direction of the Director of Public Prosecutions?" Would I not be entitled to see that? One or other of those various acts should have preceded the prosecution?—Certainly.

17,705. Would it not be rather ridiculous for the Director of Public Prosecutions to produce the order for the prosecution which he himself was conducting?—Yes; he would be directing or misdirecting himself.

Earl Russell: I am not sure about that. There are plenty of cases where it rests with the Director whether a case should be prosecuted or not.

Chairman: The question is whether there should be a formal order.

17,706. Mr. Micklem: May it not be inserted there, because possibly you may be the only source through which one of these patients may get justice?—I really do not know. I have no objection, of course, to it at all; I do not mind it, but it seems unnecessary, because the Board of Control are so alert in looking after the complaints that come in.

17,707. Chairman: At any rate, the fact remains that you have never had to avail yourself of it?—Yes. If I am to be the protector of these possibly unfortunate people why am I not given a power under Section 315? I am just as likely to hear of some breach of that clause as any other, but it is specially assigned to me to direct prosecutions under Section 317; although when you get on to Section 325 you find that "Except as by this Act otherwise provided proceedings" may be taken by so-and-so and so-and-so, and then sub-section (2) is "Except as by this Act otherwise provided, it shall not be lawful to take such proceedings except by order of the Commissioners or of visitors having jurisdiction in the place where the offence was committed, or with the consent of the Attorney-General or Solicitor-General"—whereas when you go back to Section 317 you find that the only reference to "Except as by this Act provided" is the reference in sub-section (3) to myself.

Chairman: Then the Solicitor-General comes in in Section 325 for the first time.

Sir ARCHIBALD BODKIN, K.C.B.

17,708. Earl Russell: Does "Attorney" include "Solicitor" in the fiat?—Yes, unless the language is definite.

Chairman: Is there any real justification from the practical point of view in this curious classification of the offences against the Lunacy laws? I can imagine that the penalties to be meted out for the offences would naturally be graded according to the gravity of the offences, but these peculiar conditions precedent of prosecutions, and the modes of prosecutions seem to be unnecessarily complicated, unless there is some reason at the back of them which I have failed to detect.

17,709. Earl Russell: I suppose you will agree that it is desirable that the public at large should not be able to prosecute all these alleged breaches?—I think so, yes. A kind of veto is preserved to official persons; the Board of Control or the Attorney-General, or myself.

17,710. Chairman: I was thinking rather that the application of the veto might be on a more uniform basis?—Yes.

17,711. As regards Section 315 for example, I suppose the offence thereby constituted would be a case in which proceedings could not be taken except in conformity with Section 325?—Yes.

17,712. Therefore you would have to satisfy the conditions precedent of Section 325 before you could initiate a prosecution under Section 315?—Yes. The practical way in which it works is this: the Board get some information, perhaps the Lord Chancellor sends an expert gentleman to the establishment, who reports that A, B and C are certifiable lunatics; no reception orders, nothing. The Board hear that, send the papers to me. If I find that I can get evidence of payment, if it is for payment, and taking charge of, or other evidence of the essentials of the offence, I intimate it to the Board. Next I get an order, then I lay the information.

17,713. Can you conceive of any reason why there should be attached to prosecutions under Section 317 this speciality which you find in sub-section (3)?—No, none.

17,714. It is probably just a historical survival?—It is.

17,715. Could it be brought appropriately within the general ambit of Section 325, and would that afford sufficient protection?—Yes. I seem to be getting increasingly unpopular, but I do not mind. At the end of Section 325, if it be thought right it might read: "But this provision shall not apply to proceedings instituted by the Director of Public Prosecutions," so that that would give me the right to institute proceedings without an Order of the Board, and as my office is under the Attorney-General, for I act under his directions, it will perhaps not be necessary to trouble about it.

Sir David Drummond: Is there any fear of these penal clauses cutting at what we are all concerned with, the early treatment of mental cases, and the reduction of the number of certified patients?

Chairman: I think, Sir Archibald has met our apprehensions on that by pointing to this, that all those offences are offences alleging non-compliance with the Act. If the Act is amended by making provision for early treatment by proper methods then no one would be brought under the lash of these penal provisions because they would be acting in conformity with the law as amended. I think that is the answer to that. That would, of course, require to be made clear; the draftsman who carried our recommendations into legislation would have that plainly in view.

Earl Russell: Section 315 will have to be amended in its verbiage.

Chairman: I think so.

17,716. Mr. Micklem: Outside the Lunacy Law altogether, as Director of Public Prosecutions do you always act under the direction of the Attorney-General, or do you act on your own authority?—No, my chief is the Attorney-General, and under the Prosecution of Offences Act I act under his directions.

17,717. Cannot you act except under his fiat?—Yes, I do. I mean it is impossible with 2,500 cases a year to be dealing with the Attorney-General in each case. He has his own official duties; but it works very well. Most things are left to the Director of Public Prosecutions, and it is in his discretion if he gets a difficult case or a case of great gravity, to consult with the Attorney-General.

17,718. Earl Russell: Historically you are partly the successor of the Treasury Solicitor?—Yes; the offices were combined in the days of Sir Augustus Stephenson and Lord Desart, and then they were separated in 1908.

17,719. Mr. Micklem: I think there is an idea in the public mind that they can come to the Public Prosecutor and enlist his sympathies on their behalf, and get him to direct a prosecution in certain cases?—Yes, but I do not direct prosecutions. I have to undertake them, I am the one who initiates and carries on, but at the same time I am not the Public Prosecutor. I wish people would not get that into their heads—I am only the Director of Public Prosecutions. If I were Public Prosecutor there would be a great many more people prosecuted by me, but I am not. I am the Director of Public Prosecutions, of such prosecutions as affect the public or of a class specified under the statutory regulations under which I act.

17,720. Earl Russell: Or I suppose as the Attorney-General directs you to prosecute?—Yes.

17,721. Chairman: You are not like the holder of the office which I formerly held, who is the Public Prosecutor. The Lord Advocate for Scotland is the Public Prosecutor.—Yes; I am not claiming to be put upon a level in that respect; there is quite enough to do without that.

17,722. Again you draw attention to the curious variations in phraseology. The last word in Section 320 is very odd, the person "sued"?—Yes. There is no such thing, of course, in criminal proceedings as suing for penalties; you prosecute him and the Court imposes a punishment.

17,723. Now in Sections 317, 318 and 319 I think your view is that it would be much better if you had a uniform system and the alternative of summary proceedings?—Summary proceedings, alternative by indictment in really grave cases, or where the limit of time does not permit of summary proceedings.

17,724. Earl Russell: I should like to ask you one general question on summary proceedings. There is a great tendency nowadays to make a great many cases triable summarily?—Yes.

17,725. Do you think that may operate unfairly by not giving the accused a chance of a verdict of a jury?—I do not think so. If he should be convicted he can appeal to Quarter Sessions.

17,726. But again he does not get a jury?—No, but he gets the whole concentrated wisdom of the justices of the county at Quarter Sessions.

17,727. In London a man goes to Quarter Sessions with two magistrates sitting, one, it is true, a paid and legal Chairman?—Yes. I am very strongly in favour of Courts of Summary Jurisdiction being given even a larger jurisdiction than they have; I think the work is admirably done.

17,728. It is very convenient, and I agree on the whole it is admirably done, but in some classes of cases the accused may find himself prejudiced?—Do you not think that benches of justices now are about the most democratic tribunal one can think of? The justices are appointed from all levels of society?

17,729. I am not sure that my mind was not running on some of the old stipendiaries?—Yes. I am in favour of Courts of Summary Jurisdiction. The penalties are, after all, very small, comparatively speaking, and the thing is over very quickly, and there are large powers of mitigating imprisonment or fines, and large powers of allowing fines to be paid by instalments, and so forth; so that if Courts of Summary Jurisdiction do their duty according to the powers they possess they cannot be called harsh.

Sir ARCHIBALD BODKIN, K.C.B.

17,730. It is true the machinery is excellent, I agree?—Yes.

Chairman: And it certainly is a great advantage to have despatch.

17,731. Earl Russell: And to avoid, of course, waste of public money in an indictment?—Yes.

17,732. Chairman: I omitted to notice in passing one point you make with regard to two or more lunatics. Again I do not suppose that has arisen in practice?—I have never met with such a case, but it only occurred to me—you receive two or more. If "receive" points to the moment of reception they must simultaneously arrive; and those are not alleged lunatics in that clause.

17,733. The two lunatics must arrive together in a taxi?—Yes.

17,734. Mr. Micklem: I should like a case to come in the High Court of Appeal and have a decision on that?—Yes; I think it would give rise to some ingenious arguments.

17,735. Chairman: I think it would. Of course one does not want the law to expose itself to ridicule of that sort?—The word there ought to be "harbour"—"except that it should not be lawful for any person to harbour or detain two or more."

17,736. Then you have detected an anomaly also in Section 321?—Yes, there is an extraordinary thing. If you look at the end of Section 315 (1) "shall be guilty of a misdemeanour and in the latter case shall also be liable to a penalty,"—then you come to Section 321 "liable to a penalty," that is the summary penalty, "and shall also be guilty of a misdemeanour"; but the unfortunate thing is that every person who commits a summary offence also commits a misdemeanour. The words are meant to provide punishment on indictment if necessary.

17,737. It is a very odd thing?—Yes, and may I call the Commission's attention to the beautiful gradation of sub-clauses (1) and (2)—if you obstruct a Commissioner or a visitor then you may be fined £50, or you may also be dealt with on indictment, but if you only obstruct a person authorised by the Lord Chancellor or other person inspecting, then your obstructing him is not so serious, and you can only be fined £20, and cannot be punished on indictment? It is drawing invidious distinctions.

17,738. There is no principle in that, Sir Archibald.

Earl Russell: These certainly want looking at in the interests of Sir Archibald's Department, I think.

17,739. Chairman: Plainly. Then I think Section 327 is worth considering, because we have had references to it before in our proceedings. It was thought that the order of the justices there might apply to a reception order. That is one view that has been taken by an Association that appeared before us?—Yes, so that a person in an asylum under a reception order to which he takes exception may appeal to Quarter Sessions against it.

17,740. I took the liberty of explaining at the time the point came up that I did not think the order of the justices meant that kind of order at all. But the language is unfortunate. What do you suggest there?—Conviction. I think, if I may say so, it points to the convictions under the preceding clauses.

17,741. That is how I read it myself.—The word "order" in summary matters is a technical expression, and under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, a person is entitled to appeal against a conviction or an order.—Section 31. An order ordering the payment of money; an order in bastardy; an order for demolition; an order for 50 things—you may appeal to Quarter Sessions. That is not a criminal offence at all; that is an order, as you would get an order in the High Court.

17,742. Earl Russell: You have got this exact phrase in previous Acts, "Any person aggrieved by an order of the justices"?—Yes, but the unfortunate thing in Section 327 is that there is not in this part of the Act a single order contemplated; they are all convictions.

17,743. What is an order of the justices that a person should be bound over? Is it a conviction, or an order, or is it neither?—I am afraid you have put a very ingenious illustration. Binding a person over is not a conviction of a criminal offence; it is a precautionary measure.

17,744. Nor is it an order from which you can appeal, I think?—No, I do not think you can.

17,745. I think it depends upon their old common law jurisdiction to take sureties of the peace, like the case of Mr. Pickwick in Ipswich?—Yes, under the commission of the peace.

17,746. Chairman: It does not even say an order of the justices under "this part of the Act"?—No.

17,747. It is "under this Act"?—Yes.

17,748. That is rather calculated to mislead people, because a reception order after all under this Act is an order of the justices under this Act?—Yes, but I think I may say that there never has been an appeal against one to Quarter Sessions.

17,749. Chairman: It manifestly applies to the case of any person who has been convicted?—There is another thing about Section 327, if I may say so, which confirms your view that "order" means conviction there: "subject to the conditions and regulations of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts." Nothing under the Lunacy Act comes under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts so far as the reception order is concerned.

17,750. Then in Section 328 you also wish to draw our attention to a point, I think?—I am afraid that was not very seriously intended as a criticism, but a Secretary of State, on the Report of the Commissioners, may direct the Attorney-General; when all that the Commissioners of the Board of Control have got to do is to make an order themselves and send it to me.

17,751. It seems surplusage?—There might be cases where they would desire the approval of a Secretary of State.

17,752. Then you indicate, of course, that the Attorney-General may decline to accept the directions of the Secretary of State?—I do not know what would happen. A Cabinet crisis!

17,753. Earl Russell: Clearly a change of Government?—Probably meanwhile I might hear of it and be getting on with the case.

17,754. Chairman: While these high matters were in debate?—Yes.

17,755. It rather looks again as if that were a survival from something which had preceded; it seems to be idle as it stands?—Yes. There is only one other point: Section 331.

17,756. That has been repealed by the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, and the six months limit is fixed there. In Section 322 you have noted in passing that the word "patient" there might not be held to include voluntary patient?—Have I noted that?

17,757. It is the very last sentence of your memorandum, and I can see the point, because that is the section dealing with ill-treatment, and of course it would require to be made abundantly plain, that it would cover not only certified patients, but that ill-treatment of voluntary patients should also be an offence?—Yes, certainly.

17,758. Of course it is a different kind of offence in one sense, because if it was a voluntary patient not certified then it is really a common law assault?—Yes. I was going to say the Offences Against the Person Act practically covers all cases of ill-treatment to another human being.

17,759. But it has been deemed proper apparently to regard ill-treatment of patients in an asylum by the officials of the asylum, the nurses, and so on, as an offence by itself.

Earl Russell: That is because they are unable to take proceedings for themselves.

22 May, 1925.]

Sir ARCHIBALD BODKIN, K.C.B.

17,760. Chairman: Yes, because the person assaulted is not capable of taking the ordinary remedies?—Yes, but what is a very serious offence in ill-treating or being cruel to a patient in an asylum seems to me to be treated with remarkable leniency by the maximum penalty of £20, and the minimum of £2. The ordinary law is much more severe than that.

17,761. Earl Russell: I suppose if it were a serious ill-treatment you would have a charge under the Act of 1861?—Yes.

Chairman: Well, we are much obliged to you for drawing our attention to these anomalies in that part of the Act.

17,762. Earl Russell: There is one more question I should like to ask. Have you looked at the extraordinary distribution of penalties under Section 326? Is there any reason for retaining that odd way of distributing them? It is a most unnecessary complication, is it not?—You see, Sir, my duty ends by getting the penalty inflicted; I do not care where it goes.

Chairman: The subsequent proceedings do not interest you any further, but it does seem anomalous; the disposal of the proceeds of your labours seems to be a little odd.

17,763. Earl Russell: It is better from the point of view of the county that they should all go to the county funds?—If the Commission would like to suggest an addition to paragraph (e), "or to the Director of Public Prosecutions," I should be quite happy.

Evidence of The LORD SANDHURST and Mr. G. M. HILDYARD, K.C. (Master in Lunacy).

The LORD SANDHURST, called and examined.

17,764. Deputy-Chairman: The Commission this morning is to take evidence in connection with lunatics so found by inquisition and other persons whose cases have been judicially treated under Section 116, and Lord Sandhurst who is one of the Chancery Visitors is to give us the advantage of his experience and knowledge in these matters. Lord Sandhurst, I think you have been for many years one of the Chancery Visitors?—Since November, 1910.

17,765. And you have had a very large experience?—I have had some experience by this time.

17,766. Now I think it will be of advantage if, in the first place, we were just to turn to the sections of the Act under which the Chancery Visitors are appointed, and to deal with their duties of visitation, and so on; I think the appointment is made under Section 163?—I have not got the section before me, but I take it from you.

17,767. There are both medical and legal Visitors?—There are two medical and one legal Visitor.

17,768. There is no provision made under the Act confining it to three?—Well, there is no power to appoint more than three that I am aware of.

17,769. At all events only three have been appointed?—Only three have been appointed and, so far as I am aware, there is only power to appoint three.

17,770. It may be so under the Rules, but I do not think the Acts says anything about it. Section 163 says "There shall continue to be medical and legal Visitors of lunatics so found by inquisition, and they are in this Act referred to as the Chancery

The LORD SANDHURST.

Visitors"?—Yes. That appears to continue what was the practice before. There were two medical Visitors and one legal Visitor before this Act was passed and the words are "shall continue to be."

17,771. I see Section 167 says: "The Chancery Visitors and the Masters or so many of them, not being less than three in number, as may from time to time be able, consistently with the discharge of their other duties to attend, shall from time to time form themselves into a board for their mutual guidance"?—Three is only a quorum.

17,772. A quorum of the board?—Yes.

17,773. It does not limit the number of Masters and Visitors to be appointed?—No.

17,774. As a matter of fact there is only one Master now, Mr. Hildyard?—Yes, and I think that was done under an Act of Parliament. There were two Masters down to the death of Sir David Brynmor Jones; and pursuant to a recommendation of the Royal Commission on the Civil Service, the staff was reduced to one Master, and certainly an Act of Parliament was required, and an assistant Master was appointed to exercise the powers practically of a Master.

17,775. Mr. Theobald I think was the first Master?—Mr. Theobald was the first single Master.

17,776. Then the provisions for visitation are contained in Sections 183 to 186?—Yes, and there is a provision under the Rules of Lunacy, rule 5 of the 1893 Rules.

17,777. I am afraid I have not got a copy of those Rules. What is the rule?—That is a rule which enables the Master to direct a visit in any case in which an application for an order appointing a receiver is pending, or in which an order has been made under Section 116.

17,778. And he appoints one of the Chancery Visitors for that purpose?—Yes, he appoints the Visitors in terms.

17,779. I observe that in the Act, Section 183, the visitation is of lunatics so found?—I think the correct interpretation is that the whole of that group of sections applies only to lunatics so found.

17,780. Subject to Section 184. It says "The Chancery Visitors shall also visit such persons alleged to be lunatics"?—I think that relates to persons with regard to whom an inquisition is pending or has been applied for; I think that is the strict interpretation of it.

17,781. It would seem that it must apply strictly to that. It cannot mean alleged to be lunatics at large, so to speak?—No. It might mean persons alleged to be lunatics with regard to whom either an application has been made or has been granted for a reception order—it might mean that.

17,782. Would not that be interfering rather with the other jurisdiction? Would not that be going outside the Lord Chancellor's special jurisdiction?—I agree with you. I do not think that the section properly interpreted does apply to lunatics other than lunatics so found, or persons with regard to whom an inquisition is pending, but it is capable of interpretation. I mean one sees so many cases, or one used to when the title was rather different from what it is now; "re so-and-so, a lunatic not so found by inquisition."

17,783. That would appear in the ordinary Chancery pleadings, of course?—Yes.

17,784. We have heard the phrase once or twice before, and we have not quite understood what it was intended to mean; but in some places in the Act it might mean persons who had been certified as lunatics who were really sane?—That may be so in some of the cases, yes. It certainly might apply to a person with regard to whom a reception order was being asked for; but I think, having regard to the whole of the group of sections, that here they are really speaking of inquisition cases.

17,785. If you please. I observe in Section 185 special reports have to be made in certain cases and particularly where the Visitor is unable to discover the residence of the lunatic?—Yes.

17,786. Curiously enough they do not insert there the "lunatic or person alleged to be a lunatic"?—No. It has only occurred to me once to make a report to the Lord Chancellor in a case of that sort, and that was a case not of a person so found by inquisition; that was a lady who had been certified, who had been discharged, and with regard to whom the order appointing the receiver was in force. It was a peculiar case.

17,787. Would your visitation be confined to persons so found, or in respect of whom inquisition proceedings were pending, or in respect of whom some judicial proceedings had been taken under Section 116?—Well, I suppose strictly speaking that would be so, but I think it has happened that when the Lord Chancellor has received a letter from a patient which has troubled him he has asked one of his Chancery Visitors to go and visit, although there might not be any proceedings for administration of the property.

17,788. I am referred to Section 205 which perhaps would cover that, "The Lord Chancellor in the case of a lunatic so found by inquisition, and the Lord Chancellor or a Secretary of State in any other case, may at any time, by an order in writing under the hand of the Lord Chancellor, or the Secretary of State, as the case may be, directed to the Commissioners or any of them, or to any other person, require the persons or person to whom the order is directed to visit and examine a lunatic or alleged lunatic"?—He certainly has power under that section.

17,789. Those are special visits outside what one may call inquisition visits?—Yes.

17,790. Now with regard to lunatics so found you have to pay two visits in every year?—Two visits in every year in every case.

17,791. And I suppose your visit is connected not only with the person of the lunatic so found, but with his property, is it?—It is so far connected with his property—I think there is a direction in the Act that we are to be informed of the amount of income and the amount of expenditure; and of course when we visit the patient, to consider the comfort and the manner in which he is maintained, we have to do it with relation to his income; so we require to know something about his property; and we may make recommendations about his property. We may, for instance, recommend that a portion of his capital should be sold and applied for his benefit, or even that his capital might be more profitably invested, that a house might be sold and the proceeds invested in some other form.

17,792. I suppose the main part of your duty in connection with these persons is to ascertain what their bodily and mental condition is, and how far they are treated with care and in comfort?—Yes; those are our duties with regard to them.

17,793. Now you have given us in the appendix of your précis some useful figures which indicate the number of cases which come under, or may come under, your jurisdiction. I think you say in your précis the number of lunatics so found at the present moment is only about 200?—Yes, it is 219.

17,794. But in addition to that you have your cases where a receiver has been applied for; and the cases on the Master's books approximately number 6,100?—That is information we derive from the Master's office.

17,795. And in all those cases there is a possibility of your being asked to visit?—There is.

17,796. As a matter of fact the number of cases on the Visitors' books is 1,100?—Yes; that is the figure our Secretary has ascertained.

17,797. Of these, 219 are inquisition cases; 500 are cases under Section 116, subsection (d) which are not detained. In many of those cases it would be where the person is of weak mind?—In a good many cases

25 May, 1925.]

The LORD SANDHURST.

they are weakminded persons. I think I should say the vast majority are really cases of infirmity arising from old age.

17,798. And they are cases where the relatives, I suppose, have taken proceedings on the footing that the person was unable himself to manage his affairs?—Yes.

17,799. Then 300 are cases in institutions for the insane?—Yes.

17,800. And the balance would be cases under Section 116 (c) or (c)?—I do not know; I have not enquired about it. I do not know whether those 300 cases include or do not include the inquisition cases who are detained in asylums.

17,801. Now I was going to ask that question, Lord Sandhurst. Where you have an inquisition case sent to an asylum, or sent to a licensed house, are those patients subject to the enquiries which are directed in ordinary cases as well as to your visitations?—The Commissioners certainly regard them as patients to see. They are supposed to see every patient in an asylum.

17,802. Yes, but you see special provision is made under the Act for their visitation by other persons as well?—Yes.

17,803. Do they get, so to speak, a double set of visitations?—Inquisition cases do, yes. There was one qualification I ought to have made; I thought perhaps you would come to it in your next question. When I said that every inquisition patient had to be visited twice, every patient so found by inquisition who is in private care is expected to be visited four times in a year for at least two years after the date of the inquisition.

17,804. Is that merely a matter of practice?—No, that is in the Act of Parliament. It is the third subsection of Section 183, "Every lunatic resident in a private house shall, during the two years next following inquisition, be visited at least four times in every year." I merely call attention to that because inquisition cases are so rare now that we have not got more than two or three of what we might call "the four visit" cases in our list now.

17,805. A lunatic resident in a private house would not have the advantage of other visitation?—He does not have the advantage of visitation by anybody else.

17,806. Then I observe in your précis you say that special visits by request in the year from April 1924 to 1925 numbered 234. That means 234 outside those on your list?—Yes.

17,807. Visits paid each year number about 1,850—would a very large proportion of those visits fall to you, Lord Sandhurst?—They are about evenly divided. Our practice is to divide the country into three divisions, the north, the west, and what we call the home district. The home district, I think even now has much the larger number of cases, though the distances are not so great, and it tends to increase. We have been steadily reducing the size of the home district at the expense of the others in order to try and keep the work even, but so far as the list cases go one may say one visits one-third of the cases. There are a good many special visits which are required to be paid by the medical Visitors where there is any difficult medical question. Until quite recently it used to be the practice for all recovery cases—and when I say recovery cases, I mean cases in which the question was whether the patient was fit to manage his own affairs—should be visited by a medical Visitor; but it was found in practice that the medical Visitors really had not time to take all those cases, so that for the last year or two a good many have fallen to me, and I have exercised a certain discretion. If it appeared to me upon the face of that case that it was a case in which there was some conflict of medical opinion, or something of that sort, I should suggest they should go to a medical Visitor. But still a good many of them are pretty simple; a layman can deal with them.

17,808. I see that the Rules authorise you to visit in any cases coming under the Master's jurisdiction and require you to visit where a receiver has been appointed, but, on medical grounds, it has not been thought prudent to serve the person visited with notice of the proceedings?—That, I think, is Rule 7 of 1919.

17,809. Yes. I have not got a copy of either of those sets of Rules, but they are dealing mainly, are they not, with the property of lunatics?—They are dealing with the property, but they are also dealing with the mode in which the patient is maintained, and with the propriety of an order having been made without the patient having been served with a copy of the summons. It not infrequently happens where a patient is in an asylum that the medical officer is of opinion that he should not take the responsibility of serving a patient with a summons; he says it will disturb his mind; and sometimes the Master asks the medical Visitor to go and enquire into it, and to form his opinion about it. But the Rule requires that, where in any case an order is made without service of summons, he should be visited at an early date by a Chancery Visitor. That is to see that there has been no abuse of the process.

17,810. I suppose the Master would often ask you to visit in order to see whether they should be served with notice of proceedings or not?—It was done several times, I think, until this Rule was passed.

17,811. In face of this Rule it did not really so much matter whether the order was made or not made?—No; it is analogous to the case of a patient who has not seen a magistrate when he is certified; he is entitled to see a magistrate within a few days after a reception order.

17,812. Here you have got a definite rule that they shall be seen?—Yes. In the other case there is an Act of Parliament, of course.

17,813. Is there not rather a multiplicity of the Rules in Lunacy?—They are a little difficult to find certainly. I think it would be truer to say they require codification.

17,814. There must be at least half a dozen different sets of Rules?—I think there are certainly three or four. It was only the other day I was giving evidence in Court, and I was asked under what authority the Master directed a visit, and Counsel in the case had not been able to find this rule—Rule 5 of 1893. They are difficult to find.

17,815. Could you give the Commission shortly the general nature of the ordinary inquiries which you make when you visit these patients?—Yes. A good deal depends upon whether the patient is a new case, or an old case. If it is a new case one invariably pays a surprise visit. Then you ask for the patient. I generally ask something about the patient before I see him; I want to hear what his idiosyncrasies are, if I can. Sometimes I am shown straight into a room where the patients are, and you cannot do that; but it facilitates matters if you can learn something about the patient before you see him. Then one tries to establish friendly relations with him, find out whether he has got any tastes, or whether he can deal for instance with a little pocket money, whether he likes music, whether he likes going for drives, and so on, and then one looks at the premises, one goes and sees his room, and tries to find out whether things are clean, and so forth. In fact, one directs one's attention to everything one can think of which concerns his comfort and wellbeing. I generally find out what is spent upon him; what they do with his money, and how much is paid for his maintenance. Very often you find that relations are, well, a little bit near in dealing with the person with whom the patient is lodging, for instance.

17,816. Is there any authority of any kind which could step in? Supposing the relative of one of these patients is really not paying sufficient or providing proper accommodation, is there any method of stepping in?—Of course, in the case of an inquisition patient it is very easily done. In point of fact within the limits of the maintenance allowance the committee of the person is expected to comply with the directions of the

The LORD SANDHURST.

Visitors; and if they do not comply with the directions of the Visitors, we go to the Master and ask him either to put pressure upon the committee, or, if necessary, to remove the committee and appoint somebody else. With regard to patients under sub-section (d), that is to say, patients who are neither certified nor so found, the Master is in direct relation with the only person who really has any control, and that is the receiver, and he gives directions to the receiver. The receiver generally carries them out, but considerable difficulties do arise with some of the sub-section (d) cases, because it is very difficult to keep them in control without some control of the person. I have known one or two cases in which I really felt that the protection of a receivership order was being used to defeat creditors. I mean, the patient was going about apparently sane, ordering goods, and that sort of thing. Then the question arises, how are they going to be paid for? The patient has not got the means, unless he is supplied with the money, and the receiver is not liable. There was one notorious case in which the patient's income was derived from a settlement under which if he purported to charge his interest he was deprived of the benefit of the settlement. He did purport to charge his interest, executed a deed; thereupon the question arose whether he had deprived himself of his interest under the settlement. Mr. Justice Byrne tried the case, and he held that the position was exactly the same as if the patient had been so found by inquisition, and that the settlement was not invalidated.

17,817. I do not quite follow that. Was that on the footing that—?—That a receiver had been appointed.

17,818. Yes, but was that on the footing that he was not mentally in a position to anticipate his income?—No, it was merely that the receiver having been appointed as I remember the case—any dealing with his property was a nullity.

17,819. And you have found, have you, that there are more of these cases?—I have found that. I think I remember one other case in which it seemed to me that unfair advantage was being taken of the position of the patient in having a receiver appointed.

17,820. You rather intimate that in consequence of recent decisions, particularly the Harnett case, medical men have been shy of signing certificates, and accordingly more cases have come under sub-section (d)?—They certainly did receive a considerable shock in the Harnett case. I have met one or two medical men who have said that they are refusing altogether to certify patients. Probably the recent decision in the House of Lords will help to settle things again.

17,821. Still you think that recently there have been more cases under sub-section (d) of Section 116 by reason of the decision?—I was told that; an opinion was given to me in the office. It had not occurred to me myself, but that was an opinion which was offered to me in the office.

17,822. Now, Lord Sandhurst, in addition to those cases which you have told us of, you also visit at the Master's request certain persons who have been discharged, but who are not sufficiently recovered to be entrusted with the management of their affairs?—Yes; there are a good many.

17,823. I suppose those are all cases where there has been an order appointing a receiver?—There has been an order appointing a receiver on the ground that they were lawfully detained; they were discharged relieved in most cases, sometimes I daresay they might have been discharged as recovered, but for some reason, generally because some mental infirmity remains, or perhaps some anxiety not to be worried by their affairs, some of them would rather have their affairs administered by the Court. A good many are really not much better than when they left the asylum.

17,824. Those patients may give useful information as to the treatment they have had in these different institutions?—Yes, those patients to whom I have been sent to enquire whether they should be restored to the management of their affairs. I always take the opportunity if I can of asking a patient who has been in an asylum what he could tell me about it.

17,825. Now, generally speaking, what has been the information furnished to you?—Speaking generally, with persons of that class one finds them grateful for the care that has been taken of them. It is very common to hear a complaint of a certain amount of roughness and routine, coarse food, and unappetising meals, and that sort of thing.

17,826. Those are complaints made rather by the patients that you visit at the institution?—No, I have met with that with patients who have come out; they tell me, of course, that it is not like being at home.

17,827. Have you had any instances of serious complaints by persons who have come out?—No, I do not think I can recall any cases. Well, yes, I did meet with a case the other day; it had occurred a long time ago, and I have not had any real opportunity of enquiring into it; but the patient, I think, had had his wrist either dislocated or broken by a blow. It was a considerable number of years ago; I visited this patient for the first time (he was one of these people who had been discharged) and he was disposed to make very great allowances. He said that he was hanging on to a bed or something of that sort, and they could not detach his hand and they gave him a blow which, I think he said, broke his wrist—it either broke it or dislocated it; and I must say that gave me rather a shock. It was the first case of the kind I had really met with.

17,828. But had you not an opportunity of making further enquiry about it?—It is a thing that happened 19 or 20 years ago, and I know that the medical superintendent of the asylum, who was then medical superintendent, is dead.

17,829. Mr. Snell: Did the case seem to you, my Lord, to be established?—He had an injured wrist; he could not use his wrist properly, it had never been properly set. Of course that might not necessarily be so, I can only tell you what the patient told me; and that is the only case I can remember of a patient who made what I should call a serious complaint of that sort after his discharge.

17,830. Deputy-Chairman: Most of your visits, of course, are made in private houses?—Yes, the majority of the visits are in private houses.

17,831. That is because most of the patients are people of considerable means, and are sent to private houses rather than to an institution?—They are mostly people with some means, but a good many are in private houses, I think—well, I was going to say because they cannot afford the rates that would have to be paid as a private patient in an institution. I mean that it very often is the case that a patient is maintained at home or with friends for less than he could be maintained for at an institution as a private patient.

17,832. But where a patient is at home and is looked after at home do you visit him there? Have you any jurisdiction?—Certainly we have if their property is administered under sub-section (d), or they may be inquisition patients of course who live at home. The question you ask would apply rather to the Commissioners. A patient under sub-section (d) who is living at home is not under the protection of the Commissioners; the Board of Control have nothing to do with him; it is not until a patient is certified that the Board of Control come in unless they suspect that there has been a breach of the law.

17,833. Under Section 116 the Master has no jurisdiction with regard to the person, has he, except that he can direct the visits?—He has no jurisdiction over the person.

17,834. He cannot say where he is to live?—No, but he can recommend where he is to live, and of course he can put considerable pressure—

17,835. Financial pressure that is?—Financial pressure—upon the receiver. Of course if he thinks that it is a case which ought to be certified, if he is advised that the position is such that the law has been broken, or even that detention in an asylum would offer the best chance of cure, he can put considerable pressure upon a receiver to have the patient certified.

25 May, 1925.]

The LORD SANDHURST.

17,836. Do you mean, to get the receiver to present the petition in that case?—Yes.

17,837. Against the wish of the family would that be, or might it be?—The receiver generally is a member of the family, but it might be against the wish of the family. I mean one does meet with cases in which the family are rather anxious to hush things up; there is such a dread of what people call the stigma of an asylum.

17,838. But is it the case that the receiver from time to time does make application by petition?—Certainly; the Official Solicitor has done so.

17,839. Would not that be only in the case either of infants or persons who have no friends, so to speak—nobody who could represent them?—You see, I suppose in the majority of cases the receiver is a friend—I mean he is the person who naturally would present—he has applied for the receivership order, he has been appointed receiver; or some other relative has applied for a receivership order and either suggested or acquiesced in the appointment of some other near relative, so that he would naturally be the person who would file the petition. As I think I say in my précis, there are a certain number of cases in which orders have been made under subsection (d) in which the patient really is insane. I remember one case in which (I think he was afterwards certified) the patient hardly seemed safe.

17,840. Now with regard to the complaints which are made to you, Lord Sandhurst, on your visits, may we just take them a little in order. The first is as to the unappetising character and monotony of the food?—Yes.

17,841. That is a fairly frequent complaint which is made?—Yes.

17,842. What has been your own experience as to the facts there; have you considered that question in the institutions and in the homes?—In institutions, I have been into the kitchens and seen the meals that were about to be served, and I have seen the patients having their meals.

17,843. And what should you say on the whole of the complaints made?—I should say that the meals are as good as one can expect in an institution of that character. A very large number of patients have to be provided with meals, and there must be a certain amount of routine about it.

17,844. Of course, the Commission have seen for themselves in a good many of these places, and as far as my own small experience goes I have been rather struck with the excellence of the provision which is made. No doubt it becomes monotonous, but it seemed good in every case that I have seen?—Yes, but not always dainty I should say. I remember not so long ago considering the case of a patient who had some independent means. He was in one of the public asylums as a private patient, and when I went there he was having his tea, and the bread and butter was cut very thick. It was not the sort of thing that one would suppose he had been accustomed to when he was living at home.

17,845. Supposing you on your visitations come to the conclusion that there is reasonable fault to be found, do you make representations to the institution, or do you simply report to the Lord Chancellor?—I report to the Master. I do not think I could say that I ever have been able to report that there was any complaint to be made of an institution which could lead to the Master interfering.

17,846. No, but sometimes a suggestion will go a longish way?—One suggests rather that something more may be done for a particular patient—I mean that he may have some extra allowance.

17,847. You would make that suggestion to the medical superintendent?—No, I should make that to the Master, and the Master would convey it to the medical superintendent. I should previously ask the medical superintendent whether it could be done within the scope of his practice and facilities that he is able to provide.

17,848. Sir David Drummond: Does the superintendent see Lord Sandhurst's report?—No, he would not see my report.

17,849. So that if nothing arose out of your report he would not know anything about it?—He would probably know nothing about it until he heard from the receiver. I should consult him probably before making any report. I always do ask him: "Is there anything more we can do for this patient?"—and so on. "What about his diet? Can you improve his diet at all, or anything of that sort?" and he says "Oh yes, if I could have so much a week or so much a quarter, I can give him some advantages." Then I pass that on to the Master, the Master communicates with the receiver, and it goes through.

17,850. He pretty well gathers the tenor of your report?—Yes. I do not know that I could do my work without a good deal of help from the medical superintendents.

17,851. Deputy Chairman: Have you found that they are usually ready to meet your suggestions?—Very.

17,852. Does that apply to the case of patients in private houses where sometimes there is no medical man?—I never met with any difficulty; I do not think I have ever met with any difficulty in getting suggestions carried out.

17,853. There is one question I meant to have put to you before, but perhaps it is rather one that ought to be put to the Master. There is frequent reference to the Judge in Lunacy?—Yes.

17,854. That covers, does it not, the Lord Chancellor and the Lords Justices?—I think the Judge in Lunacy now covers the Master. I have often heard Sir Henry Theobald say—in fact it is so stated in his book—that the Master is now the Judge in Lunacy.

17,855. One of the orders provides that, as far as management and administration is concerned?—Yes; I think the only jurisdiction of the Judge in Lunacy which the Master cannot exercise is the granting of a "supersedeas." I think that has to be directed by the Lord Justice still.

17,856. He cannot direct an inquisition, can he?—He can direct a petition for an inquisition.

17,857. I thought the application had to be made to the Lords Justices of Appeal?—That is so.

17,858. Then you get complaints associated with noisy, offensive and insane patients—that is a question of classification, of course?—That is a question of classification.

17,859. One would realise that those complaints are well founded?—They are very often well founded, and the first people to admit them are some of the medical superintendents. I mean they lament that they cannot classify their patients more, they have not got the means. I think that was one of the complaints which Mr. Harnett most commonly made, and it is a very common complaint.

17,860. What is the remedy—a larger expenditure of money?—I do not think there is any remedy except further expenditure of money. Of course in the most modern asylums—there is one near Basingstoke, and the asylum at Colchester—they have a number of different buildings, so that they have better facilities for classifying patients than they have in the old ones.

17,861. You refer to the Hampshire Asylum at Basingstoke, which is one of the modern ones?—Yes; I think that is the most modern of all. In fact, they have got a special building for general paralytics.

17,862. Is that on the villa system?—It is on the villa system—at least it is what I believe they call the villa system. They have a special villa for general paralytics which they could not fill because they had not got enough general paralytics, and they were using it for some other purpose.

The LORD SANDHURST.

17,863. Then you get complaints of roughness and bullying on the part of the staff. I suppose there you make enquiry when you get a complaint of that kind?—I do, yes.

17,864. Are you able to carry that enquiry through. Do you find you get assistance from the medical superintendents?—They will help you fast enough certainly. Of course there is great difficulty; I always feel there is a great difficulty in satisfying oneself as to whether there is anything in a complaint of that sort or not. Many patients no doubt do require a certain amount of physical force to control them. Again there are a good many patients who are themselves aggressive. Now I was visiting an old gentleman the other day, quite a senile case in an asylum; he was not always in bed. He was in bed when I saw him, and they told me he required a great deal of observation, because he was rather impulsive, liable to hit out, and if he was to hit out some other patient would probably hurt him. It is very difficult to satisfy oneself that there has been serious ground in a complaint of that description; at the same time one is almost disposed to wonder whether there is not possibility of ground for complaint.

17,865. I suppose human nature being what it is, it is inconceivable from time to time that a nurse may not exercise quite sufficient patience to govern his or her temper?—That is so, I think. Of course they have great opportunities, and very often great provocation.

17,866. Sir Ernest Hiley: Might we know what Lord Sandhurst does when he gets one of these complaints made to him?—I should ask the nurse or the superintendent.

17,867. Do you investigate it yourself?—As far as I can; I talk to the nurses, and then I talk to the medical superintendent about it, and I am generally satisfied that there really is nothing that one can lay hold of.

17,868. Miss Symons: Do you ask other patients about it in any case where the patients suggest that they might know?—I think I have done so.

17,869. Deputy-Chairman: Supposing you were not satisfied quite with the result of your own investigation, should you make a report and could the Master or somebody else direct a formal enquiry?—The only persons who could direct a formal enquiry would be the Commissioners, and if I thought that there were serious cause to suppose that there was anything like ill-treatment of patients I should report to the Master, and the Master would probably communicate my report to the Commissioners. That would be the course that I should probably suggest.

17,870. But that would apply, would it, in the case of ordinary institutions where the Board of Control has jurisdiction?—Yes.

17,871. It would not apply to your cases in private care?—No, not to uncertified cases.

17,872. Supposing any of those cases came before you?—Then one would have to enquire into it to the best of one's ability and one would suggest the removal of the patient to some other care.

17,873. Sir Ernest Hiley: In your 15 years' experience, how many times have you had to report a case of a complaint of ill-treatment or bullying, or anything of that sort?—Well, I do not know that I could answer that question, but it would be very seldom. I mean, when I have reported I have reported my conclusion upon it, which I think I may say has always been that on the best enquiry I could make there was no serious foundation for the complaint.

17,874. Mr. Snell: The only source of complaint, Lord Sandhurst, would tend to be from the patient himself, the aggrieved person?—Yes.

17,875. It is never reported to you by other patients that another patient has been assaulted or harshly treated?—I should not like to say that, but I do not think it has ever been reported to me on evidence—I mean one has known a patient who has reported that sort of thing.

17,876. Sir David Drummond: Are you concerned with what I call the therapeutic treatment of the patients at all?—Very little.

17,877. Do you enquire into the treatment, whether the patient is allowed out, whether he has got occupation?—Yes I enquire into that. I do not consider that I am in a position to advise, but I enquire very much as to their occupation and their opportunities for going out, and that kind of thing. I mean, sometimes one does enquire, for instance, whether a patient has been treated with thyroid extract, or whether a general paralytic has had any special treatment, and so on, but not in the way of advice, only in the way of enquiry.

17,878. Generally speaking, what determines whether the Visitor would be a legal or a medical Visitor?—It is only accident in a way. The routine work we do in rotation. That is to say, I have got the home district this year; next year I shall have the northern district, and the medical Visitor will have the home district. If there is a medical question, and the Master particularly asks for a medical Visitor, he goes and visits. Sometimes it happens that the Master asks for a legal Visitor to visit when he wants something enquired into, but in the ordinary course we work in rotation.

17,879. Deputy-Chairman: I am not quite sure that I did not mislead you just now in a question as to whether the Commissioners could interfere in the case of a private patient. I think under the Act probably they could visit a private patient in an institution?—Yes, certainly anybody in an institution.

17,880. And in single care too?—I am not certain that they can. They certainly have no jurisdiction to visit a patient under subsection (d) unless they suspect a breach of the law or cruelty, or something of that sort.

17,881. But after inquisition?—After inquisition, I am not aware that they have any power to visit an inquisition patient in a private house. They may have it. As a matter of practice I do not think they ever do it.

17,882. You are suggesting they could only do it where there had been certification and not a finding on inquisition?—Yes, that is what I believe to be the case.

17,883. Then the next complaint which is constantly made to you is with regard to alleged inattention on the part of the medical superintendent?—Yes.

17,884. That again appears to be rather a common form of complaint?—Yes. I have met with that in large institutions, and in perhaps one small institution. In a large institution it usually amounts to this that they do not see the medical superintendent and they are not content really with the assistant medical officer who is in charge of the ward in which they are.

17,885. Have you yourself formed any definite view as to the duties which the medical superintendent should have to undertake in these large hospitals; whether he should be responsible for the whole administration indoors and outdoors, or whether he should confine his attention rather to the medical side?—For what it is worth my opinion favours his confining his work to the medical side. I think it is a misfortune that a skilled alienist should have to devote a great and probably the greater part of his time to administrative details.

17,886. You have considered the question pretty carefully in connection with many of these institutions?—I have considered it, and I have discussed it with medical officers. I am not sure that they all agree with me.

17,887. No, there seems to be a very great difference of opinion?—I think some of them would prefer to have the whole administration under their own hands. I suppose they think there would be a loss of control.

25 May, 1925.]

The LORD SANDHURST.

17,888. And a sort of rival jurisdiction in some cases?—Yes.

17,889. There might be considerable friction between the head of the administrative department and the head of the medical department?—As far as I know it answers very well in some of the military hospitals.

17,890. I was going to ask you whether there were cases in which administration is separated in any of these institutions?—The only institution I can call to my mind has nothing to do with lunacy. It is the facial hospital in Sidcup in Kent where the Commandant is a layman. He happens to be a friend of mine, so that I know about it. Of course he has a medical staff who attend to all the medical work; and there the system appears to work very well.

17,891. It has never been tried, has it, in any mental hospital?—I am not aware that it has ever been tried in a mental hospital. Of course in the large mental hospitals the medical superintendent delegates a good deal to the steward.

17,892. No doubt some medical superintendents could delegate very much better than others?—Yes.

17,893. And many of them would have a natural leaning towards administrative work; others, on the other hand, would have a very strong dislike to it, and they would manage somehow or other to get it into other hands under their control?—Yes.

17,894. It would depend very much upon the personality of the medical superintendent?—No doubt.

17,895. Do you think there is any good ground of complaint that there is not sufficient medical superintendence by the assistant medical officers?—No, I do not think so; they seem to me to be always about the wards.

17,896. I suppose a great many of the patients would have a sort of idea that their case was of great importance, and that the medical superintendent should be constantly seeing them?—That is very common indeed.

17,897. Then you come on to the final complaint which is more or less universal, the complaint of detention?—I should like to say that I am not quite satisfied sometimes as to the amount of medical supervision in private institutions. You do find cases in which a medical officer may have a general practice, and is the proprietor of a private institution.

17,898. Are you thinking of the licensed houses?—Yes, licensed houses. Of course there is a provision that no licensed house with a licence for a number exceeding 50, I think, may be without a resident medical officer; but I am not sure if it would not be a good thing if there were some provision in the case of a private institution above a certain number that it should have a medical officer in constant attendance.

17,899. Is there some section of the Act that covers that, Lord Sandhurst?—There is a section of the Act which requires that there shall be a resident medical man in the case of a licensed house licensed for a certain number of the patients.

17,900. "In every house licensed for 100 patients or more there shall be resident as the manager and medical officer thereof a medical practitioner. Every house licensed for less than 100 or more than 50 patients shall be visited daily by a medical practitioner"?—Yes.

17,901. That is Section 228?—Yes.

17,902. "Every house licensed for less than 50 patients (in case the house is not kept by or has not a resident medical practitioner) shall be visited twice a week by a medical practitioner." That was the section probably that you were referring to?—Yes, that is the section I was thinking of. I do not know whether there is any means of enforcing it by law, but it has struck me. I am thinking of one particular asylum where the complaint has been made to me so often, both by people in the asylum and people who have left it, that they do not see enough of the medical officer.

17,903. Was that an asylum where there was a resident medical officer?—Yes, and I have felt that there must be something in it. It is rather difficult to see what the remedy is.

17,904. Mr. Snell: Have you found that that particular medical officer against whom the complaint has been made has had many administrative duties to do?—No; I think he has things to do outside.

17,905. Outside the institution?—Yes, outside the institution.

17,906. Deputy-Chairman: Lord Russell calls my attention to sub-section 4 of Section 228. "The visitors of any licensed house may direct that such house, and the Commissioners may direct that any licensed house shall be visited by a medical practitioner at any time or times, not being oftener than once a day"—instead of twice a week?—Yes.

17,907. But those visitors would be the justices' visitors of course?—They would.

17,908. And the Commissioners would act upon a suggestion by you, or they might act.

Earl Russell: No, I do not think so; I think the Commissioners have a free hand under that surely.

17,909. Deputy-Chairman: They have a free hand but I meant if Lord Sandhurst in one of his visits came to the conclusion that there was not sufficient attention by the medical officer he might draw the Commissioners' attention to the fact?—The trouble arises really from the idiosyncrasy of the medical officer. He may go through the wards and visit the patients, but then again he may not give the patients the opportunities that they like and even that they perhaps ought to have of talking to him.

17,910. Earl Russell: You mean it may be perfunctory?—It may very easily be perfunctory.

17,911. Mr. Snell: Does sub-section 4 mean an additional medical practitioner?—An independent medical practitioner.

Deputy-Chairman: I should have thought not. The words used in each of the sections are "a medical practitioner." It might mean the same or another one.

17,912. Mr. Snell: One would assume that there would be a regular medical practitioner attached to the place and that this would be someone additional appointed for the purposes of checking?—That appears to be supplementary really to sub-section 3 which requires a visit twice a week, but the Commissioners may direct more frequent visits.

17,913. Deputy-Chairman: Yes. I think, Mr. Snell, that the words are perfectly general; it might be the same medical practitioner or another one. (To the Witness). Have you had reason to call the attention of the medical practitioner in any case to slackness in seeing the patients or to complaints made by them?—I think in this particular case I have called attention to it.

17,914. Sir Ernest Hiley: What has happened then, Lord Sandhurst?—The answer has been "Oh, but there is Doctor so and so; when I am not here he sees the patients." I think that has been the sort of answer. In the particular case I think the medical superintendent's wife was really better known to the patients than the medical superintendent himself; and as I say there is very little one can do to prevent the work being done in a perfunctory manner except not advise people to send their friends there.

17,915. Deputy-Chairman: You are up against the personal equation again?—Yes.

17,916. Now the final complaint which has been constantly made to you is the one of wrongful detention?—Yes.

17,917. That is extremely common, so common that it might be called almost universal?—No, I should not say it was almost universal. The vast majority of patients in asylums, of course, are really chronic cases of dementia and they live a perfectly contented, more or less, animal life. Then again there is a considerable number of patients, particularly of the melancholic type, who may suffer from recurrent attacks, or are generally permanently in a melancholic condition, and they feel safer in an asylum than they do anywhere else; they make no complaint. The patients who most frequently complain of detention are patients suffering from mania, either chronic or recurrent mania—they do not feel any sense of ill-being at all, and think they are perfectly entitled to be at large. But the patient who raises the most difficult questions is the paranoiac, the man who has some delusion, some fixed series of delusions, generally of persecution, which render him potentially unsafe to be at large, and whose mind remains perfectly clear to the end of his life probably; he does not sink into dementia except with regard to this one series of delusions; nothing will satisfy him that his beliefs are not wellfounded, and of course nothing will satisfy him that he is not a proper member of society to be at large. It becomes very difficult in those cases, and it must be very difficult to determine whether his delusions are such that they really ought to entail his detention in an asylum, or whether he ought to be at large. I may mention a particular case. I went to see a gentleman who had been detained in Camberwell House. I had great difficulty in finding him; my colleague had failed to find him altogether. On making enquiries I found a gentleman in the house who more or less answered the description, and I had an interview with him, and he told me that he knew the gentleman I was seeking for, that he was not the gentleman himself. Then I got him to tell me something about him, and I said, "Are these comfortable lodgings that you have got here?" "Oh yes," he said, "the lodgings are all right, but they do peculiar things." I said "What is it that they do?" "Oh," he said, "they pump electricity into you." Then, of course, I found I had got hold of my man. He has escaped from Camberwell House, and he has been at large now for a considerable number of years doing no harm to anybody, living rather a restless life because when he has been for a couple of months in a lodging he believes he is subjected to this persecution, and moves on to another, but he has certainly justified his escape. This was after his escape that I had difficulty in finding him; my colleague failed altogether because he was living under an assumed name. It was only by accident that I found him myself.

The LORD SANDHURST.

17,918. It sounds as though you had detective work as well as ordinary visitation?—In this case one had.

17,919. Mr. Snell: His delusions were apparently harmless to other people?—His delusions were harmless, but if he got it into his head that a particular person was causing him trouble he might become dangerous. That is the reason why medical superintendents are so reluctant to discharge a patient of that kind.

17,920. Earl Russell: Yes, that is the trouble, that they may fix persecution on some individual, and then get an animus against that person?—Yes; they always regard them as potentially dangerous.

17,921. Deputy-Chairman: In the course of your visitations and your experience have you ever met with any case you thought was wrongfully certified or wrongly detained?—I have never met a case which I thought was wrongfully certified, but I have met with cases where I thought the detention had been longer than necessary.

17,922. Do you mean you have come across any cases where a patient has clearly recovered, and has yet not been discharged?—No, I do not think I could say that even. In some cases which have been discharged I think that probably a medical man would very likely form the opinion that the patient has not really recovered, although the discharge has never resulted in any harm.

17,923. Of course discharging a patient is a great responsibility on the medical superintendent?—Yes, a great responsibility.

17,924. And it involves the determination of a very difficult question, does it not?—It does.

17,925. But have you come across any cases where you have considered that the patient was what I may call wilfully detained, that is to say detained when the medical superintendent had formed an opinion that he was safe to be out?—Those are two rather different questions, I think. I have never found a case in which a person was wilfully detained in the sense that the medical superintendent would regard him as safe to be out if left to himself; but I think there are many cases in asylums in which the medical superintendent would gladly grant a discharge, if only some responsible person could be found who would undertake to keep an eye upon the patient.

17,926. Yes—you mean that a patient may not have fully recovered soundness of mind?—The mind remains permanently deteriorated to a certain extent.

17,927. The patient is in the position when he ought to have some after care and he cannot get it, and there the medical superintendent has, you think, kept him longer than is necessary for his own safety or the safety of the public?—The medical superintendent is very often begging the relatives, or suggesting to the relatives, that they might safely take them away, but the difficulty he is up against is that he cannot find anybody who will take the responsibility, or, perhaps I ought to say, face the trouble.

17,928. What possible remedy is there for that—nothing but the extension of after care provision, is there?—Nothing but the extension of after care provision, and bringing home to people the responsibility which they ought to face. Of course one does meet with great nervousness on the part of relations, and where there are no near relations, I was going to say, great reluctance to take trouble. One always has a case, I suppose, in one's mind—I have a case of a lady who was for a long time in St. Andrew's Hospital at Northampton; she was very eccentric, and whenever I went there she begged me to take some steps to get her out. Her property was administered by a brother-in-law who lived in Liverpool, and has since died. I think I am right in saying he took no interest in her. It could not be said she was not lawfully detained, and as long as she was there she was perfectly safe and well cared for, and from his point of view no doubt that was the end of his responsibility. Well, the medical superintendent, probably quite rightly, did not feel justified in discharging this lady because he did not think she could take care of herself, and her property is still administered under the direction of the Court. One of her friends who suffered from recurrent insanity had had an unusually long remission and the medical superintendent gave her leave of absence on trial. She wrote to her friend and said: "Why do not you come here?" and it was arranged that she should go to the same house. When she was there the clergyman of the place interested himself in her and he found her another lodging. As a matter of fact her trial was extended from time to time. Eventually I think a brother turned up who took an interest in her and finally she was discharged. She has a brother who has taken over her affairs and with whom she is en rapport and she now leads a very happy existence. There is still some mental infirmity left no doubt, but that just illustrates the sort of case that one is up against.

17,929. In this connection you think that Section 72 of the Act is not altogether satisfactory?—Is that the section which gives the petitioner the control of the person?

17,930. The right of discharge. Section 58 is the first section which deals with moving from one institution to another?—Yes.

17,931. "A person having authority to order the discharge of a private patient from an institution for lunatics, or of any single patient may, with the previous consent in writing of a Commissioner, by order in writing direct the removal of a patient" to another institution. Then Section 72 is "A private patient detained in an institution for lunatics, or under care as a single patient, shall be discharged if the person on whose petition the reception order was made by writing under his hand, so directs"?—Yes.

The LORD SANDHURST.

17,932. I gather that your view is that that is not altogether a satisfactory provision?—I do not think it is altogether satisfactory. The person who files the petition may really do so in consequence of an accident. It is almost an accidental matter and it certainly does seem a very large power to place in the hands of the person who merely presents the petition.

17,933. It would not be so usually, would it? Usually it would be one of the near relatives who would present the petition?—That is so, but the trouble is you cannot always trust the near relatives. They are saved an immense amount of trouble by a patient being cared for in an institution. In my opinion a very serious question might arise if the recommendation of the majority Report on Divorce Law was carried out. I can quite imagine a very serious conflict of duty and supposed interest if residence in an asylum for a certain period were to entitle the other spouse to divorce.

17,934. Earl Russell: Before you leave that illustration you gave us, I rather wanted to pursue what I think was at the bottom of it. Is that sort of patient really actually happier, do you think, outside the institution, than in it?—The individual that I am thinking of is infinitely happier.

17,935. Is that due to the sense of freedom?—To the sense of freedom and to the sense of responsibility and to the absence of stigma.

17,936. All those three things?—Yes.

17,937. So that really if you can get them outside the institution, it is to their advantage?—Of course that depends upon the patient.

17,938. I mean, supposing that no harm will come to them?—Yes. I should still say that it is not only no harm coming to them, it is a question, no doubt, of the degree of their mental stability; but if they are capable of appreciating the advantages of being free agents, well, then I should say, undoubtedly, they are happier out of an institution.

17,939. Deputy-Chairman: It depends upon the patients and upon the surroundings to which they can come?—Yes, very largely upon that.

17,940. Earl Russell: I was thinking of cases in which possibly a well managed institution might be more comfortable than the home of a particular relative who might like to have you?—More comfortable very often, but that is not the whole story.

17,941. Sir David Drummond: What does Lord Sandhurst feel with regard to Section 77. The exercise of a certain right by the visitors to discharge a patient possibly against the wishes of the superintendent?—Of course that only applies, I think I am right in saying, to an asylum, to a public institution.

17,942. That we understand?—As a rule one meets with no reluctance on the part of medical superintendents in the public institution to discharge patients as soon as they are fit for discharge, because there is such a demand for accommodation that they are really only too glad to discharge a patient if they can.

17,943. I know, but this is a discharge which three visitors can grant?—Yes—I am afraid I cannot throw much light upon that. I imagine that is a power which is very rarely exercised.

17,944. Earl Russell: We should have thought never, but as a matter of fact Sir David and I have come across cases where it has been exercised against the advice of the superintendent?—Yes. I am afraid I cannot throw any light upon that; I have no experience on that subject.

17,945. Deputy-Chairman: Lord Sandhurst, may I go back to Section 72 for a minute. You think that that may not be the happiest provision that could be made, and I gather you think in cases which have come before the Master and orders have been made for a receiver and so on, that probably it would be better to let the receiver have the right of discharge rather than the petitioner?—Yes, I have thought so.

17,946. But may I put this to you? It has struck me before that with regard to Section 72 it may be doubtful whether this throws any responsibility at all upon the petitioner—whether it is not merely inserted in the Act in order to give him some right, if he chooses to exercise it, to be some protection for the person in the asylum. But is not the real responsibility for discharge upon the medical superintendent under Section 83? You see under Section 83: "The manager of any hospital and licensed house, and a person having charge of a single patient, shall forthwith, upon the recovery of a patient, send notice thereof in the case of a patient not a pauper to the person on whose petition the reception order was made, or by whom the last payment on account of the patient was made, and in the case of a pauper to the guardians." Then sub-section 3 is: "In case the patient is not removed within seven days from the date of the notice he shall be forthwith discharged." Is not the responsibility really for discharge and the sole responsibility upon the medical superintendent?—That is upon the recovery of a patient.

17,947. Yes, that is "discharged recovered"?—Yes.

17,948. But until the patient has recovered is there any obligation or responsibility upon the petitioner to obtain his discharge?—The responsibility, I take it, upon the petitioner, is to provide as far as possible for the happiness and welfare of the patient. Now if the patient is in such a condition mentally that he or she might be at large under some degree of supervision, it seems to me that the petitioner is under very serious responsibility if, to the unhappiness of the patient, he keeps the patient in an asylum longer than necessary, or in an institution longer than is necessary although he may not have recovered. The difficulty arises with the patient who is lawfully detained. I cannot say in any of these cases the patient was not lawfully detained. I do not think I have ever met with a case in which the patient was not lawfully detained beyond, probably, a certain period necessary to ascertain whether recovery was really established.

17,949. But in most cases the petitioner himself, or the receiver in the case where an order has been made by the Court, would have very little opportunity, would he not, of judging whether it was a case for discharge or not?—If the petitioner does his duty or the individual who is responsible for the person of the patient does his duty and visits and makes the proper enquiries, and says to the medical superintendent "Now, how is the patient getting on? She begs me to take her out. Can it be done?"; then the medical superintendent may say: "Yes, it can be done, if you will undertake to see that she is cared for; put her in a nice home and see that she is cared for."

17,950. Earl Russell: My objection to Section 72 is rather on the ground of public policy, that is to say giving a private relation the right to turn a lunatic loose upon the world?—Of course, it is always open to the medical superintendent to refuse permission for discharge in the case of a patient who is dangerous, either to himself or to others.

Deputy-Chairman: That is under Section 74.

Earl Russell: Yes, that is true.

Deputy-Chairman: Dangerous or unfit to be at large.

17,951. Earl Russell: The superintendents would be reluctant to give their barring certificate, would they not?—I do not know that they would. Of course there are not many patients who are really dangerous.

17,952. Then there is another objection it seems to me, that the petitioner might desire to remove a lunatic for improper purposes, either for the purposes of starving them or shortening their lives because they were an expense, or to get possession of their money by undue influence, or some reason of that sort?—The cases I am thinking about are cases in which the patients' money is in safe keeping. The possible suggestion that I make is that there shall be one authority, namely the receiver, who is necessarily responsible to the Master and who should have the control of the patient's person as well as of the patient's money.

17,953. Deputy-Chairman: One always thinks of a receiver in a different connection from that. I mean the idea that the receiver should have any personal control over the lunatic, seems remote from the idea of a receiver rather?—He gets it in a good many cases because in every case in which a patient is originally a pauper patient, there is no petitioner, and if it turns out that he has got money, a receiver is appointed and the receiver makes the last payment, and then he is the petitioner.

17,954. Earl Russell: A receiver would not be discharged from the care of the property without satisfactory evidence of the care of the patient?—No; that is an entirely different proposition. The Master is not at least bound by the discharge of a patient.

17,955. Deputy-Chairman: In all those cases there would be a formal visit by yourself?—Yes, unless the Master is not satisfied with a medical affidavit, which he sometimes is, of course.

17,956. Then there is another matter which you think is not quite satisfactory, the visitation by the petitioner. Do you think the petitioner ought to pay more than one visit in six months?—Yes.

17,957. The section is Section 5 of the Lunacy Act, is it not?—I do not say that the petitioner should visit more than once in six months necessarily; but as a matter of fact it provides that undertaking and no human being knows how that is to be enforced; and after all it is a very flimsy undertaking. He has to visit either personally or by someone specially appointed by him. There is no provision that any authority is to be satisfied that the person who visits is a proper person to visit, and as far as I know there is no means of enforcing the undertaking. I think Sir Henry Theobald in his book suggests that it might possibly be a subject of contempt of Court. I have known of an action being commenced against a petitioner for not visiting. I do not know what would happen to that action.

17,958. You do not remember the form that action took, do you?—I do not know, but I suppose it was based upon Ashby v. White, in Smith's "Leading Cases."

17,959. Was it a motion to commit for contempt?—No; it was an action for breach of duty (at least. I presume so; I have not seen the pleadings) on the ground that there was no wrong without remedy.

17,960. It would be a little difficult to prove damages, would it not?—That is another matter; if he could prove that he would have been discharged earlier if he had been visited.

17,961. Can you suggest any remedy for this—any better form of provision for this?—I think it certainly would be desirable that there should be some means of enforcing the undertaking, and I think that the person appointed to visit should be approved by some authority, by the Board of Control or somebody. You see there is no protection to the patient; there is nothing to show that the visitor is to be agreeable to the patient.

17,962. But the Act provides other visitations for all these patients?—Yes; they are all by officials. The object of this section, I presume, is that a patient should have a visit from somebody that he really knows, somebody that he can confide in.

17,963. There are also dangers there, are there not? A person he knows may be an unsatisfactory person to visit him?—He may be.

17,964. And always assuming that there has been anything in the nature of collusion to get a man away or anything of that kind?—I am very much struck by the fidelity of the relations in the poor cases. They are constantly visiting; they visit once a week, many of them, and the patients welcome the visits of their relations.

17,965. But does not that obtain with the wealthier patients?—I do not think it obtains to the same extent. The friends of the wealthier patients have more calls upon their time, I think. I do not think that the wealthier patients are visited as frequently as the poorer ones.

17,966. Sir David Drummond: Are they not at a greater distance?—That may be; that has something to do with it, no doubt. There may be reasons. I mean I do not want to make any charge, but I do notice, or I think I have noticed, that the poorer people visit their friends in asylums more regularly than the well-to-do.

17,967. Deputy-Chairman: Now, Lord Sandhurst, we should be very glad to get your view about the licensed houses. That is a matter to which your attention, I think, has been specially directed: whether there should be any amendment of the Act in that respect and whether the numbers should be increased?—I think it is a misfortune that no licensed house can be created.

17,968. You think they perform a very useful function and are wanted?—I do. There are two or three I could name. I have named one of them already, Camberwell House for instance, Peckham House which is its neighbour, and Ticehurst; there are numbers of them which perform most useful functions.

17,969. Which are really required—there is really a demand for them?—Yes. At Camberwell House the difficulty is to get the patients admitted.

17,970. Earl Russell: They are not allowed to increase the number of beds?—They are not allowed to increase the number of beds in the licence, and you cannot have a new licence, and I do not think you can move a licensed house (I think I am right in saying that) out of its district into another. That is a difficulty which Chiswick House, which is an excellent house, has been up against; they would like to move into the country, but they cannot do it because they would lose their licence.

17,971. Yes, and we have heard that there have been difficulties in places where they can go for convalescence, the final stage at the seaside.

Deputy-Chairman: I think that is a misapprehension, that the house cannot be moved. Under Section 207, subsection 3: "If at any time it is shown to the satisfaction of the Commissioners or the justices, as the case may be, that it would be for the comfort and advantage of the patients in any licensed house that another house should be substituted in place thereof, the Commissioners or justices may grant to the licensees of such first mentioned house a licence in respect of such other house upon and subject to the same conditions and restrictions as may have existed in respect of the first mentioned house."

17,972. Earl Russell: Yes, but it has to be in the same licensing district?—Yes, that is the trouble. The Commissioners have the control of the licensed houses within a certain area of the Metropolis, and the justices within the area of their jurisdiction. The difficulty arises when you want to move a house from the jurisdiction of the Commissioners into that of the justices or from the area of one set of justices into another, and that, I understand, cannot be done.

17,973. Is that clear under that section? I should not have thought so. Still it would give you a very considerable area of change?—It gives an area of change, but that is what I was told at Chiswick House, that that is the difficulty they were under.

17,974. Are they under the Commissioners?—Yes, they are under the Commissioners.

17,975. They could not remove at present to the sea?—I think that was with regard to Christchurch; they used to rent a house at Christchurch to give their patients the benefit of it in the summer and I think their wish was to move down there, if I remember right.

17,976. Of course it is a question of the construction of the section. I should have thought there might have been some doubt about it?—I think it follows almost from the words of the section: "the Commissioners or justices may grant to the licensees of such first mentioned house a licence in respect of such other house." Now it is clear that the Commissioners could not give a licence for the house outside and the justices could not give a licence to remove from the present house.

17,977. You mean that the justices would be confined to their particular area?—To their jurisdiction. You see it is "the Commissioners or justices may grant".

17,978. There is a double jurisdiction. What the authority is there respectively, I have no idea?—Except that the Commissioners do not have jurisdiction in the justices' area for licensing houses; that is under Section 208 (2).

Earl Russell: You see if you read the section this way, the Commissioners could not grant a licence for a house outside the Commissioners' area. That in itself would prevent it moving.

17,979. Deputy Chairman: Yes, that may be the true construction of the Act; I daresay you are right?—I think you will find that is the view the Commissioners take of it.

17,980. Mr. Snell: What do you suppose, Lord Sandhurst, was in the mind of the Legislature when it imposed these restrictions forbidding the increase of licensed houses?—It was when people were very anxious about the liberty of the subject. They thought more about the liberty of the subject, I think, in those days, than they did of the treatment of the patient. There was a sort of panic.

17,981. Is it not reasonable to assume that the Legislature must have had evidence before it which at least impressed it with the fact that these houses were subject to abuses?—There was no doubt a very strong public feeling on the subject. Was it not a Charles Reade novel, and "Valentine Vox" was another one, which were full of the troubles of patients in licensed houses? There certainly was a very strong feeling about licensed houses at that time.

17,982. I mean the Legislature may do foolish things and probably still does, but it does not do a thing without provocation, so to speak?—No.

17,983. Earl Russell: What should you say on the question of the feeling now about this conflict of duty and interest; do you think that would be a reason for limiting their numbers or do you think that hardly applies any longer?—No, I do not think it applies very largely. Certainly in these days the anxiety of licensed houses is to be regarded as up-to-date and to have a good recovery rate.

17,984. It has also been put to us by witnesses—I do not know what you would say to it—that there is some sort of moral obliquity involved in making a profit out of the afflicted?—You might as well say there was a moral obliquity in a medical man earning his fees.

17,985. Miss Symons: You do not feel that people are more inclined to be suspicious whether rightly or wrongly? I think that does happen to a certain extent but you meet with that you know in other places as well as licensed houses; you meet with the same suspicion even where a patient is a private patient in a public institution, and you meet with it in the registered hospitals, and you cannot persuade patients that nobody is able to make a profit out of them.

17,986. You do not feel that this demand could be met by private accommodation provided say, by the County authority?—Well, I should think it was rather a question of providing the money.

17,987. Earl Russell: But you come in touch with the class of patients to whom this applies and with their relations?—Yes.

17,988. Now it has been put to us that that kind of private patient does not wish to go into any accommodation however well equipped and however private, which is furnished by a local authority, that they do want a private house. Has that come within your knowledge?—I think that would be the feeling certainly of a great many relations.

17,989. Many doctors have said to us nothing run by a public authority would do, no matter how well it was run—what do you say with regard to that?—Well, I do not think I should say that that was a proposition without exception. Of course there is one public asylum which has a very large and very up-to-date private wing, Herrison at Dorchester; and one has met with people of quite good social position there and apparently they and their relatives are satisfied. I do not think it obtains to the same extent as it did, but one felt that the high fees charged there were not quite what ought to be charged in the case of a public institution. They were thinking too much of assisting the rates and not meeting the requirements of the middle classes.

17,990. There are cases where secrecy is very much desired, where it is desired that nobody except the official visitors should have access to them?—There are many cases in which relations are sensitive.

17,991. Yes, that is what I mean?—I do not know that the danger of publicity would be any greater in an institution run by a public authority if it was properly run.

17,992. People might think it would be?—They might think it would be.

17,993. Miss Symons: We were told of another at Morecambe Bay I think? Yes, that is the Lancaster Hospital?

17,994. Yes?—That is run on rather different lines from Herrison. I think there the fees are extremely moderate. They get extremely good accommodation for very very moderate fees.

17,995. Mr. Snell: There is one point I want to ask you about. I gather from your précis that the chief feeling in your mind about the private house is that there is no inducement to detain patients there because the competition to get into them is so great?—Certainly, with what I should call the middle class private house.

17,996. One argument is that there is a natural tendency for the medical proprietor to detain his patients?—Yes.

17,997. Your argument is that because of the restriction of the number of those places there is always a demand to get into them; therefore his inducement would be to get rid of one patient and to admit a new one?—Yes; I think that does apply in the majority of the licensed houses, but there are cases (I have felt it myself once or twice) of course in licensed houses, where a patient occupies a villa or half a villa and pays a very large fee; and such a patient is not easy to replace, and one can conceive that in a case of that sort there may be a conflict of interest and duty. The ordinary patient, the five guinea a week patient and the seven guinea a week patient can easily be replaced, but when it comes to thirty guineas a week one can imagine there might be a conflict of interest and duty.

17,998. Earl Russell: And that conflict would be increased if you had a larger number of licensed houses and therefore not the same rush for accommodation?—Yes it would.

17,999. Mr. Snell: There is another problem that is very much on my mind. It is not only this difficulty of conflict of interest and duty, but there is little security that the patient gets what he is paying for; he may be paying a reasonable fee and yet be half starved, let us say, at least deprived of certain comforts that he ought to have?—I do not think that occurs.

18,000. Earl Russell: I will tell you one particular thing that was put to us in evidence, that carriage drives were paid for and not given?—There, again, I have not heard of their being paid for and not given.

18,001. Mr. Snell: Suppose you had a regular fee in which those were included, and then not given. You might get that?—I have often been surprised to find that patients who are not paying specially for carriage drives do get them. As a rule carriage drives are an extra and you pay so much for a particular drive.

25 May, 1925.]

18,002. Deputy Chairman: Have you ever had any complaint of this kind brought to your attention?—I have never had a complaint that carriage drives were paid for and not enjoyed.

18,003. I mean any complaint that patients were really paying for things they were not getting in these houses?—No, I do not think so.

Sir Ernest Hiley: Mr. Snell said "starvation"—I do not know whether he meant deficiency of food.

18,004. Mr. Snell: What was in my mind was that you might get a table, a food supply, which was restricted. "Starvation" was too severe a word. What guarantee have we that the standard of comfort provided is equal to the prospectus?—If you come to that I suppose you have only got really the protection which is afforded by the Commissioners and the Visitors, and the interest of the proprietor, because after all a great many patients have sufficient intelligence to complain to their friends if they are not getting enough to eat; and also, of course, you could see by the appearance of the patients to a great extent whether they were well nourished or not.

18,005. Deputy Chairman: Your own view is that on the whole it would be an advantage if the number of licensed houses now could be to some extent increased?—Yes, that is my view. We have lost several very useful homes in late years.

18,006. You have lost six licences in the last 15 years?—Yes.

18,007. Mr. Snell: Why was that?—The house that I am thinking of at present was called Dinsdale Park, in Durham, I think.

18,008. Sir David Drummond: Beside Darlington?—Yes I think it is near Darlington.

18,009. It is north Yorkshire?—I rather think it is Durham. However, that was one which was a very useful house, and I cannot now recall why Doctor Kershaw gave it up; I think he found it was not paying him or something. It was during the war if I remember right. Then another very nice house was River Head House, near Sevenoaks, and there a certain Doctor Munro took it over and he had it a very short time. I think Doctor Munro was very indignant because he said that the principal alienists were all taking commissions on the patients they recommended to various licensed houses, and he was not going to have anything to do with it; at any rate he let the licence lapse. He had views of his own on the treatment of patients and on the methods of alienists generally. Whether for conscientious grounds or not I am not prepared to say but he let the licence lapse, and that disappeared. Another one was Redlands House in the same neighbourhood which was near Tonbridge; there that licence lapsed through some technicality as far as I remember; Doctor Sergeant, I think it was, of the licensed house on Tooting Common acquired the house and I think it was through some mistake on his part that the licence lapsed. He had the house and had not got the licence; he took over one or two of the patients and some of the patients went elsewhere. That was the third. Then another one, which was a very cheap licensed house very much used by the lower middle classes, was the Bethnal House near Bethnal Green Station. There the licence lapsed because they were not making it pay, if I remember right. But all those places reduced the area to which you could send patients, very considerably.

18,010. Deputy-Chairman: They covered a very considerable number of beds?—A very considerable number of beds and in all classes too.

18,011. Mr. Snell: None of them was closed because of any irregularities?—Not that I am aware of. No.

18,012. Miss Symons: I was wondering whether there were any cases in your experience in which you have been obliged to move patients to another place because you were dissatisfied with the care they were getting?—No. I have often recommended that patients should be moved, but I cannot recall a case in which I recommended that a patient should be moved from one asylum to another because I was not satisfied with the care he was getting. But in deference to their wishes I have very often recommended that a patient should be moved, sometimes because, although I thought that the grievance he may have complained of was not well founded, I yet thought it would be good for the patient to go to somewhere where he thought he had a better chance.

18,013. Earl Russell: Of course it is an element in their recovery to remove a grievance even though it is an imaginary one?—Yes. I think there have been cases in which I have not been satisfied with the care of a patient in a private house where I have suggested removal.

18,014. That is single care?—Yes.

18,015. Miss Symons: Have you ever found cases where perhaps they were economising in the patient's food and amusements?—I think in single care there is sometimes a tendency not so much to economise on the patient's food but to economise generally, poke him away into a small room and let a better room to another tenant—that kind of thing. I do not think you often find a case in which a patient has not had enough to eat; in fact I cannot recall a case.

18,016. Mrs. Mathew: I wanted to ask if you have any view about aftercare. Could we have your views about that?—The subject is of the greatest importance and I think if the After Care Association could have State assistance it would be a very useful thing. I mean the After Care Association is doing an abundance of most useful work. I do not know whether you have had Miss Vickers before you.

18,017. Yes?—She has told you all about it probably, but it cannot undertake all the work that it usefully might undertake if its funds were larger. Doctor King of Peckham House for example, who deals with a number of very poor patients, has got one or two ex-nurses with whom he is in touch, and when a patient is fit for a trial or perhaps is on the verge of being discharged, or even has been discharged, he will get one of these nurses to take him as a boarder. That is his practice and it certainly is a very useful practice. In some cases one is astonished at the fees at which these patients are received.

18,018. You mean they are so low?—Yes. I was going to say this, with regard to licensed houses, if I might. I think Doctor Edwards has suggested that it would be well if the superintendents of licensed houses were required to have some mental qualifications. I mean as things stand at present any medical man may run a private house and may acquire a licence, one of the existing licences.

18,019. Earl Russell: Indeed a layman may be the licensee.

18,020. Deputy-Chairman: Or a company?—Yes; a layman must have his patients visited by a medical man, but the only requirement is that he should be a medical man in practice, and there is no guarantee that he should be a person who is specially qualified to deal with mental cases. Of course some of the licensed houses one knows of are excellent institutions for the care of chronic patients, but one does not feel that one would advise that a patient should go there if there was a prospect of recovery.

18,021. Sir David Drummond: But the same obtains in connection with public asylums: there is no special qualification?—That is true, but those who have the appointment of the medical officers of public asylums generally take care to get somebody who is qualified.

18,022. Earl Russell: They should do?—They have not got to take the first person who comes along.

18,023. Sir David Drummond: He is often qualified on account of his administrative ability and not his medical abilities at all, for a public asylum, I mean?—You may know more about that than I do, but you often find a medical superintendent is appointed from the staff of some other institution where he has been dealing with mental patients. I am very much struck in this connection with the number of Scotsmen that I find acting as medical superintendents.

(The Witness withdrew.)

(After a short adjournment.)

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE H. P. MACMILLAN, K.C. (in the Chair).

Mr. G. M. HILDYARD, K.C. (Master in Lunacy), called and examined.

18,025. Chairman: Mr. Hildyard, we have had the advantage of reading your précis, which you were good enough to send to us, and I think we might profitably occupy a little time in going into some of the questions which your précis raises. First of all, could you tell us the precise nature of your office and the duties which you discharge—I do not mean in detail, but just to indicate your status in the lunacy administration?—The Master's Department administers the estates of lunatics and other persons who are incapable of dealing with their own properties. They do it by appointing a receiver, who is an agent of the lunatic and who deals with the property under the control of the Department.

18,026. Your contact, from the lunatic's point of view, is primarily in connection with their property rights?—Yes, primarily.

18,027. And only incidentally are you concerned with their welfare otherwise?—Yes.

18,028. I further gather that you do not take action on your own initiative, but you are always invoked in some form or other?—Yes. Of course we can take action if somebody, not necessarily the relations of the patient—it may be the Board of Control or somebody else—tells us that a patient has got property which needs looking after; then we take action through the Official Solicitor.

18,029. But in the normal case your Department is set in motion by someone acting on behalf of the lunatic?—Yes.

18,030. Then what is the nature of your office—I mean its organisation and equipment?—There is a Master and an Assistant Master and then a number of departments of clerks dealing with particular numbers of patients. It is divided into six sections: each one has a certain number of clerks, and they deal with the administration of the property of so many people, who are allotted to them alphabetically.

18,031. That is the administrative department?—Entirely.

18,032. So far as you yourself, as Master, are concerned, I gather that you pay personal visits to cases with which you are concerned?—Yes. Of course there is a separate jurisdiction by inquisition. The Department, representing the Chancellor, deals with what are called inquisition patients, of whom there are now only a few.

18,033. There seems to be only a couple of hundred?—Yes, and those are dying out.

18,034. Are your duties in relation to the persons so found by inquisition different from those where a receiver has been appointed?—A little bit, because the patients so found do not come in any way under the jurisdiction of the Board of Control, so that both mentally and in regard to their property they are entirely under us.

18,035. Earl Russell: Are you the judicial authority to whom application is made?—No. On a petition the Judge orders an inquisition, and then the Master decides on enquiry whether there is a case or not.

18,036. Chairman: There is a very useful summary of your office in Sir Henry Theobald's work?—Yes.

18,037. Was he your predecessor?—Yes

18,024. So we have heard.—I attribute that to the fact that the Scotch have got such fine schools of mental science; Edinburgh and Dumfries send out some of the ablest men for the purpose of mental work.

Deputy-Chairman: We are very much indebted to you for your evidence.

18,038. And one can see that the procedure is altered from time to time?—Yes.

18,039. Your duties really fall into two compartments: those that relate to lunatics so found by inquisition, and those with regard to the lunatics of whose estates a receiver has been appointed?—Yes.

18,040. Apparently resort to the former procedure is dropping out?—Yes.

18,041. Do you advocate the retention of inquisition?—Yes, there are a few cases for which it is necessary. Whether it need continue to be necessary I do not know.

18,042. It seems a pity to have two systems in operation unless they both serve some distinctly useful purpose?—We cannot deal with some property in Ireland unless there has been an inquisition.

18,043. That could easily be remedied by legislation?—Yes, if Ireland would agree; it is Ireland that makes the difficulty.

18,044. Then I will withdraw the word "easily"?—Yes. Then there are some people who are not quite satisfied with the treatment they are getting under the Board of Control; sometimes their relations would rather get away from the Board of Control by coming into direct relation with the Lord Chancellor instead. Whether that is a good thing or a bad thing I do not know.

18,045. Mr. Micklem: Are there not cases where it would be wise to decide the question of lunacy by a jury, which you can have on an inquisition, of course?—Yes.

18,046. You never have that safeguard, except on an inquisition?—On an inquisition, if the patient is well enough to demand a jury, which he very seldom is, he may demand a jury, and then it is heard before a jury; that is only if he demands it, and there is something to try.

18,047. Earl Russell: Do you find a jury is a suitable body to try this sort of thing?—I have not known a case for a great many years; I do not know; I do not quite know why they should not be.

18,048. Chairman: It is rather interesting to notice that the development in England has been practically on parallel lines with the experience which we have had in Scotland. There we have a formal process of cognition, which is equivalent to your inquisition; we also have the system of the appointment of a judicial factor, who is the opposite number of the receiver in England, and almost all the administration in Scotland is done by such officials. I have not seen more than one case of cognition in 20 or 30 years' experience?—Yes. On the other hand, in Ireland they are still found by inquisition—even in quite small cases.

18,049. The actual figures at the present moment are 219 inquisition cases on the Visitors' books, as Lord Sandhurst said?—Of course those are almost entirely the residuum of previous years. Two a year is about the average now.

18,050. It is manifestly a diminishing quantity?—Very much.

18,051. I think it is for consideration whether the whole of that elaborate machinery should continue—whether it is now of practical value or not I do not know?—I have had very few inquisitions since I was appointed, but there are cases in which a lunatic has managed to get married. In the case of a lunatic found by inquisition, the marriage is not valid.

25 May, 1925.]

Mr. G. M. HILDYARD, K.C.

18,052. The marriage could probably be annulled on the ground that there was no legal consent if the person was really a lunatic?—There is not a very large mentality required to know that you are being married.

18,053. Earl Russell: Is that so? A lunatic so found by inquisition cannot contract a marriage?—No—by statute.

18,054. Chairman: Now, just taking your topics in order, Mr. Hildyard, I note in the first place that in the course of your experience you have not actually come across a case in which relatives have endeavoured to get the weak-minded person certified in order to get control of his property?—No.

18,055. Although you have not personally come across such a case, I gather you recognise the great desirability of safeguards being maintained to prevent such a possibility?—Yes, I do, because of course, although one has not had proof of the existence of such a case, it may have existed.

18,056. Therefore the important thing from our point of view is to see that the safeguards are retained and, if necessary, improved at any points at which they may be shown to be inadequate?—Yes.

18,057. Now you have a very important suggestion really running through your précis, directed to the desirability of the property and estates of all lunatic persons being brought into charge or control?—Yes.

18,058. Apparently the position is rather haphazard at present?—Yes.

18,059. And have you found in experience that resort has been had to the appointment of a receiver often at too late a stage—after some mischief has been done with regard to the property?—Yes, frequently.

18,060. You might just illustrate that by the different ways in which you have found that disadvantage to the patient has arisen?—The two main ways are that sometimes relatives, thinking that they are doing the best they can for the patient, spend his money too rapidly; they think he will be unhappy, and they spend as much as they can on him to make him happier, which perhaps to some extent makes him happier, and then the patient gets better, comes out, and finds his money all gone; it has been done with the best intentions, but he might have got well just as soon if he had been kept a little less extravagantly, and had something to live on when he came out. Then, on the other hand, one does find that patients are kept at an uncomfortable place, or at an uncomfortable rate of maintenance, with the idea of spending as little upon them as possible; and after some years they come to us, and we find that really on their income they could have been kept very much better and have been private patients instead of pauper patients, or even have been out of an asylum in a home or with a doctor, and during those years they have had an uncomfortable time quite unnecessarily; whether the relatives have done that so as to get the benefit themselves one cannot say.

18,061. Of course, one could see a motive there on the part of relatives, that they might wish to save as much as possible out of the income of a lunatic in order that it might ultimately reach their own pockets.

18,062. Mr. Micklem: Or that it might reach his when he came out?—Yes; but I think undue economy would be more likely the other way. I think there is a feeling with some of these people that "the poor thing is a lunatic; he will not understand; he would not be any better if we spent money upon him; let us keep it."

18,063. Chairman: That has been in the case where there has been no receiver appointed, before the case has come to your cognisance, and after money has been spent or has not been spent. In contrast with that, when a receiver is appointed, either the Official

Solicitor may be appointed or another person. How is the estate then administered on behalf of the lunatic?—When a receiver is appointed I have to decide what shall be spent upon the lunatic, and how he should be maintained; of course I may be wrong, sometimes, like the relatives are. It is very difficult to know how far it is wise to spend a man's money while he is a lunatic, and how far one ought to keep it for him.

18,064. But your judgment is entirely immune from any suggestion of bias. Your only interest is the patient's welfare?—Quite; it must be an honest mistake, anyway.

18,065. And in deciding how you will dispose of the capital or the income of an estate, what considerations do you have in view generally—I mean how does the problem present itself to you?—Well, of course, there are so many difficult circumstances. One has got so often to consider not only the patient, but also his family, his wife or children, or other people who are dependent on him, and the way one looks at it as a rule is: spend the whole income in such a way as to do the best for everybody. Spend as much on the patient as can be comfortably enjoyed without waste, and spend the rest of it on his family. That is simple as long as there is enough income.

18,066. You would not wish to break up the home, of course, because a patient might recover and go back to his home?—Quite. He does owe a debt to his family.

18,067. The difficulty is where there is not enough?—That is the great difficulty. Where you have not enough to pay the guardians' rate, then you are not entitled to use the property for any other purpose—even for the wife and children.

18,068. Sir David Drummond: Does the question of diagnosis come in here—the precise nature of the mental affliction?—I do not know that it does. I have to be satisfied on the evidence that the person is a lunatic: either that he is fit to be detained in an asylum or is unable to manage his property. To that extent the diagnosis comes in.

18,069. You do not concern yourself with the question of whether he is a general paralytic, do you?—Of course, one does consider the question of how long he is likely to live. I get from the doctor in every case, under the new form we now have, a statement as to his opinion of the bodily health of the patient, and as to the prospects of recovery, and those two things must enter into one's mind in dealing with property.

18,070. Earl Russell: In the case which you have mentioned, where the income is not enough to pay the guardians' rate, you do not have anything to do with it, do you; the guardians take it out of your hands?—No. If a receiver has been appointed the guardians have no longer any powers. Generally we are always bargaining with the guardians, but they are entitled to be paid not only out of income but out of capital.

18,071. Who is the master of the situation?—I am, fortunately.

18,072. Mr. Micklem: They have the first charge for his maintenance?—I must say most guardians are very good, and they will very often allow quite a small payment, subject to being given a charge on the capital; then if the patient recovers and there is anything left, the guardians have a first claim to it.

18,073. Earl Russell: Of course as a rule when the guardians have a free hand they sell up everything the patients have to pay their charges?—I think they vary very much. I think some are very good to the patients, and some more good to the ratepayers.

18,074. Chairman: You speak of the persons being lunatics, in answer to Sir David. Of course you have persons who are not certified lunatics, but of whose estate a receiver has been appointed, a person therefore whose mental state may vary very much in degree?—Yes.

18,075. I should imagine that many persons who are incapable of managing their affairs, although not certifiable, might have a certain amount of intelligence, enabling them to co-operate with you in the administration of their affairs?—Some do; to take an extreme case: although a patient might not be able to manage his capital, he might be able to manage his income, and you might appoint a receiver to pay the income directly into the patient's own hands, or you might allow the receiver to pay the patient pocket money.

18,076. Earl Russell: Once the receiver is appointed, the capital would be quite safe from any charge the patient tried to impose upon it?—Yes. Of course you do get these great difficulties with the sort of people the Chairman has been mentioning, where they are not shut up in any way, where they go about and incur very large debts; and although strictly in law you may say to the creditor, "No, we are not going to pay this; we have got a receiver," you cannot do it altogether. We are bound to recognise their debts to some extent, if they can afford them.

18,077. Chairman: Is the estate of the lunatic technically vested in you?—No, it is not vested in any person.

18,078. I was thinking of the distinction which one knows in another sphere of the law?—Yes.

18,079. You are not vested with the actual title?—No. We have the power of vesting it, and what we do with large inscribed stocks, for instance, is to transfer them into the name of the Paymaster; they go into Court. We can authorise the receiver to execute deeds, or we can make vesting orders; but if we do not do either, we just leave the certificates for the stocks in a bank, and the property remains in the lunatic.

18,080. But I suppose the matter has often come to your cognisance first of all because of the difficulty of carrying out a transaction?—That is what brings it to our notice in most cases. Really what I think has made such a large increase lately is that so many people with very small means hold war stocks. They cannot deal with the inscribed stocks at all except by getting the authority of the Court. Where it is only a question of small house property, the tenants will pay to anybody.

18,081. Mr. Micklem: Do you mean because they are not capable of signing documents?—Yes. The bank needs such a perfect authority that they will not act on anything else; sometimes there are powers of attorney which the banks act upon, although they might have lapsed through certification.

18,082. Chairman: Now I think we might get on our note a summary of the various ways in which a lunatic's maintenance is at present paid for. I think first there is the case of the guardians paying out of the rates?—Yes.

18,083. That is in the case of the pauper patients?—Yes.

18,084. Then secondly the friends or relatives may pay out of their own pockets?—Yes.

18,085. Thirdly the trustees acting under a discretionary trust, and who hold property under such a trust, may apply property for the maintenance of the lunatic?—Yes.

18,086. Then you may have friends or relatives doing it out of the lunatic's property without any legal authority at all?—Yes.

18,087. Then you may have the case of the payments being made by friends or relatives out of the lunatic's property under authority other than that of the Court of Lunacy?—Yes.

18,088. Then I think the last case is where the payments are made by a committee or receiver out of the lunatic's property under the authority of the Lunacy Court?—Yes.

18,089. The first two cases, the guardians and the friends or relatives paying out of their own pockets, are cases with which you have nothing to do?—That is so.

18,090. And similarly with regard to discretionary trusts, I think you have no powers to interfere?—No.

18,091. Is that the class of case where a father leaves a sum of money to trustees to be expended on an insane child?—That is the class of case; of course, they are sometimes very difficult of construction. If the testator says, "Trustees to apply all or so much as they think fit," then no one can interfere with them, but we do interfere where there is merely an apparent discretion; we threaten them we will take them to the Chancery Court to construe the will to see whether they are exercising a discretion at all.

18,092. It would be a little difficult to deal with that class of case, because there are as many different ways of conferring these powers as there are testators, and one knows the vagaries of testators?—Quite. The only thing one can suggest is that you might say that some notice of the trust should be given to some authority, or some check should be imposed to see that it is being carried out.

18,093. Of course the case might be so grave as to be one of breach of trust?—Yes, it might be so.

18,094. And as the beneficiary would not be in a position to call the trustees to account, they would not be subject to the same restraint as in the case of a sane beneficiary?—Not at all; we have to represent the beneficiary for that purpose.

18,095. Mr. Micklem: Would you have to take proceedings in that case in the name of the lunatic?—Yes; we should appoint a receiver and authorise him to take proceedings in the name of the lunatic.

18,096. Chairman: And give a proper maintenance allowance, I suppose?—Yes.

18,097. Earl Russell: Are your receivers that you would appoint officers of the Court, or are they solicitors, or people likely to be interested in the thing?—I should think they are more often relations than anybody else. There is the Official Solicitor, if necessary.

18,098. Chairman: Curiously, we mostly appoint chartered accountants in Scotland?—There are difficulties. So many of these cases are very, very small. Chartered accountants are all right for biggish estates, but they open their mouths too wide sometimes; it is their business, and they must charge for it.

18,099. Earl Russell: The same, of course, would be true with solicitors?—The same would be true with solicitors. We do not appoint solicitors very much, because there is the question of legal costs.

18,100. Chairman: And the Official Solicitor is really a kind of public trustee?—He is of that nature, yes.

18,101. You note in passing, the case of the rules of co-operative and provident societies, which seem to have caused trouble sometimes?—Yes.

18,102. Have you experienced that?—Yes, there is that difficulty.

18,103. You mean the benefit ceases during incapacity?—Yes. Sometimes the provision is that the benefits shall accumulate until the patient comes out. There is a good deal to be said for that; sometimes they are allowed to use them for their wives and children; there is something to be said for that; sometimes they merely cease. Of course, it is part of the contract.

18,104. After all, the constitution of any co-operative or provident society represents the contract between the society and its members, and it may vary infinitely, of course?—Quite.

18,105. But you think it is an unfortunate rule to have, that benefits should cease during mental incapacity?—I think it is, because the maintenance costs a considerable amount while the patient is incapable. After all, the patient has subscribed so as to be kept when he is ill, and this particular illness is not provided for.

18,106. Earl Russell: Are you talking about a benefit society or a trading society?—There are various co-operative societies; they all have different rules.

18,107. The ordinary kind of thing one thinks of is a sort of co-operative stores?—No, I mean friendly and benefit societies—things of that kind.

25 May, 1925.]

Mr. G. M. HILDYARD, K.C.

18,108. Chairman: Friendly and provident societies?—Yes.

18,109. Their rules have, I think, to be approved by the Registrar?—Yes, they have. In that way, if it were thought proper that any other rules should be made, no doubt there would be some hold upon them. No doubt it is a matter of contract. There is one point I should like to mention. I do think there is one great hardship on lunatics, rather of this same nature, and that is that the Government always, when they can, as far as I can see, put burdens upon the rates rather than upon the country. There is a provision, for instance, in the Old Age Pensions Act that no pension shall be payable to anybody in an asylum. The idea no doubt was that when they were in an asylum they were kept by the guardians, and there was no reason to pay the pension to the guardians. Of course the result at present is to take away from the patient his 10s. a week, and the hardship is very much accentuated now, and will be still more so if the new Pensions Bill goes through; an ordinary person, although he may have £30 or £40 a year, is still entitled to his old age pension, and the two together would be quite sufficient to maintain him. He goes into an asylum and he does not get it.

18,110. Does that mean that his pension is applied for his maintenance through the medium of the guardians?—No; he becomes a person not entitled to a pension.

18,111. Earl Russell: Are the ordinary inhabitants of Poor Law institutions also disentitled to receive a pension on that footing?—Yes.

18,112. So he is on the same footing?—Yes; he is on the same footing; but where it comes in undoubtedly is that an ordinary person is not an inhabitant of a Poor Law institution if he can pay for his maintenance. In this case these people, because of their illness, have to go into asylums, and they are paying their maintenance very often. Under the new Bill I suppose you might have £50 or £60 a year and still get your pension.

18,113. The 10s. a week might just make the difference as to whether he was solvent or not solvent in meeting the claims of the guardians?—Yes; under the Old Age Pensions Act you can have £39 a year.

18,114. The whole of that, and your 10s. a week, would go in the maintenance of the asylum?—Yes; but now a man with £39 a year has to use the capital of that to make up the pauper rate; if he is going to pay the guardians he has got to make up the difference between the £39 a year and his maintenance out of his capital, and he ought to be able to be getting that from the Government as his old age pension. He has got capital producing £39 a year, and I understand under the new Bill it does not matter how much you have got, you are to get your old age pension, unless you are a lunatic.

18,115. He is deprived of 10s. a week?—He is deprived of 10s. a week.

18,116. I thought it was a question as to whether this 10s. a week was to come out of the rates or the taxes?—No, it is not that.

18,117. That is the question which was present to the mind of the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he made this provision?—Yes. I am trying to get it altered by bringing it to the minds of the people who are drafting the new Bill.

18,118. Did you find the Treasury at all sympathetic?—I would not say "sympathetic."

18,119. Chairman: It is not an epithet one commonly applies to the Treasury; but we are obliged to you for mentioning it. Then next I appreciate the point you are making regarding the undesirability of forcing administration by the Court upon all cases. At the same time, surely there is a great deal to be said for all cases where there is any property involved being brought to the notice of your Department?—I think so, very much. What I had in my mind about the undesirability was that you cannot keep any legal proceedings of this kind from being somewhat expensive, and you have a great many cases where the lunacy lasts a very short time. A man may be ill only three or four months, or something of that kind, and it does seem a little hard—possibly it may be necessary—that you should put those estates to the expense of legal proceedings merely for a three or four months' administration.

18,120. Earl Russell: I should be very glad to have some figures about the expense. Suppose a man has £60 a year, and you have to appoint a receiver for about three months, what would it cost him altogether, from first to last?—It is almost impossible to say, really, because it depends very much on how it is done. If he has got relatives who are sufficiently energetic and sufficiently understanding in business matters to do it themselves without a solicitor, it costs very little.

18,121. Of course, if it were a case of managing small house property, I take it the cost would only be the cost in your Court?—Yes, but it is that initial cost which is the heavy cost.

18,122. What sort of amount is it?—It is very small for persons who apply in person—say it is a London case, and they are here, and the estate is worth less than £50 a year: we can make what is called a no-fee case, and it only costs them a few shillings. On the other hand, if you have to have stamps on the order, if it is over £50, it would cost three or four pounds. Once you bring a solicitor in it may cost anything from £10 to £50.

18,123. Chairman: I wonder if you could give us a few selected instances. I should like to see a few bills of costs?—Yes, I will get them out for you.

18,124. Earl Russell: It would be very interesting to know the actual sum that a man has to waste, so to speak, on the necessary machinery?—Yes; it is so difficult, as I say, to give anything like an average case. If you have got to have inscribed stocks lodged in Court it costs something.

18,125. Chairman: Often a very small asset is a very difficult one to administer?—Yes.

18,126. Earl Russell: Suppose a man is away from London, can he do all his application by post, or must he necessarily come to London?—No; I tried to get extra staff and things to make a sort of poor persons' correspondence department; the Treasury would not hear of that. We do do a great deal through correspondence.

18,127. You could not do it through the existing Poor Persons' Department?—No; I think that has broken down without us.

18,128. Chairman: I think your suggestion later on is the County Court?—Yes.

18,129. Mr. Micklem: What fee is payable to the receiver?—The receivers may be appointed, and generally are, if they are members of the family, without any remuneration at all.

18,130. What do you make a receiver do in the way of giving security?—We get a guarantee society to support him.

18,131. That costs money?—That is one of the expensive parts of it, and I am afraid that does lead to one appointing them fairly often without security, which is perhaps dangerous.

18,132. Chairman: It is not a legal necessity that you should have security?—No; I can always waive it.

18,133. Earl Russell: How is the application made to you?—A summons, which has to be served upon the patient and supported by affidavit.

18,134. Mr. Micklem: So that it may be opposed?—It may be opposed.

18,135. That may be the entire proceeding. On that you may be able to pronounce your necessary order?—Yes. If it is a certified case we get a certificate from the Board of Control to say it is a certified case, and that is sufficient.

18,136. Chairman: In Scotland we simply present a petition to a Judge, which narrates the circumstances, states the amount of the afflicted person's estate, asks for the appointment of a curator bonis, and then has appended to it two printed certificates from doctors who certify on soul and conscience that A.B., whom they have seen, is incapable of managing or of giving directions for the management of his own affairs; and upon that a Judge appoints; there is a service of it upon the person?—Do you need the two doctors if there is already a certificate?

18,137. I am assuming the case of a person who is not certified, simply having a receiver appointed of his estate.

18,138. Earl Russell: Would you be able to do without the doctor's certificate if the person was a certified patient?—Yes. As a matter of fact we always do get some information from the doctor as to the prospects of recovery, and things of that sort.

18,139. But it need not be an affidavit, need it?—No; we make it as cheap as we can, but it is difficult. Then of course, talking of expense, there is the percentage levy. The State takes a certain percentage of the income of all cases that are under jurisdiction.

18,140. Like the Public Trustee's charges?—Yes; although we exempt the very small cases; but that is a burden on any case.

18,141. Mr. Micklem: They are considerable?—Three per cent.

18,142. Chairman: But if you gave us one or two typical instances that would show us the cost at each step?—Yes, quite.

18,143. Then you draw attention to one or two of the provisions of the Act of 1890 which are related to this matter. First of all, Section 132, where provision is made for small estates: the County Court Judge may apparently authorise any person to take possession of and sell and to give directions for maintenance of the person affected. Is that without a receiver at all?—That is without a receiver; but I think that is only on the application of the Poor Law authority, is it not?

18,144. "May upon the application of the clerk of the guardians, or a relieving officer"?—That section is hardly used at all.

18,145. Section 299 is another to which you refer us?—That is used to a certain extent, but only in very small cases.

18,146. That, again, is a method of making lunatics' property available without the appointment of a receiver?—Yes, for the purpose of the Poor Law authorities.

18,147. And, again, Section 300 provides for an order by a County Court Judge for payment of expenses incurred by guardians of a union?—Yes.

18,148. Mr. Micklem: Under Section 299 is the application made by the guardians?—Yes, I think it is. The section says a justice may direct a relieving officer or the treasurer or some other officer of the local authority to seize and sell so much of any other personal property, and so on, as shall be sufficient to pay the expenses of maintenance. Nobody is so anxious about the expenditure on maintenance as the guardians themselves, so I do not think anyone except the guardians applies under that.

18,149. Earl Russell: What is the reason for retaining that power in Section 300? I thought the recovery by guardians was always done before justices. My recollection is that you went to the justices and asked them to make any necessary order for payment?—Yes.

18,150. Chairman: It might, however, afford some precedent for bringing in the County Court Judge in the matter of receiverships of small estates?—Yes.

18,151. Then there is a general section, Section 335, relating to pensions or allowances?—Yes.

18,152. That is a section which authorises the Public Department concerned to pay as it may think proper; again, I suppose, without the necessity of a receiver being appointed?—Yes.

18,153. Then I take it you are referring to these to show us that there are also other means by which the estate of a lunatic may be administered?—Yes.

18,154. You also draw attention to the Postmaster-General's position, where no receiver has been appointed?—Yes.

18,155. I rather gather that you do not look with favour upon his powers?—No, not entirely. It is a sort of co-ordinate jurisdiction in a way. The Post Office deals with anything acquired through the Post Office without the appointment of a receiver.

18,156. Earl Russell: They do it merely on enquiry made by their own officers without anything in the nature of a legal procedure?—Quite, and without any of the safeguards of the Lunacy Acts.

18,157. And without the expense?—And without the expense. That is why I do not say I think definitely it ought to be changed in any way, because it may be what is required in very small cases, but I do not think the lunatic is really properly protected.

18,158. Chairman: I understand, however, that you do not think the Post Office jurisdiction should be affected unless a simpler method of appointing a receiver is instituted?—No. I think it does meet the requirements of very small cases, and it would be very unfair to take those facilities away, unless you could provide something equally cheap for the very small estates.

18,159. Mr. Micklem: Does it apply where a person of unsound mind has other property than War Savings?—It does not apply to other property, but the Post Office can deal with everything that has been acquired through the Post Office.

18,160. Do they make enquiries with regard to other property?—In most cases I think they do.

18,161. Chairman: Is the danger of the present system this, that taking War Savings Certificates, they might be paid over by the Post Office and, in the absence of a receiver, possibly extravagantly used?—Yes.

18,162. You have not to administer it after payment?—No. Somebody comes and says: "We need a couple of hundred pounds for the maintenance of this patient" or possibly "We have spent it"; and the Post Office will cash the War Savings Certificates without going into the circumstances of the patient.

18,163. Earl Russell: Have they not got an officer who would make some sort of enquiry to back up the story?—I do not think they go into the indirect details. I think they would require to see that it was being spent; but not that the patient was being properly maintained at that rate.

18,164. But they would satisfy themselves that it was a relation and that they were connected with it, would they not?—I think so. I am not saying that they do this badly at all; but I think there is not quite enough control over them.

18,165. Chairman: They have not the machinery available?—No; only, as I pointed out, there are a great many of these cases; they have a couple of thousand cases a year.

18,166. Earl Russell: And I suppose many of them are small cases?—Yes.

18,167. Mr. Micklem: Still, if all those cases came into your Department and you have your other cases of which you have spoken, you would want to go back to the old system of two Masters?—We should want four, at least.

18,168. Chairman: Of course, this is all coupled with your suggestion of some simpler method for small estates?—Quite.

18,169. Then I think we have already covered the point that you do not act of your own initiative—I mean you have to be brought into operation by the application of somebody or by the state of matters being brought to your notice by some interested person?—Quite.

18,170. The practical suggestion which seems to lie at the back of much of your précis would seem to be this, that there should be intimation made in every case by the person who has charge of the patient to your Department, that there is such a patient under care and that that patient has means?—Yes.

18,171. You suggest that that should not necessarily be done until a period has elapsed, possibly six months you suggest, because recovery might take place and procedure might be superfluous?—Quite.

25 May, 1925.]

Mr. G. M. HILDYARD, K.C.

18,172. But in any cases where there is likely to be a prolonged detention, you should be notified?—Yes.

18,173. But then how is the institution, which naturally would be the notifying authority, to know whether the patient has means or not? Of course, in the case of a pauper I can understand the guardians taking steps to find out whether there is any money?—Quite.

18,174. But the institution, I take it, would not busy itself with such enquiry, would it?—No; I do not think it would. It was rather in my mind to make it a duty on the petitioner.

18,175. There is no petitioner in the case of the pauper, of course?—No. Of course, a pauper in a sense is not so likely to have property. I think there would be a difficulty in finding the person.

18,176. A pauper may be a peculiar person in law; he may be only a pauper because he has been put through the machinery of the Poor Law; at the same time, he may have some small means of his own which are just as valuable to him?—It might be so.

18,177. Mr. Micklem: But your idea is that where you have an ordinary petitioner, the petitioner might set out in every case not only the bodily condition of the man, but his material circumstances, so to speak?—Without going into details, yes.

Chairman: That is exactly what we do in Scotland.

18,178. Earl Russell: When a petition is made to you it has to disclose everything known about his assets?—Yes; but this is to meet the case where the people do not want to have a receiver appointed.

18,179. Mr. Micklem: It would seem reasonable where you are going to certify a man that you should not only refer to his bodily condition, but that you should set out what he has got, as far as you know it?—Quite.

Chairman: I wonder what sanction could attach to that, in order to secure that the disclosure was complete; a relative would not always know.

Mr. Micklem: You would not always want it to be complete.

Witness: This would merely show that the patient had property. Then the petition might also contain an undertaking by the petitioner that he would apply to the Lunacy Department if the patient was not dead or better within six months; then you would get your details of property when actually required; you put an obligation upon him.

18,180. Earl Russell: Indeed, would you not want to know, whether he made application or not to the Master in Lunacy, that there was such a case in existence?—Either that, or you would do it through the Board of Control on the certificate.

18,181. Still, if you have any suspicions, you can always put the Official Solicitor in motion?—Yes, quite.

18,182. Chairman: This might fall into line with certain other recommendations we have received, namely, that persons, before certification, should be subjected to some form of provisional detention and, possibly, observation; and during that period, which would be a temporary detention, it would be unnecessary to have anything to do with the estate, because it would all be provisional?—Quite.

18,183. But that, on formal certification, which means that the case has declared itself as one requiring treatment for a longer period, you should be notified of the estate of the patient?—Yes.

18,184. Earl Russell: Do you happen to know what happens to the estates of persons convicted of felony?—Yes.

18,185. Of course, as a rule, there are not many, but in that case there is the administrator appointed under the Act, or ought to be?—Do you mean the Broadmoor cases?

18,186. I was thinking of ordinary convictions for felony. I mean in every case the property devolves upon an administrator while the man is in prison?—Yes.

18,187. That is somewhat similar, because I should imagine in a good many cases nothing is ever done. It is only in the big case?—Of course, they are not lunatics; if they are lunatics they are not convicted. Broadmoor cases are people detained as lunatics who are criminal lunatics, and there they have receivers in the ordinary way.

18,188. They are of course not necessarily convicted felons?—No, they would not be. They are a very happy class, in a way, because there the Treasury are most generous; they always let them use the whole of their property for their comforts; they seldom want anything for maintenance.

18,189. Are you brought into contact at all with the voluntary patient?—Yes, a certain number of our "D" cases, the uncertified ones do go as voluntary patients to various institutions.

18,190. When you say a "D" case, you are referring to Section 116, of course?—Yes, the uncertified cases.

18,191. You may have an uncertified case becoming a voluntary inmate of a registered hospital?—Yes.

18,191A. And that person has a receiver?—Yes.

18,192. But not all voluntary patients possessed of means would necessarily have a receiver, would they?—Oh, no.

18,193. Only such persons as desire to become voluntary patients and are incapable of managing their own affairs would have a receiver appointed to them?—Yes.

18,194. Would you not also require to consider the possibility of a voluntary boarder reaching such a stage in his or her illness as to require the appointment of a receiver? The voluntary patient might quite well start in a state capable of giving instructions for his or her affairs, and the illness might become more accentuated later?—Not only the voluntary people; there may be a great many people who are incapable but who are not certified; I do not see how you are going to get any machinery under which you can interfere unless the matter is brought to the court voluntarily.

18,195. It looks as if any order, whether for the pauper or the private patient, contemplating a more or less continued period of detention, should perhaps be accompanied by an intimation to you if there is any estate?—Yes, I certainly agree to that.

18,196. Then further, to complete your proposal, you suggest that the case of estates under a limit, say, of £500 of capital value, or £50 per annum, should be under the jurisdiction of the County Court Judge?—Yes.

18,197. Then you would give a kind of lunacy jurisdiction to the County Court Judges?—I think probably that would have to be limited in some way, because there is no machinery now. Probably such of the County Court Judges as have now bankruptcy jurisdiction could do it; but I do not think that would help matters; it does mean new machinery of course.

18,198. And I do not quite see how the County Court Judge could discharge the functions that you discharge in looking after the welfare of a person. The County Court Judge would appoint a receiver and the small means would be in the control of the receiver; but who is to look after the receiver and find out whether he is applying the money properly and whether the patient is getting the benefit of his money,—things which I understand you in your Department look after, so far as receivers appointed by you are concerned?—Yes, I suppose County Courts would have to do that; and of course certified cases have the Board of Control to look after that; the County Courts might be limited to the certified cases; after all, most of the small cases are certified cases.

18,199. Earl Russell: We do not want anything to make the voluntary system more difficult by limiting this to certified cases where there is property?—Quite.

18,200. Of course, a person who is a voluntary patient may be always subject to undue influence.

25 May, 1925.]

Mr. G. M. HILDYARD, K.C.

It is not desirable that they should manage property?—Quite. After all, in a certified case notice is given to everybody in a way by the certification; in the other case people may not know, and a hoard of people may be battenning on him; but I do not see how you can get at it.

18,201. Chairman: I should have thought that some machinery for dealing with the property of insane persons is very desirable in all cases, because apart altogether from the point of view of their personal welfare, I can imagine that many afflicted persons would be worried and anxious about their affairs and that the course of their cure might actually be impeded?—They are very much; we find that.

18,202. What I am thinking of is this, that a person who is worried, not a very acute case but a mentally disordered person, might have his or her worries greatly increased by the thought that his or her business was going to the dogs while they were in an asylum, or that their affairs were getting into the hands of undesirable persons, and so on?—Quite.

18,203. Whereas, if they knew that their affairs were in responsible hands and would be looked after by a responsible and neutral person, that particular anxiety would be allayed?—Quite.

18,204. Earl Russell: You cannot get over the trouble of a personal business; you cannot continue to run that; I mean a fried fish shop or an auction room?—No; that is very difficult.

18,205. Chairman: I think we have now covered the points which you have been good enough to put before us in your précis?—Of course, some of your detention points are of great interest to me. You may say that primarily I am interested in the property, but, secondarily, I am interested in seeing that the property is used in the best way for the patients. I have no doubt you have already considered the sort of things that trouble me; I mean the difficulty of dealing with these patients who have got some delusions but who are not insensible, who quite understand their position, and have not got enough money to be kept entirely on their own, people who have to be sent to an asylum because there is nowhere else to send them; and one cannot help doing that even when you are providing about £60 or £70 a year for the person's benefit. They are living in the same wards as maniacs very often, and they are having a very bad time. I do not know whether you have been able to devise any method of classification, which would enable one to secure that patients who felt the unpleasant part of their surroundings could be put, without great expense, into a place where they would be better looked after.

18,206. On the occasion of your visits to patients, have you encountered that sort of thing?—I do not visit much myself, you know; I have too much work to do up here; I cannot get away. My Visitors report, and I do see some of these people after they have got better, when the receiver is discharged, and they tell me these things; and, again, I see the relatives; and, without accepting everything one is told, it is common sense. One of the great difficulties even of certification is that there are some of these patients who are perfectly fitted to be out of the asylum if they had only got someone to take care of them; they do not think they are lunatics, and they are not lunatics in many senses; still, owing to the lack of space and money, they have got to consort all their time with people who are in a very much worse mental condition.

18,207. Earl Russell: Is not the only way to improve that by an extension of the open door and the parole system, which the doctors are now trying to do?—Yes; but the difficulty is that a person in that state is not thoroughly capable of looking after himself.

18,208. Neither are those who are given parole?—No.

18,209. Mr. Micklem: Does not that point to the necessity of further after care provision for these people?—Yes; I think that is of great value.

18,210. Sir David Drummond: Or a more perfect classification?—That is what was rather in my mind.

18,211. Chairman: We have heard a great deal on the possibility of better classification; it is very interesting to hear your experiences, too. It becomes in the end of the day of course largely a question of money?—I can understand that.

18,212. Because to have very discriminating classification obviously means more accommodation?—Yes.

18,213. Earl Russell: Small wards and many attendants must cost more?—They must. I suppose it is impossible in any way to disturb the County system and to say one asylum for one type and another asylum for another type?

18,214. Possibly, if you had the Lancashire and Cheshire combination you might do it?—If it is for the good of the country, the county must give way.

18,215. Mr. Micklem: Your suggestion rather was that classification might depend to some extent upon the amount they are paying. I rather gathered that you suggested that, but that is not the view you press, is it?—No, I did not really mean that. I really did feel rather that if you were paying for your maintenance you would be supplying some of the money that would be necessary to improve classification.

18,216. Chairman: I quite see your point: that a person who is paying a small but still a reasonable sum of money is not getting value for it, if he is receiving no better attention and no better privacy than the person who is there as a pauper and who is purely rate-aided?—He is not getting value for his money.

18,217. Earl Russell: And from his point of view it is a large sum of money, of course?—Yes, possibly using up his capital which, after all, is very hard. It does seem to me that classification, if it can possibly be improved, is of enormous importance.

18,218. Chairman: There is one other small matter. The receivership continues until it is terminated by a discharge, of course?—Yes.

18,219. What is the position of the patient after he or she has been set free from the asylum (I am taking a certified case) but the receiver is still in the saddle?—As far as I am concerned, the decertification makes no difference at all; that is to say, the receiver continues as receiver until the application is made for the discharge of the receiver.

18,220. Earl Russell: You take no official notice of the other?—No.

18,221. Chairman: Therefore, that person, who has been actually discharged cured from the institution, would be unable to touch any part of his income or capital until such time as the receiver had actually been discharged?—That is so. In that case, if he has really been discharged cured and recovered, it is automatic almost; he has only got to apply, and there is an end of it.

18,222. But the person, having recovered, knows what steps to take for his own protection?—Yes.

18,223. Earl Russell: Do you mean to say that if he came to you and produced a certificate which said "Discharged cured," that would be sufficient?—Yes.

18,224. Chairman: If you had a "Discharged cured" case, you would yourself proceed to relieve the person of the burden of the receivership?—Quite.

18,225. But until the receivership is actually removed by a formal step, the patient, whether recovered or not recovered, cannot touch any of his means?—No. Of course, one is bound to realise that if a person has been for some years without any control or authority, without any responsibility, and not looking after themselves at all, in an asylum, it is not a bad thing to have a short period when they come out in order to let them get used to the world before they do take over their property.

18,226. Suppose they wanted a little money right away?—They would get it.

25 May, 1925.]

Mr. G. M. HILDYARD, K.C.

18,227. From whom?—From us, in the same way. They might apply and say: "I want to start a business and I must have a little bit of my capital."

18,228. Have you a discretion?—Yes, we have the widest discretion in dealing with everything, capital and income.

18,229. Earl Russell: Supposing a person is discharged at the request of the petitioner, what do you require then to discharge the receivership?—The medical officer, and if there is any doubt, one of the Lord Chancellor's Visitors goes to see the patient. Of course, it is in a sense rather a suspicious state of circumstances; one has to be careful.

18,230. I am thinking of a case that is going on in which the receivership was discharged some years ago rather under those circumstances?—Yes.

18,231. Chairman: Now have you had any experience of licensed houses?—Yes.

18,232. Have you any observation to make to us upon their utility?—Well, of course I have a very great difficulty always in finding the maintenance I want at the cost which I can afford. There are people of every kind of varying incomes, and without an enormous variety of institutions, you can never get places for them. I do not know really quite how the licensed houses differ from some of the other hospitals; I do not quite know what their position is; but we want them all, as far as my part of it is concerned.

18,233. Earl Russell: The essential difference is that a licensed house is run for private profit?—Yes, but it does not make a very great difference from our point of view. If a licensed house will provide maintenance for a patient at a sum which he can afford, it does not matter to us whether they make a profit out of it.

18,234. Chairman: The licensed house has rather come under the suspicion of the Legislature as being a place where people make money out of the afflicted, and because there is a possible conflict between interest and duty—duty to the patient and their own interest in such cases. Have you ever come into contact with abuses in connection with licensed houses?—I do not think so. Some of them charge more than one thinks they ought to charge and obviously they are anxious to make money out of it, but I do not think there are real abuses. One cannot help realising that a medical superintendent must be a little biased by the fact that a particular patient is providing a great proportion of his income; but I cannot say that I ever knew of anyone who had been kept in a licensed house who ought not to have been kept there. After all, the Board of Control has power; and if anybody thinks the patient is all right, the medical superintendent ought not to be able to put his spoke in the way.

18,235. Sir David Drummond: Then you see no reason why licensed houses should not be increased?—No. Of course, it would be better, I suppose, ruling out that particular difficulty anyhow, if you could take their places by other houses; if you could have Government institutions doing the work they are doing, without making a profit out of it. If you merely provide nothing, I do not know where my patients are going.

18,236. Chairman: You see, it is thought that they cater for a particular demand, namely, a place where patients can go, who dislike being in State institutions. There is a class of people who prefer to be in some place which is the equivalent of a nursing home, and merely because they happen to be mentally afflicted, it is a licensed house; it is thought that that class of person prefers the licensed house?—I do not know; I am not quite clear about these licensed houses. Do you include places like St. Andrew's and Holloway Sanatorium?

Earl Russell: Holloway is not run for profit.

18,237. Chairman: The licensed house is really an institution where patients are received and housed for gain. The registered hospitals are all maintained out of endowments or from payments made by private patients which are utilised for the benefit of the establishment, but never go into any private person's pocket?—I cannot quite see why it should make any difference to a patient or even to his relations.

18,238. There is this element, is there not, that in the one case there may be a temptation to exploit the patient?—Yes; but you were saying, I thought, that they were necessary because patients would rather go to a licensed house than to St. Andrew's or to the Holloway Sanatorium; they would obviously rather go there than go to a county asylum.

18,239. The distinction does not exist in Scotland either, and we have only one small licensed house?—Quite. I have never realised anyway that there was any feeling either in the patients' or their relations' minds as between the two classes of place.

18,240. But have you found that there are sufficient registered hospitals in the country?—No; you would have to take their place by something else.

18,241. At present the class you have in mind is catered for by the licensed house and the registered hospital?—Yes.

18,242. I suppose even with both, you often have difficulty in getting accommodation?—We have not much difficulty with a rich patient; the difficulty is with the patient whose income is up to £200 a year.

18,243. That, again, points to this, that the monetary side of the transaction may be unduly prominent?—Yes, I think that may be so. Of course, one realises that £100 a year is not very much to keep anybody on, whether it is in an institution or anywhere else.

18,244. Earl Russell: No; that is below the guardians' rate—£100 a year?—Below a great many guardians' rates, yes; but that is why so many of the small estate people have to go into asylums; the private side of the county asylum is the only place you can get for a person with £120 a year; a nursing home is impossible.

18,245. Chairman: Of course, they could not live out of an asylum either on that amount?—They could not.

18,246. They cease to be wage-earners when they become inmates of an institution?—Quite.

18,247. The £100 a year eked out with what they earn would be adequate?—Yes.

Chairman: We are very much obliged to you Master Hildyard, for your contribution to our evidence.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HON. H. P. MACMILLAN, K.C. (in the Chair)
THE EARL RUSSELL.
SIR HUMPHRY ROLLESTON, BART., K.C.B., M.D.
SIR ERNEST HILEY, K.B.E.
SIR DAVID DRUMMOND, C.B.E., M.D.
MR. W. A. JOWITT, K.C.
MR. NATHANIEL MICKLEM, K.C.
MR. H. SNELL, M.P.
MRS. C. J. MATHEW.
MISS MADELEINE SYMONS.

MR. P. BARTER (Secretary).

MR. W. FAIRLEY (Assistant Secretary).

Evidence of Mrs. F. M. GLANVILL, Mr. GEORGE HILL (Wandsworth Board of Guardians), and Dr. R. W. GILMOUR, M.B., B.Sc. (Durham), M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P. (Physician in Charge of St. Luke's Clinic).

Mrs. F. M. GLANVILL and Mr. GEORGE HILL, called and examined.

18,248. Chairman: This morning our witnesses are two members of the Wandsworth Board of Guardians, who are good enough to attend to put before us the views which they entertain in relation to the administration of the Lunacy laws from the point of view of the guardians. We have had the advantage, Mrs. Glanvill and Mr. George Hill, of reading your short note of the points to which you desire to draw our attention. I need scarcely say that at this stage of our inquiry we have had a great volume of evidence on all questions affecting the Lunacy Acts and, among other things, affecting a good many of the points to which you allude; but we should much appreciate any observations you would like to make in expansion of the topics you refer to. You first of all draw our attention to the matter of grading of patients. We should be happy to have an expression of opinion coming from a responsible body such as yours.—(Mr. George Hill): I think my first duty is to apologise to you if we put you to any inconvenience by being late.

18,249. We have retaliated by keeping you waiting a little time, because we had some business to transact, so we are quits.—Thank you. Well, Sir, I want you to bear in mind the friendly attitude with which we meet you this morning, with a view of suggesting as laymen any points that we think in regard to visiting might be helpful either to the Lunacy Commissioners or the committee that might attend. We thought in visiting these various asylums as guardians it was futile, simply useless, to go there year after year and be shown a number of patients who we were not even sure were our patients, only by name; they were not able to answer for themselves; we took it for granted they were our patients. But it struck me personally it was useless to go round unless one looked into the welfare of these poor things from our point of view.

A committee was formed with the view of making surprise visits. As I say, to view them on a special day when they are brought into you with their best clothes on, you did not see their inner life, and, in making a surprise visit, one had an opportunity of coming into contact with the life of the patients.

18,250. Just before you pass from that, you were of course visiting in pursuance of the right which you possess under the Lunacy Act, 1890, Section 201?—Yes.

18,251. The right at any time "between eight in the morning and six in the evening, to visit and examine any pauper lunatic chargeable to the union confined in any institution for lunatics, unless the medical officer of the institution delivers to the person or persons intending to make the visit a statement signed by him certifying that for the reasons set forth in the statement the visit would be injurious to the lunatic"?—Quite.

18,252. You have, therefore, a statutory right as guardians to enter at any time you please between the stated hours any lunatic asylum in which any paupers for whom you are responsible are resident?—Yes.

18,253. Now you exercise that right, I understand, by visiting from time to time, but it has been your practice to announce your visit beforehand?—Previously, yes.

18,254. You talk about instituting surprise visits; it had been your practice before to announce your visits?—Quite.

18,255. You are under no obligation to announce your visit?—Some five or six years ago when I first became a guardian, I was told I was not allowed to go unless I announced it first. I looked it up for myself; I think you will find that very few guardians, even in London, know the powers they have.

Earl Russell: Of course it is when the whole board of guardians see fit, I take it.

19 June, 1925.]

Mrs. F. M. GLANVILL and Mr. GEORGE HILL.

Chairman: Yes.Witness: Does that mean "guardians" or a "single guardian"?

18,256. The expression of the statute is "the guardians of any union shall be permitted whenever they see fit between eight in the morning and six in the evening, to visit and examine any pauper lunatic chargeable to" their union. However, we need not go into the legal question.—It is nice to know.

18,257. We are not going to give gratuitous opinions. In point of practice you had always announced your visits beforehand?—Yes.

18,258. You were not satisfied with those visits, and wanted to pay surprise visits, and, accordingly, instituted a series of surprise visits?—Yes, I thought it was useless.

18,259. When you were visiting on other occasions, that is to say, announced visits, did you get facilities for investigating any case that attracted your notice?—When one came to interview 300 or 400 patients, it did not give you much time.

18,260. What was the sort of programme?—You would receive a list. You would tell the doctor you had come to visit so many patients; they would be brought into a room, and the guardians would form themselves into a committee and sit there and interview each one individually, and just have a cheery word with them; that is all one can do in the space of time.

18,261. Did they make any complaint to you?—Yes, but one has to be very careful; as a layman one would not be in a position to go into difficult cases; one will always get complaints.

18,262. Earl Russell: But if you got a complaint of ill-treatment you would take some notice of it?—We should come to our own conclusion; you get used to that sort of thing when you are going round. When their plea is good, you can tell by the patient, more or less.

18,263. Chairman: What we are concerned with is this: the visit of the guardians is one of the safeguards for the patients?—Yes.

18,264. And one would like to know whether it is to any extent an effective safeguard, and whether a person who has a complaint, either on account of ill-treatment or undue detention, has an opportunity of interviewing a guardian and putting his case to an outside person interested in him, independently of the institution in which he happens to be?—We should take that up; we should report that. We should interview the doctor and ask the reason and report to our board.

18,265. Have you had any such cases in your experience where you went into the matter, investigated the matter yourself?—No. You are referring to the guardians as a body?

18,266. Yes?—(Mrs. Glanvill:) I consider we have.

18,267. You pay a visit to an institution; a patient there makes a complaint to you. What I want to know is whether you have had occasion to investigate any case?—(Mr. George Hill:) My point is this: as a body going round we have so many to see that we could not go into it. We should take notice of that complaint and report it; but where we go as a special committee, a surprise visit, we have found complaints which we will give you.

18,268. What one is anxious to know is whether an opportunity is afforded by the visit of the guardians to the patients to bring before an independent body like yourselves any matter which ought to be investigated. One wants to know whether there is contact maintained between the patients in the institution and the board of guardians interested in the patients' condition?—I will give you a case which Mrs. Glanvill will substantiate later. We might take the grading of patients. Our committee is not satisfied with the herding up in dormitories of, say, 100 patients together; we believe in sections according to the various complaints. I know I am touching on a wide subject now.

18,269. Classification?—Yes. Personally in my experience I see no difference between the mentally unsound and the mentally ailing. If there is a case of mental ailing, and they are all packed together in one dormitory, I do not see where the patient is going to benefit; and it seems a home of detention rather than a home of cure. In my view in going through crowded asylums, the rooms are uniformly decorated; but every room should be different, so that the patient is not always looking at that blue corridor, or that blue dormitory. The eye being an avenue to the brain, I submit that would have an effect, and anything that can be pleasing to the eye is pleasing to the brain. There are times when these poor creatures have their sane moments, and they must get tired, and they tell you this, of the same old walls. I submit this, that each ward should be decorated with something fresh, and that there should be sections—classification and sections. It is a big question I know, but we feel at the present moment that some of the institutions are doing a great work. Take, for instance, Horton or Long Grove—there is a beautiful villa system there.

18,270. Of course the amenities of life are one thing; the classification of the cases according to their degree of insanity is perhaps a little different. We have heard a great deal of evidence upon the desirability of segregating the cases and preventing the graver cases being brought into contact with the slighter cases, or the violent cases being brought into contact with the quiet cases. Upon that matter you may take it that we have really had a great amount of responsible evidence which has made a considerable impression on our minds; but you as a guardian will have necessarily in view the financial aspect of the thing?—I appreciate that on that point, but, on the other hand, is it going to be cheaper in the long run? I am speaking now with an experience derived from conversing with medical men, who tell me it is a big question, but it would be the cheapest for the country in the long run, certainly from a humane point of view.

18,271. There may be no question about the humane point of view; but are you thinking that, from the economical point of view, you might attain a larger percentage of recoveries if you had better surroundings?—Yes. I think the figures given by the London County Council of the recoveries are appalling. I do not see what there is at the present institutions to enable them to recover. There is more or less the same food; you do not get that in a private asylum; there one is studied more or less.

18,272. I am not sure, you know, that the percentage of recoveries in private asylums is so much better than those in the London County Council asylums?—I cannot speak with authority there, but I should say there are more facilities for getting more cures. Take a young girl, for argument's sake. I believe in the after-care. A girl, to my mind, through confinement ought never to go into an institution of that kind; I would treat her as an imbecile, not as of unsound mind. Many have asked me if they could go into an after-care home so that they could get some light work. When you get patients talking to you like that it must impress itself upon you. I am quite aware they have their rational moments, and one always allows for that sort of thing.

18,273. A suggestion has been made that patients should be moved from one institution to another after a stated interval of time, in order that they might have a change of surroundings such as you have suggested. You make a particular point in the note you have sent in of the patients being brought together, good and bad cases alike, on the visiting days?—And they also live together in common life.

18,274. This is not confined to the question of their all being brought before you together, but you are referring to the larger question of their living together?—That is right.

19 June, 1925.]

Mrs. F. M. GLANVILL and Mr. GEORGE HILL.

18,275. When they are brought before you, the whole of them would be brought before you, I suppose?—Our patients, yes.

18,276. And do you suggest that when they are brought before you they should not mix good, bad and indifferent, but that there should be some classification at that time also?—I do not mean when we see them.

18,277. The note is in that respect perhaps just a little misleading, because it suggests they were brought together at the time you were visiting; and does not necessarily mean that at other times they were living together; but your point is that the system of classification both on admission and after they have taken up their residence in the institutions should be more exhaustive?—Quite so.

18,278. Upon that we have heard a great deal of evidence and the point is fully before us?—Quite.

18,279. Earl Russell: Do you have the opportunity of going round the wards and seeing the patients in the surroundings in which they actually live?—We have not done hitherto, until the special committee was instituted. I did not know my powers until the committee was instituted.

18,280. Of course it is obviously more important that you should visit them and see how they live?—That is just my point, and I saw it was futile to go round as a body of men and say: "We visited this institution and we find it as well as can be expected,"—some such stereotyped reply as that.

18,281. I notice you say here something about your not being allowed to visit where you desire?—I will come to that, if I might, with the Chairman's permission.

18,282. Chairman: But whatever be your existing powers, what you would desire, I take it, in this matter is that the guardians should have an unrestricted power of visitation and of enquiry in any institution where the paupers for whom they are responsible are living?—That is right.

18,283. That any guardian should be entitled to go as a member of the board of guardians as and when he pleased and to see over the whole institution—is that what you would desire?—That is right.

18,284. Earl Russell: Did you say any member?—A member of the guardians.

18,285. Without the authority of the board of guardians?—It is out of courtesy. Even then, as the Chairman puts it, he would walk through as a guardian.

18,286. But do not you sometimes have irresponsible members whom it might be undesirable to allow to go and visit an asylum whenever they wished?—Do you mean undesirable guardians politically?

18,287. Chairman: No. Visitation is a most useful thing if it is conducted by discreet persons, but I think any of us who have had experience of public life know that not every one engaged in public life is necessarily discreet. Therefore the board of guardians themselves might say, "It is undesirable for us as a responsible body to have one of our members, who may not be the most discreet of our members, occupying himself in this matter and possibly causing trouble"?—I quite agree with you. Of course this committee is composed of chosen men and women; they are chosen by the board.

18,288. Lord Russell's point may be picked up in this way: that the guardians should as a board, or through any specially appointed persons, have the opportunity of visiting. Perhaps I put it too broadly when I suggested that any guardian at any time might go, because you might upset the routine of the institution very much indeed if you had people moving about at all times?—I quite appreciate that point. (Mrs. Glanvill): I suggest a committee of three.

18,289. The important thing is to ensure that the responsible body of guardians should have access at all times by proper representatives to an institution?—(Mr. Hill): Without giving notice.

18,290. Certainly, without giving notice?—That is my point.

18,291. If that were assured, you would be content?—You will bear in mind with regard to grading, the special care of women, if I might force my point there, that they should be put in an aftercare place instead of being put with the unsound.

18,292. What type of case have you in mind?—Childbirth.

18,293. Puerperal cases?—Yes. I take this very seriously and I feel it when I see these poor girls. There are other cases which one could mention but as you know it is a big question. But that is one of the vital points I would like gone into, because I do consider that they are more or less harmless. I am speaking now from experience, and having had conversations with various superintendents, and they agree with me upon this point.

18,294. You consider that this type of case requires special consideration?—I do. (Mrs. Glanvill): My idea would be this (of course it may not be possible):—but take Epsom, we have four large asylums there, Banstead and Horton, and so on, all within a three mile radius—would it be possible to have one set apart for the extreme cases, and so grade them up until they finally reach West Park, which is the most up-to-date one on the cottage principle, to be then set free to their homes? Of course one realises one would want a tremendous lot more attendants for the extreme insane; but you do not seem to have got sufficient staff to be able to cope with the extreme cases, and if they were in one building perhaps one could have more money spent upon that building and more attendants. I am only taking Epsom because there are four institutions in quite a small area; a few patients could be moved on until at last they reached the last one where they are almost in home surroundings; but if you could sort them out till they got to the last one, I think if it could be done it would be money well spent.

18,295. Where you have an authority which has a group of institutions under its charge it would be possible; indeed, it has been suggested that instead of each institution containing all classes of cases one institution might be set apart for one class, and another for another?—That is my point.

18,296. And it is one worthy of consideration?—(Mr. Hill): Of course they are all more or less poor patients; the other thing is to bring them as near home, as near their friends as possible. I came across a case the other day—a woman had to work nearly all night washing to be able to get her money to go to a certain institution; and she has applied for her relative to be brought as near home as possible to save the railway fare. She was a widow woman. One cannot always meet them to help them, but it is a tragedy when a woman has to go out working all night for that purpose.

18,297. Earl Russell: That is very true; but you see the geographical grading would just interfere with the other grading you are talking about?—Yes. Then there is the punishment of patients. We have evidence that there is punishment existing and going on at the present moment. If it had not been for this special visiting committee we should not have known of this case. We were told this man was in the infirmary, they said "Oh yes, you can go along to the infirmary." We saw him in bed; we interviewed him and asked him how he came by his injury. He had been kicked by an attendant; we spoke to the doctor. He said he did not notice it till five days afterwards when he was having a bath. I said: "It is strange; should it not be brought to your notice immediately the patient is injured?" "Well," he said, "we did not notice it till he was having a bath five days afterwards; we found he was ruptured." We immediately held an inquiry. We found on going through and interviewing the attendants and nurses they hardly knew how it was done. It was not done in a scuffle, or in pulling him off a chair; and the point which we want to force home is that we are not satisfied with the evidence of this committee, which we consider is contradicting itself. On the one hand they say that it is impossible to take any notice of a mental person; they wind up by saying that he tells them himself that he did this 11 years ago on a bicycle. If you cannot take any notice in the first instance, why take notice of the suggestion that he has injured himself on a bicycle 11 years ago; it is contradictory; we could get no satisfactory evidence. Sir Frederick Willis gave us a very patient hearing, and we were transferred back to the institution again. The doctor was most courteous and he gave us every facility, but we could not get to the bottom of the evidence; we could not get at how the man was injured; no one would come forward and say how he was injured; no one knew. On our next surprise visit to that man we found him in a most acute ward with a black eye. I said, "Why is he put in this acute ward?" They said, "He has got worse." On the next visit we found him well cared for and in the recreation room. Of course, I am going to submit evidence to you that these men are put in acute wards, not actually punished by the attendants; that is the last thing I should say about the noble profession, the medical profession; they are doing all in their power, but I feel they are handicapped, so I would like to disabuse the mind of anyone who thinks we have a feeling against the medical profession.

18,298. Of course, you must remember this, that investigations on questions of fact into occurrences taking place in any institution whether it is an institution for the insane or not are often attended with great difficulty?—But they are judges of themselves. There are the institutions and the Board of Control, and they are sitting in judgment on themselves all the time. Who is to judge? I want an independent inquiry.

18,299. Earl Russell: What do you suggest could have been done that would have enabled anybody to arrive at a judgment in this case?—I was coming to that point.

Chairman: What kind of inquiry do you say would necessarily have led to a conclusive result, because even in the Law Courts results are not always conclusive?

18,300. Earl Russell: And presumably with sane witnesses?—I submit this. Who have more grounds to look after their patients than the guardians themselves? I submit that immediately one of our patients is injured we should be notified and enabled to go down and visit. They have not given us any report; in fact, I think, if I remember aright, that they object to us attending when an inquiry is being held on our own patients. I ask: why should not your asylums be like the hospitals—an open door?

18,301. Chairman: Take this particular case you have in mind. You tell us that every facility was given you. Did you go down yourselves, and through your committee interview nurses and so on?—I asked for that, and I was refused, and we asked then to go before the Board of Control, and Sir Frederick Willis said he did not think we had that right, as he thought that the visiting committee would have gone into that matter, and he did not think the guardians ought to ask for that, but in this case he did not wish to burke anything at all; he would write to the superintendent and ask for us to have another interview and have the attendant there.

18,302. Then you did interview the attendant?—No; we interviewed the doctor, but the doctor had heard from Sir Frederick and the attendant was missing that day. That is quite usual, when we want to find an attendant he has always got the day off. We had no opportunity of interviewing the nurses as you suggest.

18,303. Earl Russell: Was an inquiry held by the Board of Control themselves in this case?—No; the Mental Hospital Sub-Committee held an inquiry.

18,304. What do you suggest, supposing you, or the Chairman here, held an inquiry, could have been done more than that inquiry did to get at the facts?—We ask that the guardians should be allowed at the inquiry when an injury occurs.

Chairman: To a pauper patient under your charge?

18,305. Earl Russell: Do you think anything more could have been got out?—We do; we are not satisfied. I think the doctor and Sir Frederick were perfectly honest about it; but I think the whole evidence was wrong. (Mrs. Glanvill): May I suggest here that I really think that had we been present (either of us that had found the man in bed in the first instance) we should not have agreed with these two reports as we got them. They may have satisfied us; but, as it is, coming to our knowledge from outside that there are punishments going on and that you can punish a patient without a mark showing, we thought it would have been more satisfactory if we had seen the attendant. We found these two reports did not quite agree.

18,306. Chairman: Again, looking at it from the point of view of improving the procedure, would the guardians be satisfied if, on any occurrence taking place in an asylum in relation to one of their pauper patients which in their view required investigation, they were allowed to take part in the formal investigation?—(Mr. Hill): Then we should be satisfied.

18,307. If you have a locus standi to be represented at an inquiry relating to one of your patients?—That is the point.

18,308. In order that you may put forward your views and have attention drawn to matters which you regard as important?—That is the point. We were told no punishment ever exists. A week after I made a special visit to Hanwell; I asked a certain doctor there if they ever had any cruelty there, bearing this case in mind. They knew who we were when we visited, there was a stampede; they knew all about the case at Epsom. He said, "We have just discharged a nurse now. A mother came in to visit her son and found both his eyes blacked"; there was a case, then, of prosecution. It does exist, and the doctor found it; probably we should not have known that, unless the mother had asked to see the doctor because her son was injured.

18,309. The records of all institutions show that a certain number of attendants are discharged because they do not fulfil their duties properly; that is an inevitable incident. The important thing is to see that these cases do not escape investigation?—That is just our point.

18,310. Miss Symons: I suppose apart from actually ascertaining the facts you are likely to be asked about cases of that kind, and are not able to deal with them if you have not access to all the facts?—Quite.

18,311. Mr. Snell: Do you find that relatives of patients make complaints to you as guardians?—Yes. I suppose I have 100 letters. This committee are not in the least advocating release; we are simply laymen, and we leave that to the medical side. Some of the officials have thought that our main purpose was to get these poor things released.

18,312. Chairman: That would be futile, of course. I think, if one may put your general point, it is this: that as guardians you have certain responsibilities towards those pauper patients, and that the existing system does not give you the facilities which you would like to discharge that duty?—That is our point. I have got another case which I am investigating now of a girl; her hair was pulled entirely out of her head, and her father went and fetched her away; so that cruelty does exist, and we think special visiting committees will act as a check. They tell us the Commissioners had not seen them that year; it may have been that the year was not up and they would come the next day, but they had not seen them. There should be an independent body. This special visiting committee to my mind would be a kind of check; they would know there was someone round about.

18,313. Mr. Jowitt: Mrs. Glanvill used the phrase about punishments without leaving a mark, and you were saying you had had about 100 letters, and then you broke off. Is it frequently suggested that this punishment does take place?—It is.

18,314. And what is the nature of the punishment? Is it some physical violence, or is it suggested that they are made to drink drugs, or are they deprived of food?—Yes, there is a case of punishment in that way—I do not want to go into details.

18,315. That is a common complaint, is it?—That is so. I will substantiate it in this way: there is a City merchant who did well, and who was in a well established business, and who, through the war, through the bombs, went temporarily deranged. His wife thought he was not quite sound, so had him put away; he had not been there long, and he felt himself that he was well, and he said to the superintendent, "I feel a different man altogether." He was released after about nine months, but he said that during the six months he was there he had seen untold cruelty: where a patient had pushed an attendant or even hit him, they took him into the lavatory and both punched him. He saw it himself, and the doctor saw them taking him, and said, "What is the matter?" They said, "Oh, he is a terror; we have just shut him up for a little while." Then, of course, they reported this. If they do not punish the patient themselves, the way they have got of getting them punished is to put them into an acute ward where they are bound to be punished by other patients. I have proof of that at Hanwell, where, when I went in what I call "Dante's Inferno," it was an appalling place; there was a young fellow there near the gates looking through the bars of the steps as we went through, who said, "May I have a word with you?" He spoke quite rationally; he said: "I have been put here because I have tried to escape." I said: "You should not do that." He said: "I have been put here amongst these chaps, and they often give me a good thrashing." I spoke to the assistant doctor, and said: "You heard what that young man said?" He said: "Yes, he is put there for punishment; he will not want to escape again." I said: "That is wrong, to put patients into an acute ward purposely to receive punishment." That is a case.

18,316. Do you say the assistant doctor admitted it?—Yes; we have got witnesses of this.

Earl Russell: What was the name of the doctor; I think we must have it now we have had this statement?

18,317. Chairman: There is a point of view, you know, which one must keep in mind in visiting these places: the refractory ward is, of course, the ward in which, as you tell us, the more violent patients are kept; it is the ward in which the largest number of attendants are available?—Quite.

18,318. One has heard this explanation given of a violent patient being put into the refractory ward, that it is not so much from the point of view of punishment as to enable that patient to be properly taken charge of, because in the other wards there are fewer attendants, and a violent patient there would be very disturbing to the other patients.—Appreciated. I say a fairly normal patient is put into this acute ward to receive punishment because he did something wrong.

18,319. May it not be because, having become violent, he will probably be best treated there in the sense of having most supervision?—Quite. I have made a statement. I am quite prepared to go to Hanwell. It was the young assistant doctor who showed us round, and he said: "Oh, yes, he is put there for punishment." Various members of this committee will prove this. I say it is wrong. If that system does go on, it is not right, and should not be allowed.

18,320. Mr. Snell: Did you have any evidence as to the time he had been in the courtyard?—He had only just been put there. In trying to escape he had given the attendant a severe kick. He had been there three or four days, I believe.

18,321. Was any indication given as to the time he would be likely to be kept there as a punishment?—No.

18,322. Sir David Drummond: What action did you take when you heard that?—Reported it to our board.

18,323. And what action did your board take?—That is the whole cause of this enquiry; we have simply led up to it; we have written to you and asked you to receive us.

18,324. That is all you have done?—We are powerless.

Sir Humphry Rolleston: It is very important to ascertain how much evidence there may be as to what part of the necessary treatment can be interpreted as being a punishment.

Chairman: I was anxious that that point of view should not escape notice.

18,325. Sir Humphry Rolleston: I am sure the witness would strengthen his contention if he had a certain number of statistics. I mean, we have heard one or two examples, which may be capable of interpretation in another way; but if he could give some statistics of the number of cases in which it appeared to him that definite punishment had been meted out to patients because they have manifested some evidence of insanity, it would be even more valuable than the evidence we have already had?—Of course, this committee has only just been appointed; we have not had much experience with the committee.

18,326. Mrs. Mathew: How long ago was this incident?—I suppose, roughly, about February. We have got the record of it, if you would like to have the record.

18,327. Mr. Snell: February of this year?—As far as my memory carries me.

18,328. Sir David Drummond: You have only referred to one case which would admit of proof—that is to say, we could call the doctor before us and have proof. That is the only instance you have, is it not?—I quite agree, that is sufficient for me. On the other hand, as I say, it is not fair for us to receive letters and submit to you cases of cruelty which are unfounded.

18,329. Chairman: Here was a patient, I understand, for whom you were responsible?—In Hanwell Asylum. I do not say we were responsible.

18,330. You were visiting as guardians, and your attention was attracted to the patient. I understand you to say that the patient had recently tried to escape?—That is right.

18,331. He had been foiled in his attempt to escape, and is then found in the refractory ward?—The acute ward.

18,332. At any rate in that special ward. That in itself was quite right?—It may be. I am simply telling you of our experience.

18,333. On the other hand, you said that patient told you he had been thrashed?—No, I said he had been put there for punishment, and the patients were knocking him about, not the doctor or the attendant. He was put into this particular acute ward so that he would get knocked about, and they do. (Mrs. Glanvill): They fight amongst themselves, that is what it is; and a man who is recovering from it, we take it, is put back, graded back, and then the punishment is quite sufficient, to be put back with maniacs—it would be to me if I was nearly sane.

18,334. Mr. Snell: When you left the asylum you were probably asked to make some comment in a book, to say that you had been a visitor?—Yes.

18,335. Did you register anything in this book showing your disapproval?—(Mr. Hill): No; what happened there was that, unfortunately, there were two committees; we happened to go, to save expense, in the same car; the ordinary visiting committee went there and we as a special visiting committee went the same day. The ordinary visiting committee saw the details, and they wrote in the book that they found everything satisfactory.

18,336. On the female side?—Yes. We signed with them, because we took our colleagues' word that the females were properly looked after. The ordinary visiting committee had not seen this acute ward that we had seen.

18,337. What I want to know is whether you, having seen and heard—We signed nothing in the book at all.

18,338. You did not even say you were dissatisfied?—I certainly did to the assistant, whoever he may be.

18,339. You did not write in the book?—No, we made no report at all.

18,340. Sir David Drummond: The important point is that the doctor admitted that the patient was put in the acute ward for punishment?—When I say the doctor, it was an assistant who showed us round, who I assumed was an assistant doctor.

18,341. Chairman: Do you know his name?—No, I should know him by person. They would have a record as to who showed us round.

18,342. We cannot get nearer to it than that at the moment.—I am not even going to say it was a doctor; I assume it was the assistant doctor who showed us round.

18,343. Can you give us the date of your visit?—Yes, I will send it to you.

18,344. The upshot of it is this, that that matter was not more fully investigated by you at the time, and what I understand you desire is that the guardians should have further powers of investigation?—That is right.

18,345. And I understand that your board attach value to those powers, because you think it would be an additional safeguard to your patients if such powers, under proper regulations, were confided to you?—Quite.

18,346. And you find at the present moment that your powers are inadequate for the purposes you have in view, which you think are important public purposes.—Yes.

18,347. Then you draw our attention to the condition of the padded rooms at Cane Hill Mental Hospital.—I submit on behalf of my committee that again this is in a very dark spot, and I am submitting again also it may be for a reason it is put there, but my submission is that although you have a padded cell, and a very acute case, there should be sufficient fresh air. In my opinion there was an insanitary padded cell.

18,348. Earl Russell: Did it smell?—It was not any too fresh. Just imagine when a patient comes to find herself in a place like that, like the Black Hole of Calcutta; there may be a reason that they should be put in a dark place, but I say there should be plenty of fresh air there.

18,349. Chairman: I venture to suggest that your language is quite exaggerated, because I have seen this padded room myself, and I certainly would not describe it as a Black Hole of Calcutta. It seems to me a great deal of harm can be done by using language of that sort in public?—It is a very dark place, it is a dark hole, of course it is, it is a padded place.

18,350. But that is the class of language which is seized upon by the public and gives the impression that public authorities dealing with suffering humanity are treating them inhumanely?—With great respect I withdraw that, regarding that particular phrase, but I wish to emphasise the darkness. Do not think for a moment that this committee intend to expose anything that is not true, or want to expose things with a view of causing a sensation. We want to help if we can.

18,351. Very often the cause of reform is injured by language of that extreme type, which is seized upon by the public and made the basis of allegations which are unfounded?—I hope no notice will be taken as to that particular phrase.

18,352. On the other hand any suggestions that can be made as to the improvement of these places are most helpful to us.

18,353. Earl Russell: Had it got shutters which could be opened?—No; what struck me was the insufficient air.

18,354. But how was it lighted?—Just a ray of light, as I saw it; when the door was shut there were simply four dark walls.

18,355. Sir Humphry Rolleston: What time of the day did you go?—About 3.30 or 4 o'clock.

18,356. What season of the year?—That would be in the winter time.

18,357. Earl Russell: What you say is it was dark. Were there any shutters there which were shut and which could be opened?—I did not notice; one of our lady guardians went in.

18,358. You did not make a very careful examination of this before condemning it?—The position was sufficient. I have been in a great many of these padded cells.

18,359. Chairman: It is right that we should inform Mr. Hill that, without any warning whatever, one or two of us went to this institution for the express purpose of looking at those rooms.—This particular room?

18,360. This particular room, and you may take it that it was absolutely a surprise visit. There was no intimation whatever made beforehand. While I quite agree that I should not care to have been in that room myself, I did not notice anything about it that seemed particularly objectionable. True there was nobody in it, therefore there may not have been such smells as I am afraid sometimes do occur, but it is very difficult to have the lighting arranged satisfactorily. A padded cell assumes a violent patient; the light must be introduced from fairly high up; otherwise the patient may do himself or herself damage by smashing glass. Also so far as the artificial light is concerned, they are in process of installing a better system there, and they are getting in electric light?—I am pleased to hear it. This was brought up by the ladies that went there, and I went and saw it, and I thought to myself: "It looks a very bad place, and seems very badly ventilated."

18,361. Mr. Snell: Was it by any chance a padded room reserved for what they call dirty cases?—It might have been.

18,362. Which would make some difference?—Yes. (Mrs. Glanvill): I was at Cane Hill last week on the women's side, and there was nothing to complain of there at all. I did ask: "Can you show me the cell that has been complained of?" They said, "It is probably one on the male side that opens out on the corridor."

18,363. Chairman: It was on the male side that I went to see the padded room. I went expressly to see it, because I wanted to see for myself. However, we may pass from that. Then we have dealt with the question of procedure on your visits, and also with the question of improvement of procedure when a case arises for investigation. I think the only remaining topic is the question of the clothing of the patients?—(Mr. Hill): It was a very cold day; we had all got our overcoats on. These poor fellows you could see had bare chests, were very thinly clad, and they came up to us and said: "Oh, we are cold." The doctor said: "These are very acute cases, and if you put good clothes on them they might tear them off."

18,364. Do you supply the clothes as guardians?—No, we do not supply them.

18,365. What do you pay for your patients?—It all depends; there is a uniform rate governed by the London County Council. (Mrs. Glanvill): It was 24s. 6d.; I think it has gone up. (Mr. Hill): I could not give you the exact figure.

18,366. Earl Russell: 24s. 6d.?—Yes, and, of course, so much as is collected from the patients' relations.

18,367. Chairman: That goes in relief of the burden on the guardians if a patient is able to pay himself?—(Mrs. Glanvill): I do not think we get any of that.

18,368. But do not you investigate cases chargeable to the rates?—Yes. I am chairman of that particular committee, but as to the money we get from the patients—I do not think we benefit from that; I think the London County Council get that, do not they?

Earl Russell: What you collect from the patients' friends goes into your poor rate.

18,369. Chairman: If the patient's means are sufficient to pay the charges then the patient is transferred to the private list, and is not treated as a pauper patient any longer?—We do not often get those.

18,370. You have a duty, of course, to investigate whether a pauper patient has or has not means?—We sit about seven hours every week on that. (Mr. Hill): We bring him before a magistrate to make an order, which we have done recently. (Mrs. Glanvill): On the clothing, the thing that struck us was this, that in many other asylums we had been to at the same period they were very well clothed indeed, and our point was: why could not those patients at Hanwell (it was a terribly cold day) have their overcoats issued? We had been a day or two before and seen very bad cases, but they all had overcoats on.

18,371. The matter of clothing is a very interesting question, and has a considerable effect upon the mind, as one knows. Are you in favour of the patients being allowed to have their own clothing, if their own clothing is suitable?—I am myself. (Mr. Hill): You must not interfere with the regulations.

18,372. Are you also in favour of the patients not being in uniform, so that even if they have clothes supplied to them there may be a certain amount of variety?—Yes, I am in favour of it.

18,373. You have visited a number of them yourself?—Every one of them under the London County Council.

18,374. As regards clothing, are your criticisms confined to one of these institutions only?—(Mrs. Glanvill): Because it was so cold; we thought that the poor creatures looked so perished.

18,375. This is a particular case that came under your notice?—(Mr. Hill): At Hanwell.

18,376. But as regards the other institutions where your patients are, were you satisfied?—Yes, the institutions differ so, that is what I cannot understand; we would like more uniformity. Then again, if they were cold I should have liked to have seen them have a place where they can retire to. You get a strong man who is very strong and never feels the cold—others, the least little wind and they put a light coat on, so it must apply to the unsound as well. Of course that is drawing the line very fine.

18,377. I think you may take it that we are alive to the importance of the question of clothing and of diet, and the treatment of patients?—Yes; those are my points. Ours is a committee instituted with a view of helping rather than causing anything in the nature of scandal or being dictatorial at all.

18,378. I think you will appreciate my observation, because one has to remember that there is a large public service engaged in a very difficult task. Reform is, of course, desirable in many departments in public life?—We shall always be very cautious not to express any words which we think will be hurtful to the relations—that is your point?

Chairman: If you please.

18,379. Earl Russell: You said you were coming back to that point I asked you, but you never did, whether you were prevented from visiting the whole of the institutions?—On our first visit to a certain institution we were told: "I do not know that you can go; you have not given us any notice; this has never been done before, walking in without giving us notice, and I doubt whether we can allow you to look over." I said: "I must refer to the section of the Act which gives us power." "You are a special visiting committee." "Yes." "I am sorry; I will show you over." We go to another one, and we are questioned for possibly 10 minutes or a quarter of an hour; there is such confusion. We do not consider it necessary; we do not want to waste the doctor's time. We consider that when we enter an institution and say who we are, one attendant can show us round. We do not want anything put in order; it should be in order before we get there.

18,380. That is all it comes to?—Yes.

18,381. Miss Symons: Do you ever drop in at dinner time?—We have been at meal times. (Mrs. Glanvill): My point is when we go as a visiting body we have so many patients, somewhere in the region of 400 at Long Grove. If you visit them you must notify them, or else the men may be out on the farms, or the women washing; you could not possibly do it. But if this little committee is allowed to continue as it is, and can just pop in and ask to see five, six, or seven patients, then that is how we really get more information than all the years we have done the visiting, when they have simply passed by the table, with "This is So-and-so, and this is So-and-so." It is true that we have been able to find out things, and we hope to be able to get them quietly put right.

18,382. Sir David Drummond: How much time do you spend when you make your visit?—Taking Long Grove the women are all on one side, and the men are on the other side; the two ladies take the women, and the two gentlemen take the men. They just file past the table. You use your own discretion. Sometimes they are too bad, but if there is anybody who wishes to speak to you they do speak to you, and it is all over. That goes on, and that will probably take you at Long Grove two to three hours.

18,383. That is an average?—You can see in that two or three hours perhaps 200 or 250 patients, as the case may be, but if we go with the small committee we go much slower.

18,384. Mrs. Mathew: Have the guardians power to demand an enquiry of themselves?—No, I am afraid not.

18,385. Chairman: No; I think you could only make representations to the Board of Control regarding any case, and if they treated it as a serious case necessitating investigation they have the power, of course, to conduct a formal enquiry, and they do from time to time conduct such formal enquiries?—(Mr. Hill): We do not wish to be officious in any shape or form. If you wish to see a model house you should go to the Flower House at Beckenham.

18,386. Sir Ernest Hiley: Can you tell us whether the guardians adopt any means of classification of the patients in their own workhouse?—Yes. We have workshops, and outdoor gardening and such like, they are all dissected. If we have an acute case it is sent away at once.

18,387. And what do you do with the old senile cases?—They are put in comfortable quarters by themselves.

18,388. Not with the acute cases?—No. That is what we advocate now, we maintain that many, many patients could be brought into an aftercare place.

18,389. You are satisfied with your own classification?—We are at our particular institution.

(The witnesses withdrew.)

Dr. RICHARD WITHERS GILMOUR, M.B., B.Sc. (Durham), M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P., called and examined.

18,390. Chairman: Dr. Gilmour, you are Physician in charge of St. Luke's Hospital Clinic and of the wards for functional nervous diseases of the Middlesex Hospital?—Yes.

18,391. I think you can best assist us by telling us a little about your clinic itself; it is a topic which we are naturally very much interested in?—Should I read what I have written?

18,392. I think that would be quite a good plan, if you did so, and add any matter that occurs to you as you proceed?—The St. Luke's Hospital, which was one of the registered hospitals for mental diseases and which, of course, stands on the same basis as the general voluntary hospitals in mental work, closed in 1916, as its leasehold interests in the site were sold. After the war efforts were made to reopen, but owing to labour troubles and the increased cost of building it was decided to open in London a clinic, comprising an out-patient department and a few beds for the treatment of functional nervous and uncertified mental cases.

18,393. Up to that time had the hospital received certified cases in the usual way?—In the old days, yes, and then we took in voluntary boarders, ten years before it closed.

18,394. This was really a new departure?—This was a new departure; we had no regular out-patient department. Great difficulty was found in securing a site for this clinic, and at last a suggestion was made by Dr. Bond, on behalf of the Board of Control, that an effort should be made to get into touch with one of the large general hospitals in London, with a view to starting the scheme in conjunction with an existing neurological department. The Governors of St. Luke's Hospital readily agreed to this course, as they were anxious to avail themselves of any facilities which the present laws allowed them of treating cases without the necessity of certification, and away from the popular prejudice attaching to the name of Mental Hospital. With the kind assistance of Dr. Bond, of the Board of Control, the Governors got into touch with the Board of Governors of the Middlesex Hospital, and with their co-operation the present scheme was started as a part of the Neurological Department of that Hospital. Work commenced in the out-patient department in November 1922, and the wards were opened in June of the following year. Our ward block consists of two small wards with three beds each, with separate bathrooms and lavatories, a small treatment room and a ward kitchen. It is just a block on a floor by itself. The nursing staff is supplied by the St. Luke's Hospital authorities. The four principal reasons for having such a clinic as this at a general hospital appear to me to be these: that the patients at the present time will come readily to the out-patient department of a general hospital, very many of whom would not go to a mental hospital on account of the name. That I think applies to those patients who know nothing about mental hospitals; those who have been for the first time to the Maudsley, go at once freely and almost sooner than to a general hospital, I believe; but those who never have been to a mental hospital shirk the name, though they would go at once to a general hospital. The word "mental" to some people calls up the word "insane", they do not realise that the word "insane" is no more a medical term than the word "illness". "Insane" is really a legal or medico-legal term. They also picture all sorts of horrors which are usually supposed to go on in the asylums. The second point was that the knowledge that they have been admitted to a general hospital for treatment makes patients realise that they are considered to be really ill in the ordinary sense of the word, and not that they are peculiar and are being shut up or being put away. That is good for two reasons. In the first place, it helps very much in treatment, and, in the second place, it helps them to realise what their illness is when they are treated like that, and when they see other people about them who are truly physically ill. Then the third point was that in the very large majority of mental cases it is found that expert examination or treatment is necessary, such as for eyes, ears, and various things, and also some special laboratory facilities for examination and diagnosis. Those, of course, were at hand at a general hospital at once; and I have found that that is a most extremely useful thing; because the majority of patients I get in require their teeth, ears or something seen to; I merely send them downstairs to the special department, and they are done at once. Then the fourth point is this: when it is realised that mental affection often gives rise to physical symptoms and that physical illness probably always causes mental alteration, it is easily understood that many purely functional cases come to a general hospital complaining of physical symptoms, and also that others come complaining of indefinite mental or nervous symptoms, which on careful examination are found to have some physical disease as their cause. The functional nervous and mental cases which come to the general hospital complaining of physical symptoms would naturally never go to a mental hospital to seek advice, since they do not realise that their trouble is mental, and think that it is physical.

18,395. May we pause there just a moment? I understand that by your clinic you have provided an establishment for the treatment of in-patients and out-patients who are suffering from mental disorder but not certified?—Yes.

18,396. And that it is run by you in association with the Middlesex Hospital, which is a general hospital?—Yes.

18,397. And that you are really carrying on the work of your original hospital on those new lines at a new place, and now in association with a general hospital?—Yes, at a general hospital.

18,398. Therefore you are able to illustrate to us a type of institution which has been commended to us, namely, an institution for the treatment of mental disorder in association with a general hospital, and where both in- and out-patients are treated?—Yes, we have both.

18,399. Then has it gone the length of amalgamation with a general hospital, or are you, so to speak, a separate unit in association with it?—That I am afraid I cannot tell you really, because it did not lie within my province, but it is associated in this way: we work at the Middlesex the wards which were supplied to us; I think the St. Luke's authority pay something towards the decoration of them, and so on.

18,400. Do you conduct this clinic under the same roof as the Middlesex Hospital?—Yes, it is under the roof of the Middlesex Hospital.

18,401. Then certain wards were allotted to you?—One little ward block; I only have six beds, but it is in the Middlesex Hospital above one ward, and under some sleeping rooms for some of the staff.

18,402. You have an in-patient department consisting of a ward in the Middlesex Hospital dedicated to your particular purpose?—Yes.

18,403. Then you have, I suppose, an out-patient room for receiving patients?—I see out-patients together with the neurologist; we see them in the same out-patient department at the same times.

18,404. Then you are, I take it, the visiting physician there, are you?—Of my wards, yes.

18,405. Of your department?—Yes.

18,406. Who is the resident?—The wards are looked after by the house physician, and one of the physicians as well.

18,407. As part of his work?—Yes.

Dr. RICHARD WITHERS GILMOUR, M.B., B.Sc. (Durham),
M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P.

18,408. In that way you will have quite an intimate association between that ward and the other wards in the general hospital?—Yes.

18,409. On the patients' side of it, I take it, a contribution is made from the funds of St. Luke's Hospital?—They pay practically for the upkeep of it.

18,410. In recognition of the fact that you are getting that accommodation and are enabled to carry on your special work under the roof of the Middlesex Hospital?—Yes.

18,411. Now on the general policy you commend that type of institution to us as being likely to attract cases which otherwise might be repelled by the existing system?—I think many are attracted.

18,412. Are they incipient cases mostly that you receive?—Yes, mostly.

18,413. All slight cases?—Some are slight. The first man that I took in—I may say I was not resident in London then, and I wondered what was going to happen, my hand was rather forced on taking the case in. I found that a very suspicious young strong upstanding man came in who had had very great business troubles which caused his breakdown; and he was looking in an extraordinary suspicious way, and was I thought on the verge of acute mania. His father who was, I think, an Ex-Inspector of the Metropolitan Police, told me it had taken six of them to keep him in bed the night before and look after him. However he had agreed to come to the Middlesex Hospital and he came. I said, "You know where you have come to?" He said, "Yes." "You see exactly what the wards are; I will take your word you are not to escape, if you will give it me." He gave me his word. For three days I wondered whether he was going to break out. He settled down; he was with us, I think, for six or eight weeks, and he comes up now often to see me. But the night before it was a question whether they would have to certify him to remove him.

18,414. Sir David Drummond: You took considerable risk?—Yes, but my hand was forced, and I had to take it.

18,415. Chairman: You must have a very considerable measure of discretion as to the class of cases you receive?—Absolutely.

18,416. All cases would not be adapted to treatment in such a clinic?—Certainly not; I was going to say few truly insane would be.

18,417. But you desire to attract the class of person who for the moment is repelled by the existing institution, in order that you may, if possible, cure such cases, and prevent their ever reaching the stage of certification—that is the aim?—That is the aim absolutely.

18,418. Have you found in experience that there is quite a considerable number of patients of that sort, who can be benefited by such treatment outside the existing asylum treatment and escape altogether from certification?—I think from what I have written on the work done here you will see that that is so.

18,419. Perhaps you might give us a little of your experience?—The conditions of admission under which patients come are that they shall be capable of understanding and be fully aware that they are coming into a general hospital, and then that they come in by their own desire and expressed wish; that is essential. Further I just tell them that they must obey the rules of the hospital, and the friends of the patient must agree to remove the case if called upon to do so.

18,420. These cases are entirely voluntary?—Yes; they do not even sign a paper, I simply see them when they come in. If I am taking in merely a functional case I do not trouble to talk to them like that, I take it for granted as one would a patient in a general ward; but in the case of anyone who is apt to give trouble I take their word for it, and there is no paper signed at all by the friends or the patient, 18,421. Do you find they come alone or in company with friends or relatives generally?—To the out-patient department they very often come alone; coming in they are almost always accompanied by a relative or friend.

18,422. Do you reject some as being unsuitable?—In the applications for admission?

18,423. Yes, or those who have come to you as out-patients whom you might have transferred to the in-patient department if you thought fit?—Very often. I have taken patients in from Peterborough without seeing them, on the letter of a doctor.

18,424. If you find that the case is unsuitable for your institution what do you do?—Then, as I point out further on in what I have written, I have to call on the friends to remove the patient.

18,425. But you take no written obligation from your patients at all, so that they may leave, if they please, at once, just as a patient in a general hospital may do, subject of course to the doctor's advice?—Yes, I remark here that I have never had any trouble with it.

18,426. Mr. Snell: Would you mind telling us what the results of this freedom from restraint are? Do you have accidents or any increased proportion of suicides?—No, I am glad to say I have had none so far of any kind. Of course there are two things that I want to impress upon you, one is that one is not dealing with the insane.

18,427. Chairman: You have rather a selected class of patients to deal with?—Certainly.

Mr. Snell: But you did take in a man who had been very obstreperous 24 hours earlier?—Certainly.

18,428. And he might have broken out then, and you would have exercised restraint?—There are two female nurses on night duty, and the house physician was within call.

18,429. Earl Russell: Those female nurses could not do much with a strong man?—No, but he was an early case.

18,430. Chairman: I think, Dr. Gilmour said this was an exceptional case, and he took an exceptional risk?—Yes, I did; from the way he spoke to me I could see he was a man who would probably give notice if he was going to be rowdy.

18,431. Mr. Snell: What I wanted to get was your opinion—is it worth while taking extra risks in regard to violent or suicidal cases?—I think it is foolish. I think the patient has a perfect right to turn round afterwards and tell you you had no right to do so, and I think then it is very difficult to answer him.

18,432. But you are aware that at an institution like the Maudsley they do take certain additional risks?—Yes, I was only looking on my own particular wards, where, of course, you could not do it. Our building is not put up for these cases specially. We have got a ward which existed before.

18,433. Mr. Jowitt: Do you devote your whole time, apart from out-patients, to these in-patients?—I go up there generally every day.

18,434. It makes a very great difference?—If you had 20 you could do it.

18,435. But you could not run a thing like yours on a big scale?—No, it is bound to be limited in numbers always.

18,436. Mr. Snell: Are they male or female?—At present they are all female.

18,437. Sir David Drummond: Do you think it would be feasible to suggest that what you are doing at the Middlesex should be carried out throughout the country in connection with our general hospitals?—I think that would be a very useful thing, most extraordinarily useful.

18,438. Do you think it would be practicable—have you thought of it from that point of view?—Yes, I have, and I think it would be practicable where there is a mental hospital near. This scheme must be, I think, run by arrangement with a mental hospital in some way.

Dr. RICHARD WITHERS GILMOUR, M.B., B.Sc. (Durham),
M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P.

18,439. But you recognise the many and great practical difficulties in inducing committees of general hospitals to take this matter up?—I think there will be very great difficulties. It is done at Oxford, I think, too.

18,440. Chairman: The interest of your case to us is that it is an illustration of a mental department being run in association with a general hospital. You have made the experiment on a small scale, and you have found, apparently that it is a useful function?—I am convinced of it.

18,441. The question is whether it is feasible to extend it more largely; but do you ever find that any of your patients get worse in your wards and reach the stage when certification is necessary?—Yes, I do indeed; I have one or two where it is necessary.

18,442. You have a few statistics, have you not, of your recent patients; perhaps you might give us these?—Yes. In the case of out-patients, last year the average number seen each week was 14. I had 111 new cases. It is not a big out-patient department, I know. Since the opening of the wards on June 12th, 1923, to December 31st, 1924, 12 males and 30 females were admitted. Of these 17 were cases which on admission could have been certified, though willing to come in for treatment, and if they had not been admitted to our ward would fairly certainly have been certified—could have been certified.

18,443. That is to say, you would have been prepared to certify them?—Yes, had there been nowhere else for them to go, and no other place could have taken them in; that is to say they would not have been, I think, taken into any nursing home or anywhere else except under certificates, and further, they could not have been looked after at home.

18,444. Sir David Drummond: Do you think an out-patient department connected with a general hospital without an in-patient department, would be of much service?—Yes, I do, Sir David, indeed. I am sure of it from what I have seen.

18,445. We have heard evidence that it would not?—My reason for saying that is that one gets principally the neuroses and psycho-neuroses coming to the out-patient department, but those do pass to genuine psychoses. I know it is said they never do pass from one to the other, but personally I do believe it; I have seen it, and I feel sure of it, and those neuroses and psycho-neuroses are treated with quite good results.

18,446. You think it would be advantageous to have an out-patient department even when committees will not undertake the in-patient department?—Yes, I do; I do not think you can teach neurology unless you teach the functional and the mental side as well as the physical side.

18,447. Chairman: Just proceeding with your statistics, you told us that 17 of those cases would have been certifiable?—They certainly could have been certified when they came in, though willing to come in for treatment, and if they had not been admitted to our ward they would have been certified; the rest were admitted showing mental symptoms. Of course all the cases I take in do show mental symptoms of some sort. Several of these developed such mental symptoms after admission as to render certification possible.

18,448. How many?—I am afraid I cannot give you that particular number, but there were several of them, who although they were not certifiable when they came in, were certainly certifiable later.

18,449. Did you ask the relatives to remove those cases?—No, I did not, except in one or two cases; those I could keep who were not troublesome and I was able to look after, I did. One or two became noisy and apt to be violent and disturbing, distressing to either the rest of my patients or the rest of the hospital, and I was forced to ask the relations to remove them.

18,450. Can you say of any patient you have had under your charge that you were keeping them against their wishes?—I certainly cannot. It is another point I put to the patient. I say "You are at liberty to go when you like; the only thing is do not get up at 3 in the morning and say you want to go, because it is unfair to us." One man did; he went at 6; he did not know what he was doing.

18,451. Did you let him just go off?—Yes; they knew he could get home; he had his clothes given to him.

18,452. Earl Russell: He knew enough to get home?—Yes, quite; he would not otherwise have been with us.

18,453. Chairman: I was thinking you might well have an embarrassing case of a patient who developed suddenly acute symptoms, and desired to go away. What are you to do with such a case?—If relatives are within reach I should wire or 'phone, and get them at once, and in the meantime keep the patient till such time as they came. You can only keep patients like that for a bit anyhow by diplomacy; otherwise if I could not get hold of the relatives I should send for the relieving officer, I think.

18,454. Earl Russell: Would you not adopt any other method than diplomacy for keeping them?—I was going to say we have not any other method to employ. Cases who suddenly develop like that are excessively rare.

18,455. Chairman: One generally can judge?—Yes.

18,456. I understand it is part of your policy that no patient should be certified in your wards?—That is very distinctly a part of it; I will not have it, and I think it would be wrong to do so.

18,457. You desire to maintain the voluntary aspect of it?—Because you assure the patients when they come in that they will not be certified, and they trust you, but the moment you certify one you can no longer give that assurance.

18,458. You attach importance to the reputation of your ward as a place where no person ever will be certified?—I think that is essential.

18,459. The ticket of admission to your ward is that one should be suffering, and that is all that is required?—Yes. I know a great many people hold that finally wards like this should take in certified cases. Personally, the more I see it the less I believe that.

18,460. Have you any more statistics to give us?

18,461. Mr. Micklem: The 17 out of the 42 in-patients were certifiable. What was the result of the treatment?—I am afraid I have not them here; that was one of the things I should have put down.

18,462. Chairman: Of your total figures, what was the result of the treatment received? You have given us the total admitted. What happened to them?—I can give you the results for last year for the whole thing. Last year the admissions were 5 men and 20 women.

18,463. In-patients?—Yes; and of the 20 women 6 were remaining at the end of the year, which make really 19 that one was dealing with.

18,464. What happened to them?—Of the 5 men, 4 recovered, and of the 20 women, 7 recovered.

18,465. And of the residue, what happened to them?—Three were removed by the friends at my request, and the rest were discharged, either relieved or not improved. But I should like to say that giving figures of recoveries from a ward like mine is quite different from giving them in a mental hospital, because in a mental hospital the patient is discharged on trial for a month or so, and then they come back for final discharge. I have to discharge outright, and put down for the benefit of the Middlesex Hospital how that patient is discharged. Now, in these cases it is very difficult to say when you send them away that they are going to hold up under the former stress as well as they have done whilst in hospital. I have discharged many "improved" which I have found afterwards have completely recovered.

Dr. RICHARD WITHERS GILMOUR, M.B., B.Sc. (Durham),
M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P.

18,466. Did none of those cases pass to asylums under certification?—Not straight from me.

18,467. Of the three whom you had to ask the relatives to remove?—One was taken home; he was a case of general paralysis, who was certified two or three days later. Another case had some relatives in this country, they were distant relatives. Her father was in South Africa; her mother was dead. The child was a case of dementia præcox, and she did get suddenly violent. She was a girl of 16 or 17. I then communicated with an aunt and the relieving officer came along at the aunt's request, and she was removed to the infirmary.

18,468. Mr. Micklem: When you discharge them improved why do not you wait for recovery?—Because I cannot. I have got to do it as soon as my bed is empty, as soon as the papers go down; that is rather a handicap on me really.

18,469. Chairman: Could you utilise more accommodation?—Yes. They are going to rebuild the hospital, and I hope when they do I shall have room for 15 patients anyhow. The point about the general hospital is this: the number of beds which are occupied by the St. Luke's cases have to be limited. If you take them beyond a certain number you sink the Middlesex into St. Luke's, and, of course, the general hospital has to avoid that; but I think one could get 20 beds without anything of that sort.
